Greenberg, Carville Criticize Dean's DNC Strategy. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Cook, 59K) reports, "Sweet as it was to win control of the House and the Senate in the 2006 election, some Democratic operatives think their victory could have been bigger if national party chairman Howard Dean had been willing to spend more in districts where races were close." At a Monitor breakfast, Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg said, "There were two dozen seats in which Republicans got 51 percent or less....There is a very big difference between defending these seats as incumbents or still trying to pick these up while they are being protected by Republicans." James Carville, "who along with Greenberg co-founded Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group, told a Monitor breakfast on Wednesday, 'We beat the hell out of them at the committees, at the congressional [campaign] committees. The DNC [Democratic National Committee] left the money on the table.'" Carville said DNC Chairman Howard Dean "should be dumped. Carville added that Dean 'should be held accountable' and described his leadership as 'Rumsfeldian in its competence.'"

The New York Times (11/16, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "The Democrats are celebrating their big victory of Nov. 7 with recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting, no matter that they won control of the Senate and the House for the first time since 1994." State Democratic leaders "are saying Howard Dean, the party chairman, is not receiving the credit he deserves for the triumph." On the other hand, Greenberg and Carville "rebuked Mr. Dean on Wednesday, saying the Democrats could have captured 40 House seats rather than 29 had Mr. Dean bowed to demands by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, leader of the effort to recapture the House, to put more money into Congressional races." Liberal bloggers "say they are not receiving the credit they deserve and are chafing at how what they call the mainstream media has showered too much credit on Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Charles E. Schumer of New York, for the sweep." And on Capitol Hill, "soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California has waded into a leadership fight that has divided her caucus." The Times adds that in an interview, Carville asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C minus general at the D.N.C.?"

The Austin American Statesman (11/16, Shepard) reports Carville, "during coffee and rolls with political reporters today, said Democrats could have picked up as many as 50 House seats, instead of the nearly 30 they have so far. The reason they didn't, he said, is the Democratic National Committee did not spend some $6 million it could have put into so-called 'third tier' House races against vulnerable Republicans."

Simmons Concedes, After Losing By 91 Votes. The AP (11/16, Haigh) reports, "More than a week after Election Day, Republican US Rep. Rob Simmons conceded to Democrat Joe Courtney on Wednesday, but did not rule out running again in two years." Simmons "spoke to supporters -- some tearful -- who packed his headquarters Wednesday afternoon, a few hours after Secretary of the State Susan Bysiewicz confirmed that Courtney had won by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast."

CQ (11/16) reports "the Courtney-Simmons contest was the closest of many tight races in a midterm election cycle that boosted Democrats to control of both chambers of Congress. Many of the Democratic takeovers came in districts held by moderate Republicans such as Simmons; a similarly positioned Connecticut Republican, 12-term incumbent Nancy L. Johnson, was unseated in the 5th District by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy." Courtney "had declared victory on Election Night, when returns indicated he led Simmons by 167 votes. He has been in Washington this week, attending freshman orientation."

Two Georgia Democrats Certified As House Race Victors. The AP (11/16, McCaffrey) reports Democratic Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall "were certified the winners of their respective races Wednesday, all but ending GOP hopes of knocking off at least one Democratic incumbent in the Nov. 7 congressional races." Barrow "defeated Republican Max Burns in eastern Georgia's 12th District by just 864 votes out of 142,438 cast, according to the final tallies released by Secretary of State Cathy Cox. In middle Georgia's 8th District, Marshall defeated Republican Mac Collins by 1,752 votes out of 159,568 cast."

DOJ_NMG_0094904

The New York Times (11/16, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Neither of the Republican challengers had conceded, and Mr. Barrow, who won by 864 votes, could face a recount if his opponent, Max Burns, requests one. Georgia law allows a recount if the margin of victory is less than 1 percent of the votes cast."

Accuracy Of Midterm Election Polls Assessed. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/16), Carl Bialik says, "Pollsters earned high marks in last week's elections: Surveys correctly predicted that the Democrats would win control of the House of Representatives, that the Senate would be closely contested and that Democratic gubernatorial candidates would sweep into statehouses." That "doesn't mean that some pollsters didn't do better than others, however, and firms haven't hesitated to trumpet their results." Bialik adds, "I looked at five pollsters that were among the most prolific: Rasmussen, SurveyUSA, Zogby (which releases separate telephone and online polls) and Washington, D.C.-based Mason-Dixon." There were "some interesting trends: Phone polls tended to be better than online surveys, and companies that used recorded voices rather than live humans in their surveys were standouts. Nearly everyone had some big misses, though, such as predicting that races would be too close to call when in fact they were won by healthy margins. Also, I found that being loyal to a particular polling outfit may not be wise. Taking an average of the five most recent polls for a given state, regardless of the author -- a measure compiled by Pollster.com -- yielded a higher accuracy rate than most individual pollsters." In the Senate races, "the average error on the margin of victory was tightly bunched for all the phone polls. Rasmussen (25 races) and Mason-Dixon (15) each were off by an average of fewer than four points on the margin. Zogby's phone polls (10) and SurveyUSA (18) each missed by slightly more than four points. Just four of the 68 phone polls missed by 10 points or more, with the widest miss at 18 points."

NYTimes Says Evangelicals Not Shifting Political Parties. David Kuo writes in a column for The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) that this year's elections doesn't mean evangelicals "aren't re-examining their political priorities nearly as much as they are re-examining their spiritual priorities," which "could be bad news for both political parties." Evangelicals are "beginning to see the effect of their political involvement on those with whom they hope to share Jesus' eternal message: non-evangelicals," as Beliefnet's poll showed that "nearly 60 percent of non-evangelicals have a more negative view of Jesus because of Christian political involvement; almost 40 percent believe that George W. Bush's faith has had a negative impact on his presidency." Conservative Christians were "promised that having an evangelical like Mr. Bush in office was a dream come true," but "it wasn't…not by a long shot." He wrote, "The administration accomplished little that evangelicals really cared about." However, Lewis says not to "expect conservative Christians in politics to start to disappear."

Riley's Success In Alabama Analyzed. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A19, Hillyer, 2.04M) reports as Republicans "coast to coast were burying their many political dead, a Republican governor once given up for dead was enjoying a landslide victory. Alabama Gov. Bob Riley was re-elected last week, beating long-popular Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley with more than 58% of the vote, including an impressive 20% of the black vote." Riley's win "was not simply the result of Alabama being a Republican state: Democrats won the two next most prominent statewide races, those for lieutenant governor and Supreme Court chief justice. In Alabama as elsewhere, this was a Democratic year -- with the notable exception of Mr. Riley, a conservative reformer in cowboy boots, with a cheerful, Reagan-like demeanor." Riley and editorial writers "across the state will readily identify his successes in the 'Three Es': Economic development, education and, not least, ethics." These accomplishments "stand in marked contrast to the record" of former Gov. Don Siegelman, who "presided over a budget crisis and now stands convicted of bribery and other infractions."

McCain Launches Presidential Exploratory Committee. USA Today (11/16, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "is forming a presidential exploratory committee in order to start amassing money for the 2008 Republican nomination contest," and he says "he'll make a final decision with his family over the Christmas holidays." McCain's new committee "will file quarterly reports to the FEC," and he could put "about $1 million toward a bid." In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in the past week, "26% of Republicans and independents who lean toward the GOP picked McCain," while former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, "was first at 28%."

DOJ_NMG_0094905

The AP (11/16) reports that McCain also "launched a Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — that allows supporters to donate and join his effort." If McCain runs, "he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hook, 850K) reports, "McCain has been considered the front-runner for the Republican nomination in a field that changed rapidly after the tumultuous midterms," and he has been "moving to make a fresh appeal to the surly voters who helped end GOP control of the House and the Senate -- Republicans and independents angry about government corruption and excessive spending." However, the midterms also show a "growing risk" for McCain as polls show that a "majority of voters disapprove of the war in Iraq and want at least some troops withdrawn," and McCain is "almost alone in calling for a larger deployment." Today, he made a speech to GOPAC, a conservative political group, he will speak again today to the Federalist Society.

CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Crowley) also said that "as he approaches '08, McCain will need to align his more troops in Iraq position with an antiwar electorate."

On MSNBC's Hardball (11/15), host Chris Matthews discussed the 2008 presidential race with political strategist Mark McKinnon and former Clinton Press Secretary Joe Lockhart. Matthews asked McKinnon, "On the Republican side…[John] McCain, Mitt Romney or Rudy [Giuliani]? Anybody else can win that nomination right now?" McKinnon: "I think those are the big three, I really do." Matthews then asked Lockhart, "In your party, Hillary [Clinton], [John] Edwards…[Barack] Obama?" Lockhart: "I think those are the three."

Thompson Announces Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (11/16, Glover) reports, "Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who served as Health and Human Services Secretary in President Bush's first term, said Wednesday he intends to form a committee to explore a possible run for the White House in 2008." During his stop in Iowa, Thompson "argued that his background as a Midwest governor and HHS secretary would appeal to voters," and said, "The three big issues in 2008 are going to be health, energy independence and the war in Iraq." Thompson "faces a daunting task in what's expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential candidates." Other potential candidates "include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki. California Rep. Duncan Hunter also has announced a presidential bid."

Clinton Says She's Undecided On Presidential Bid. The AP (11/16, Fouhy) reports that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D) "professed indecision about a presidential bid seems a bit disingenuous," as "she has millions in the bank, a national network of supporters and an unrivaled team of political strategists." Earlier this week, she said, "I will look at the possibilities, but I ... haven't really had the time to talk to people about it." Polls "show her the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination," but Clinton "insists she's just starting the process of making a final decision." Among "registered black Democrats, she led Obama 29 percent to 10 percent on the same question in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll." She has "as much as $13 million remaining from her Senate run that can be used in a presidential bid, far more than lesser known candidates."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 10, 2:25, Borger, 7.66M) said Sen. Clinton " is the person to beat," but "she does have one problem," which is that "she voted for the war in Iraq and that won't help with the liberal wing of the party." Sen. Barack Obama "was a sensation during this election cycle," but his problem is that "he's only been in the Senate for two years, he has no national security credentials so one of the reasons he's talking about Iraq in Chicago next week is to talk about his feelings about the war." He voted "against the war, and he wants to present his credentials to the American people." John Kerry, John Edwards, Joe Biden, General Wesley Clark, and maybe even former Vice President Al Gore are all on the "growing list" of potential candidates.

WPost Sees Lessons On Race In Maryland Senate Campaign. The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) editorializes, "There are lessons for both political parties in the conduct and outcome of the U.S. Senate race in Maryland this year." Republicans "discovered that identity politics and fraudulent campaign literature are not enough to drive African American voters into jettisoning their loyalty to the Democratic Party en masse. Democrats, who nominated white candidates for the Senate and every other marquee statewide race, were put on notice not to take their indispensable core constituency, African Americans, for granted. Both parties might profit from treating black voters, who account for between 20 and 25 percent of the state's electorate, with more respect."

DOJ_NMG_0094906

Bush To Promote Trade, Counter-Terrorism In Trip To Asia. ABC World News (11/15, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush landed in Singapore a short time ago. He's beginning a week long Asian trip for a series of summits and economic conferences and his first visit to Vietnam." The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the trip will knit together "the twin issues of economic security and counter-terrorism that are at the center of his agenda for the final two years of his presidency." Bush's trip "is centered on a three-day visit to Vietnam, his first and the second by a US president since the end of the Vietnam War. President Clinton visited in November 2000, two months before leaving office."

Much of the media coverage on Bush's trip portrays him as a president weakened by the midterm elections and the recent House defeat of his Vietnam trade bill. USA Today (11/16, Jackson, 2.27M) says "some Asian leaders wonder whether last week's elections were a vote against free trade and their countries' economic opportunities." Tonight, Bush "delivers a major speech on US-Asian relations that will include a renewed commitment to what national security adviser Stephen Hadley called 'trade liberalization.'" USA Today adds, "Delegates to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, to be held this weekend in Hanoi, will assess Bush's political strength in light of the election victories by the Democrats." The AP (11/16, Hunt) reports Bush is now "seeking to reassure nervous Asian allies that the United States will remain a reliable partner in liberalizing trade" after the "early embarrassment" when the House "failed to approve normalized trade relations with Vietnam."

The Financial Times (11/16, Beattie, Kazmin) reports the Administration "scrambled on Wednesday to play down the significance of the US House of Representatives defeating a motion to treat Vietnam as a full trading partner. … Though the bill is very likely to pass when Congress reconvenes in December, the timing of the vote, days before Mr Bush attends the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) forum in Vietnam is highly unfortunate for the White House." Susan Schwab, US trade representative, "used a press conference in Hanoi on Wednesday to argue that the defeat arose from procedural problems, not fear of Vietnam or rejection of trade deals. 'You have to be a student of our congressional system to understand the vote,' she said. 'The fact is that there was strong bipartisan support in favour of permanent normal trade relations for Vietnam in the House of Representatives.'"

NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 11, Williams, 9.87M) said the "subplot" of Bush's Asia trip is "how angry some of his fellow Republicans are at the election results at home. 'The Wall Street Journal' reports Republicans in Congress intentionally didn't pass two bills the President badly wanted before he left. One of them is aid for Vietnam and another is a bill to pay for the US government, which will now have to be flown to Asia by a White House aide for the President's signature."

The New York Times (11/16, Weisman, 1.16M) says the Vietnam bill "result was an embarrassment for the White House, suddenly deprived of a tangible way to prove that relations with Vietnam were improving under Mr. Bush. Even administration officials said they were not sure why the bill failed and seemed ready to blame Republicans as well as Democrats." The Times adds, "A day after Republican leaders decided not to even try to pass the bill before Mr. Bush's visit, new details of the inner workings of the House bill were emerging. Legislative aides said Republican skeptics of the bill were furious with their leaders that it was being scheduled so soon after an election in which trade was an issue." A similar piece in the Financial Times (11/16, Beattie, Callan) reports, "Never mind the Democrats: it's those Capitol Hill Republicans you need to watch out for. That was the conclusion of frustrated Bush administration officials as they blamed the ineptitude of the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives for trying and failing to rush through the Vietnam trade bill on Monday."

UN Ambassador John Bolton, appearing on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/15), said, "My understanding is the House had some difficulties with the terms of the bilateral agreement. I think they'll certainly take a look at that again. But I don't see anything inconsistent with being in favor of free trade and also aggressively promoting American interest, which I think the Administration is trying to do."

The New York Times (11/16, A6, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Bush's five-day visit to Asia "will test whether the Republican defeat last week diminished his influence as he presses other nations to confront Iran and North Korea." Discussing the president's meeting the Putin, Hadley "acknowledged that the two countries were still well apart on such [UN] sanctions" against Iran. Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing the nuclear issue, Hadley said the administration had "no intention of letting up the pressure" to win Iran's help. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq." Meanwhile, the Times says when Bush arrives Friday in Hanoi, "he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of normal trade relations with Vietnam." Also in Hanoi, the Times says Bush is "likely to have a testy encounter with President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea," who "has been critical of what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0094907

In a similar report, the Washington Times (11/16, Curl, 88K) reports, "While Mr. Bush will be president for another two years, his loss of Congress considerably weakens his clout at home. One former White House adviser said the strong hand he held when he bucked the international community and invaded Iraq may be all but played out." Mike Green, who is now an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language. … They know he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Tran, 850K) reports from Little Saigon, in Los Angeles CA, where "the talk is of optimism and new freedoms for a country many fled decades ago." Bush's "visit to Vietnam today is seen in the nation's largest Vietnamese American community as a heartening, profoundly important event. For some, there is even the hope that the president will find a way to champion reform in a country that still evokes bitterness and memories of terrible times. … Many in Little Saigon, a bustling Vietnamese American community that sprawls through parts of Westminster, Garden Grove and Santa Ana, say it's the perfect time for Bush to voice their concerns."

Rice Backs Restart To Global Trade Talks. The AP (11/16, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "endorsed an attempt to restart global trade talks that collapsed over the summer, telling Asian trade partners on Thursday that a new trade agreement is 'critical to global prosperity and security.' Rice pledged $1 million in new US funding for an Asian trade development initiative and unveiled a US program allowing expedited visas and other services for approved business travelers from nations" in the APEC forum. Rice insisted that "both as a trade issue and a foreign policy issue, the success of the Doha round is critical to global prosperity and security."

Vietnam Promotes Ho Chi Minh's Image To Fight "Rampant Corruption." The Washington Times (11/16, Kralev, 88K) reports, "Vietnam's ruling Communist Party is turning to the ideology and social teachings of its founder, Ho Chi Minh, in an uphill battle against rampant corruption that has resulted in the dismissal of thousands of officials in recent years. The Politburo instructed the party's local branches this week to begin a campaign 'to encourage party members and the general public to study and follow [Ho's] virtuous personality.'" The Times adds, "By doing this, it said, 'the party believes people will be able to effectively push back social evils' such as 'corruption, waste and individualism,' a reference to the diminished role of the individual in communist ideology."

Spellings Leads Delegation To Boost Foreign Student Enrollment From Asia. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, LaFranchi, 59K) reports on "a modest rise in the number of new foreign students in the US, the first increase after several years of declines after the 9/11 attacks." Now "educators" believe it will "take a more coordinated effort from the government and higher-ed institutions" to continue that increase. So U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings is "in China, Korea, and Japan this week with a group of university presidents -- a first-of-its-kind mission -- to tout the virtues of American higher education."

The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) writes in an editorial, "It is welcome news that after two years of decline, students from foreign countries are steadily coming back to U.S. college campuses." Also "this week a delegation of college presidents, led by education and State Department officials, is in Asia on a mission to recruit foreign scholars. America can't afford not to put out the welcome mat."

Bush Discusses Proliferation With Putin En Route To APEC Summit. The Washington Post/AP (11/16, A21, Loven) reports President Bush, "eager for Russian help in nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, tended to the sometimes frosty Washington-Moscow relationship Wednesday by paying a quick call on President Vladimir Putin. Bush paused to visit the Russian leader for an hour and a half during an airport stopover on his way to Asia for a week-long trip." Russian news agencies "quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as saying the two presidents discussed the Iranian nuclear program, the situation in the Middle East and nuclear nonproliferation." Speaking to reporters on Air Force One after the meeting,

DOJ_NMG_0094908

NSA Hadley said the president's "get-together" with Putin "was a social meeting, as we said it would be. This was a refueling stop." He also said the two men "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea. Hadley also said he had spoken with his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, "about efforts to reach agreement on a new UN security resolution on Iran."

Calling Wednesday's meeting "unusual," the Financial Times (11/16, Buckley) says Bush and Putin "confirmed the two countries would this weekend sign a bilateral accord on Russian entry to the World Trade Organization." Meanwhile, "Analysts said the gesture by Mr. Putin to travel to the airport…may have reflected a desire to ease relations between Moscow and Washington, currently seen as at their poorest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991."

Democrats Blast Administration's North Korea Policies. The Washington Post (11/16, A21, Kessler, 690K) reports the Bush administration "came under fierce attack yesterday from Democrats for its North Korea policy, with the incoming chairman of the House International Relations Committee saying that change is 'long overdue' and that the United States should allow its chief nuclear arms negotiator to visit Pyongyang. … Meanwhile, a group of experts returning from talks with top North Korean officials offered a pessimistic report on the prospects of reaching a deal when the long-stalled six-nation talks resume later this year. North Korean officials told the experts that they would take a much tougher stance when Pyongyang returns to the negotiating table, believing it is on 'equal footing' with the United States now that it has tested a nuclear weapon." At a hearing yesterday on the administration's preparation for the talks, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) "faulted the administration's exclusive reliance on the six-nation negotiating framework, arguing that substantial bilateral contacts are necessary to reach any deal." Lantos also charged that Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill has "been undercut in his diplomacy" by "hard-liners lodged in the office of the Vice President and the Defense Department." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns countered, "Some people are insisting that the United States should negotiate with North Korea solely on a bilateral basis, but the North Korean problem, especially its pursuit of nuclear weapons, is a regional problem, it's not just a bilateral issue, because this problem poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

Meanwhile, the AP (11/16, Schweid) reports Rep. Brad Sherman of California proposed that the US offer Pyongyang "a nonaggression pact as part of a deal in which the North Koreans permanently and verifiably give up their nuclear weapons." But GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida cautioned against concessions or any acts of "appeasement."

Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown On Pyongyang. AFP (11/16) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "urged Asia-Pacific nations to crack down on illicit financial activities by 'weapons proliferators,' in an indirect reference to North Korea." Speaking at an APEC ministers meeting in Hanoi, Rice said, "Confronting the threats posed by terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, natural disaster and pandemic disease is inextricably tied to the prosperity of the region. We also hope that APEC members will take all necessary actions to prevent the abuse of their financial systems by weapons proliferators."

North Korea Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program, US Experts Say. McClatchy (11/16, Schoof) reports North Korean officials are "proud of their country's nuclear test and are unlikely to be persuaded easily to give up their nuclear weapons," a group of Korea experts said Wednesday after a visit to the reclusive communist nation. Siegfried S. Hecker, a nuclear scientist and former director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, "said he and the others met with the head of North Korea's Yongbyon nuclear center, Ri Hong Sop, but weren't allowed to visit the center. They also spoke with high-ranking officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the army and the government."

Frist Seeks $10 Billion For Humanitarian Assistance For North Korea. AFP (11/16) reports out-going Senate Majority leader Bill Frist introduced a bill "calling for the establishment of a $10 billion fund to prepare for any humanitarian crisis" in North Korea. Frist said President Bush should have "all necessary tools at his disposal to deal with foreseeable humanitarian contingencies on and around the Korean Peninsula." The retiring senator said the proposed legislation was to be "a sign of hope to the people of North Korea, who have suffered for six decades under one of the cruelest regimes the world has ever known."

Administration's Iran Policy Seen As "Confused And Defensive." The Financial Times (11/16, Dinmore) reports, "Rarely has the Bush administration seemed so confused and defensive about its policy of seeking to isolate Iran as it responds to mounting public and international pressure to find a way out of Iraq, even if that involves making a U-turn and engaging Tehran. On Monday, in reply to a question about the US opening a dialogue with Iran over Iraq, the president made a direct link with the nuclear issue, demanding that Tehran first verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment program. Since then senior officials have had to row back from those comments on the nuclear link. A US offer, extended earlier this year to Tehran to discuss Iraq, can be 'reactivated,' officials said." For his part, Assistance Secretary McCormack said, "If, in the future, we want to avail ourselves of that channel, then it certainly is a possibility," noting that he "did not think it was under consideration." However, the Times says Deputy Assistant Secretary Satterfield "contradicted this assertion," telling a Senate committee Thursday that the US was "reviewing the timing of a 'direct dialogue' with Iran on the subject of Iraq." Meanwhile, "Analysts say that as the US scrambles to find an honorable exit from Iraq, opening a new channel to Iran is very much under consideration."

DOJ_NMG_0094909

Similarly, the Washington Post (11/16, A22, Wright, 690K) reports that the White House is "under growing pressure to talk to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, but mounting violence in Iraq and the Bush administration's political woes give the negotiating edge to Tehran and Damascus and complicate any US outreach, experts say. The idea of talks is widely expected to be on the list of proposals that will come out of the Iraq Study Group report next month, because co-chairman and former secretary of state James A. Baker III and other members back engaging enemies as well as allies. British Prime Minister Tony Blair this week endorsed talking with Tehran and Damascus, with caveats. The CIA director and the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency said yesterday that talks could help. And an array of experts has encouraged the administration to reach out to the countries that have meddled most in Iraq. But the Bush administration is already questioning the idea, and even supporters admit that full cooperation by both Iran and Syria may have little impact on the many-sided insurgency. Neither country has much sway over Iraq's Sunnis or the al-Qaeda branch in Iraq, as both are ruled by Shiites or Shiite offshoots." The Post notes that Secretary Rice, traveling yesterday to a conference in Vietnam, said that she is prepared to talk to "anybody, anywhere, anytime" under circumstances in which she believed progress was really possible.

Author Says Olmert Sought "Green-Light" From Bush For Pre-Emptive Strike On Iran. In a Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) op-ed, Michael B. Oren, author and senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, recalls former President Lyndon B. Johnson's message to Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban in 1967 that "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." According to Oren, "A similar message was imparted by George W. Bush in his meeting earlier this week with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Much like 1967, Israel faces a Middle Eastern leader who has repeatedly sworn to wipe it off the map, and to that end is assiduously trying to acquire nuclear weapons. … In the absence of international commitment to thwart Iran's nuclear plans, Israel has no choice but to consider striking pre-emptively. Doing so, however, requires explicit US support, or at the very least, an indication that the US will not oppose such action. … Mr. Olmert came to Washington in search of a green light." However, Oren says the US is "hardly in the position to sanction an Israeli attack. Bogged down in Iraq and hemorrhaging political capital at home, Mr. Bush resembles Johnson in his inability to approve risky military initiatives." Therefore, he says Olmert and his government "must consider [the] consequences as they decide on Israel's next moves. The ramifications of that decision are certain to affect America as well. … Israel may indeed act alone, but in the minds of a great many people in the Middle East, the US acts with it."

Envoys Fail To Break Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions. AFP (11/16) reports, "Six major UN powers failed to break the deadlock in their bid to agree on a package of targeted sanctions against Iran over its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear fuel work." US Ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, said diplomats "did not make any progress" at talks Wednesday, but will "meet again in the near future." He also noted that the sanctions issue "may also be discussed at the foreign minister level on the margins" of the APEC summit in Hanoi.

During an appearance on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/15), Bolton said, "It's pretty clear that Ahmadinejad is not at all impressed with the Security Council's last resolution which requires that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment activities. This is a key element of getting nuclear weapons capability. We're trying to move for sanctions in the Security Council. We've run into a roadblock with the Russians. We're still working on it. We met again today, but with no progress. … The International Atomic Energy Agency just issued another report saying that for the last three months, Iran has not cooperated at all in resolving some of the key unresolved questions. The Iranians are, obviously, feeling their oats and this is a real issue, whether the Security Council can follow through on its earlier resolution."

DOJ_NMG_0094910

Iran Dismisses UN Report On Uranium. The AP (11/16, Karimi) reports Iran Wednesday "dismissed a UN report that inspectors found new traces of enriched uranium and plutonium at a nuclear waste facility, saying it had already explained that discovery." Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "insisted the West will gradually back down in its standoff with Iran and eventually accept its nuclear program." Speaking to a crowd during a visit to Iran's Kurdistan province, Ahmadinejad said, "While the West tries to thwart the progress of our nation, time is on our side. They would have to take one step back with every passing day and approve the right of the Iranian people."

Pelosi's Views On China Likely To Set Tone In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A4, King, 2.04M) reports that when Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker in January, her views on China -- which include "criticisms [of its] human-rights abuses and unfair trade practices, as well as allegations that China is manipulating its currency and seeking technologies to undermine US national security" – "could set the tone for a new Congress looking to get tough on Beijing." However, the Journal concedes that "just how much Mrs. Pelosi and other top Democrats will focus on China -- and how much influence they will have on China policy -- is hard to predict. But apprehensions run high in Beijing and Washington that a Pelosi-led, Democrat-controlled House could seize on China trade and security issues to bash President Bush, much as congressional Republicans did in the final years of the Clinton administration."

Israel Raids Gaza In Response To Palestinian Rocket Attack. The Washington Post (11/16, A18, Wilson, 690K) reports, "An Israeli woman was killed Wednesday in a Palestinian rocket strike on the town of Sderot, prompting some Israeli lawmakers to demand a sharp military response in an effort to end such attacks from the Gaza Strip." The attack "brought competing assertions of responsibility from the Hamas and Islamic Jihad movements, both of which said the attack on a residential neighborhood was retaliation for Israeli shelling last week." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (11/16, Mitnick, 88K) reports that "Israeli warplanes raided the Gaza Strip overnight" in retaliation for the Palestinian rocket attack. The Chicago Tribune (11/16, Greenberg, 617K) also reports on the attack.

WSJournal Says Human Rights Commission Biased Against Israel. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) editorializes that the UN's new Human Rights Council "has been worse," after replacing the Human Rights Commission this year, despite US objections. Legal scholar Bayefsky has "pointed out" the "obsessive focus on Israel." In July, the Council "condemned Israeli operations in the West Bank and Gaza," and in August, "it cited Israel for 'massive violations of human-rights' in Lebanon." Now the Council "has dispatched 'fact-finders' to Gaza to report on the latest fighting.

War Seen As Looming Between Somali Government, Islamists. McClatchy (11/16, Bengali) reports, "Five months after Islamist militias defeated a coalition of CIA-financed warlords, Somalia appears to be sliding toward a major war that diplomats fear will draw thousands of foreign fighters to the Islamist side and spill into neighboring countries. The rise of the Islamists, who took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and since have seized most of southern Somalia, already was a setback for US counterterrorism efforts in the region, where al-Qaida loyalists are believed to be hiding." McClatchy adds, "A full-scale war would be a major test for Bush administration policy in a place that Osama bin Laden has called a battlefield in his war against the West." Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Djibouti and Eritrea "are backing the Islamists with a dizzying influx of weapons, supplies and military personnel, according to a new United Nations report to be presented Friday to the UN Security Council. The support ranges from uniforms to first-aid kits to surface-to-air missiles, and, in one case, guerrilla training at a camp in Syria, the report says. On the other side is Somalia's weak interim government, backed by US ally Ethiopia, which the report says has sent thousands of troops to protect the government's hold on its only major outpost." A "senior US military officer conceded last week that the U.S. has no strategy in place should war break out."

GAO Audit Cites Waste In USAID's Cuban Program. The Washington Post (11/16, A12, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Nearly all of the $74 million a federal agency has spent on contracts to promote democracy in Cuba over the past decade has been distributed without competitive bidding or oversight in a program that opened the door to waste and fraud," according to a report released yesterday by the Government Accountability Office. In "one of the more extreme cases of apparent abuse," the GAO said the Miami-based Accion Democratica Cubana used government money to purchase "a gas chainsaw, computer gaming equipment and software (including Nintendo Game Boys and Sony PlayStations), a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat, and Godiva chocolates." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who requested the audit along with Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.), "said the lack of oversight and the failure to follow government rules led to creation of a money trough that existed largely to provide jobs and operating funds to Miami-based activists who oppose Cuba's communist government." Meanwhile, Delahunt "said at a Capitol Hill news conference that he would hold hearings on issues raised in the audit when the new Congress convenes under Democratic leadership." In its official response to the 59-page GAO report, USAID said that it was "taking issue" with unspecified findings but that it would "seek to improve agency performance in managing, monitoring and evaluating this assistance." The AP (11/16, Abrams) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0094911

Cubans Using Alternate Routes Into US. The USA Today (11/16, Gomez, 2.27M) reports that as the Coast Guard and Border Patrol agents "are heavily focused on the eastern shore," more fleeing Cubans "driving high-speed boats are popping up on Florida's less-populated, less-patrolled southwestern coast." On Monday, "28 Cubans reached land in Naples," and on the previous day, "17 landed on Sanibel Island." That trend "forced the Border Patrol to shift a special unit to southwest Florida this year to help law enforcement track down the smugglers." New routes "account for only part of the recent upswing in Cuban migration to the USA."

Hughes Says Diplomacy Rules Have Improved Missions Abroad. In a letter to the editor of the Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K), Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes writes, "The memorandum that was the subject of 'Karen's Rules on Diplomacy: Talk to the Media -- if You Dare' [Federal Page, Nov. 8] was originally distributed more than a year ago and is having its intended effect of freeing US ambassadors to engage with the media around the world. It's disappointing that neither The Post nor the organizational psychologists it consulted bothered to check with the State Department before publishing the article. If you had, you would have learned that these guidelines empower our ambassadors rather than restrict them." Hughes says that when she "arrived at the State Department and met with ambassadors last year, many told me that they felt they were not allowed to speak on the record to the media unless the interview was 'pre-cleared' by Washington. While this perception was not entirely accurate, many ambassadors hesitated to speak on the record without specific permission." In response, Hughes says the "the resulting rules cited by The Post have been applauded by our missions abroad; in fact, they were reissued at the request of public affairs officers because many ambassadors are new."

Kabila Reelected In Congo. The AP (11/16, Faul) reports, "Incumbent President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner Wednesday of Congo's tense runoff election, defeating his rival and ex-rebel leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba, in the country's first multiparty contest in more than four decades." Kabila "won with about 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for Bemba, said Apollinaire Malu Malu, chairman of the Independent Electoral Commission." The Washington Post (11/16, A18, McCrummen, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports on the election.

French Socialists May Nominate "Glamorous, Unmarried Mother" For President. USA Today (11/16, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Is France, which has been led by male political lions like Charles de Gaulle, Francois Mitterrand and now Jacques Chirac, ready for a female president? And a woman who is a glamorous, unmarried mother -- and a new-breed Socialist at that? Segolene Royal, 53, who hopes to be the republic's first female president, will get a partial answer to that question this week." Socialist Party members "go to the polls today to choose their nominee for April's presidential election. Results are due Friday. … If no candidate emerges with a majority Friday, Socialists will hold a runoff between the top two vote-getters next Thursday."

Annan Cites "Frightening Lack Of Leadership" On Global Warming. The New York Times (11/16, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Secretary General

DOJ_NMG_0094912

Kofi Annan on Wednesday put the blame for global warming on 'a frightening lack of leadership,' saying the poorest people in the world, who do not even create much pollution, bear the brunt of rising temperatures." Said Annan, "The impact of climate change will fall disproportionately on the world's poorest countries, many of them here in Africa. … Poor people already live on the front lines of pollution, disaster and the degradation of resources and land." He adds that "for them…adaptation is a matter of sheer survival." The Times adds, "When pressed at a news conference afterward about his comments on poor leadership, Mr. Annan denied that he was singling out the United States."

Pakistan, India Start Peace Talks. The New York Times (11/16, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports, "Peace talks between India and Pakistan, which had stalled after the bombings of commuter trains in Mumbai in July, limped forward this week," but the "dialogue between their top diplomats ended Wednesday without movement on a crucial and closely watched item: India, having accused Pakistan of involvement in the Mumbai bombings." In a joint statement, the two nations "agreed to continue talking and said they had reached agreement on 'reducing the risk from accidents relating to nuclear weapons.'"

Pakistan Moves To Change Rape Law. The New York Times (11/16, Masood, 1.16M) reports that on Wednesday, the Pakistani government "finally pushed legislation through the lower house of Parliament to amend rape laws that human rights advocates say have led to punishment for thousands of innocent victims." The legislation "gives judges the discretion to try rape cases in a criminal rather than an Islamic court," and "allows forensic and circumstantial evidence to be used as a basis for convictions, as with other crimes." It also "introduces the concept of statutory rape, outlawing sex with girls under 16."

The Washington Post/AP (11/16, A19, Garwood) also reports that Pakistan's lower house of Parliament "ditch[ed] the death penalty for extramarital sex and revising a clause on making victims produce four witnesses to prove rape cases." Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, "praised lawmakers for approving the amendments and criticized fundamentalists for their 'unnecessary' opposition and their claims that his government was acting against Islam." He said, "I have taken a firm decision to change these unjust rape laws as it was necessary to amend them to protect women."

US Support Builds To Release Libyan Dissident. The Washington Post (11/16, A20, Boustany, 690K) reports, "Several members of Congress, 36 human rights organizations in the United States and abroad, and other concerned citizens plan this week to send a petition to President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging them to take swift action" to secure the release of Fathi al-Jahmi, a leading Libyan dissident "a possible death sentence while being held in solitary confinement in Libya." The petition says, "The United States has now restored diplomatic relations with Libya." A State Department official said, "We do remain concerned about Libya's human rights record. We have raised Mr. al-Jahmi's case with Libyan authorities and we continue to do so since we have normalized relations. We want the Libyan government to release Fathi al-Jahmi immediately." Telephone calls to Ali Suleiman Aujali, Libya's ambassador to Washington, "were not returned."

Darfur Crisis Heightens For Chadian Children. NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that across the border in Chad, Ann Curry said, "We look at the children of this war. They are suffering from all of the violence. Even here children are vulnerable to soldiers who stalk the area, hope to kidnap and recruit boys. In the past few weeks villagers have been attacked and burned. As the fighting rages closer, there is no telling when he and his friends can go home."

Rosales Becomes Anti-Chavez Presidential Candidate. The AP (11/16, Toothaker) reports Manuel Rosales "has managed to galvanize the fractured opposition as its unity candidate to face Chavez in Dec. 3 elections, and is drawing giant crowds even though he trails the incumbent by 20 points or more in most opinion polls." However, in Venezuela's "highly polarized society, this former mayor of Maracaibo, the country's second-largest city, has seen the campaign take on religious overtones." Rosales is "one of just a handful of opposition politicians to remain a regional powerbroker in defiance of the pro-Chavez tide."

Al Jazeera Launches English-Language Channel. The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 11, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that al Jazeera, "the Arab television channel that has outraged much of the Western world by broadcasting messages from Osama bin Laden and a rogue's gallery of other terrorists," has "started a new channel, broadcasting in English. It's not exactly must-see TV; in fact, here in the US, it's can't-see TV." CBS (Wyatt) added, "Depending on where you live, al Jazeera's launch of a global English language channel marks either the first day of worldwide terror TV or the first global newscast not dominated by Western thinking."

DOJ_NMG_0094913

LATimes Praises South Africa Over Legalization Of Gay Marriage. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) editorializes that the South African government's move to legalize gay marriage "reminded the world that its break from colonial apartheid wasn't just about changing the power structure. It was about conferring broad civil rights within its borders." The vote is "all the more extraordinary for its contrast with much of Africa on the question of homosexuality, which is illegal in most sub-Saharan countries." It's "regrettable" that South Africa will "allow civil officials to opt out of performing gay-marriage ceremonies," however "time might cure what Parliament didn't." South Africa is far from a perfect democracy, and government action alone," but on Tuesday, the nation "showed that it has shed the worst of its past and is growing into a rights-based democracy."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"L.A. Files Patient `Dumping' Charges."
"Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions."
"Game Is Afoot For Sony's PlayStation3."
"Even War Can't Stop Her Party."
"Iraq Pullout Talk Makes Iran Uneasy."
"Airport Hotels Ordered To Pay A `Living Wage'."

USA Today:

"Neanderthal Genome Mapping Begins."
"General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout."
"Nev. Town To Fine For Foreign Flags."

New York Times:

"General Warns Of Risks In Iraq if G.I.'s Are Cut."
"US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1."
"In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott."
"Plea Deal In Seton Hall Dormitory Fire."
"Agricultural Mainstay Gets A New, Urban Face."
"New DNA Test Is Yielding Clues To Neanderthals."

Washington Post:

"O'Malley Faces A Run Of Budget Shortfalls."
"In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines."
"Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn."
"D.C. Moves To Become Pioneer In Forcing 'Green' Construction."
"Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry."
"New Methods Let Scientists Analyze Neanderthal DNA."
"Pelosi's Role In Leadership Race Splits Democrats."

Washington Times:

"Episcopal Leaders Vote To Leave."
"Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle."
"Group Helps Siblings Save On D.C. Utility Bills."
"Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats."
"House Race Pits Murtha vs. Ethics."
"Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched."

Detroit Free Press:

"Ailing Ford's Crucial Edge Crossover Is Running Late."
"POWER PLAY: New Sony, Nintendo Systems Go Head-To-Head For Holiday Dollars."
"MITCH ALBOM: He Made Them Believe."
"United Way Beats Goal."
"Levin, General Tangle On Iraq."
"Auction To Unload New Condos, Homes."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"A Grab For Delta."
"Katrina Brought Chaos To CDC."
"GOP's Lott Comes Back In No. 2 Role."

Houston Chronicle:

"Baylor Teams With UNICEF For Largest AIDS Initiative."
"Victim Says He Has No Memory Of Pipe Assault."
"Enron's Top Accountant Sentenced To 5 Years, Fine."
"Texas Windstorm Coverage Rates Up 4.1 Percent."
"Tougher Texas Grad Plan Gets An Early OK."
"Houston Mayor Searches For New City Marketer."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; Americans Soldiers Killed-Iraq; Al Qaeda Recruiting; Bush-In Asia; US Airways Bids For Delta; Severe Weather; Tsunami Warning; Medicare Drug Plan; Lott Back In Republican Leadership; Abramoff-Six

DOJ_NMG_0094914

Year Sentence; Defense Travel System-Too Costly; Sony Playstation 3 On Sale; Atlanta Aquarium.

CBS: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; Senator Levin Interview; Iraq Mass Kidnapping-Aftermath; US Airways Bid For Delta; Severe Weather; Abramoff-Six Year Sentence; Lott back In Republican Leadership; Immigration Reform; Male Biological Clock; Democrats For President 2008; Al Jazeera Goes English.

NBC: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; ISG Goes To Work; US Airways Bid For Delta; US Airways Bid-Analysis; Lott Back In Republican Leadership; Darfur Crisis; Severe Weather; Republican's Angry Over Election Results; OJ' s Book; Veterans Return Too Teach.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Asian Civilizations Museum, Singapore; meets with US Embassy staff, Shangri-La Hotel, Singapore; courtesy call with the Acting President of Singapore, the Istana; meets with the Prime Minister of Singapore, the Istana; speaks at the National University of Singapore; attends social dinner with the Prime Minister of Singapore and Mrs. Lee.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Tours the National Library. Singapore.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on the DoD business systems modernization and financial management. Comptroller General David Walker, GAO; Army Secretary Francis Harvey; Navy Secretary Donald Winter; Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne. Location: Room 232A, Russell.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department. Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim; Michael A. Carvin, partner, Jones Day; Ted Shaw, director-counsel and president, NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund; Robert N. Driscoll, partner, Alston and Bird; Joseph Rich, director, Fair Housing and Community Development, Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Pipeline Safety Program. Vice Admiral Thomas J. Barrett, USCG (Ret.), Administrator, Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration; Timothy Felt, President and CEO, Explorer Pipeline Company; Terry Boss, Senior Vice President, Environment, Safety and Operations, Interstate Natural Gas Association of America; E. Frank Bender, Vice President of Gas Distribution and New Business Division, Baltimore Gas and Electric Company. Mr. Carl Weimer, Executive Director, Pipeline Safety Trust. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on proposals to improve drug safety and innovation at the FDA. Sheila Burke, Institute of Medicine; Diane Thompson, Glaser Pediatrtic AIDS Foundation; Steven Nissen, Cleveland Clinic; Adrian Thomas, Johnson and Johnson Pharmaceutical Group; Jim Guest, Consumers Union; Greg Simon, FasterCures. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on the Defense Travel System.Acting DoD Inspector General Thomas Gimble; McCoy Williams, GAO; Undersecretary of Defense David Chu. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Public Lands and Forests Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Health Care Subcommiyttee. Hearing on the CHIP program. Nate Checketts, Director of Bureau of Access, Utah Department of Health; Lisa C. Dubay, Associate, Bloomberg School of Public Health, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore; Sharon Carte, Executive Director, West Virginia CHIP State Capital Complex, Charleston; Nina Owcharenko, The Heritage Foundation; Ann C. Kohler, Director, Division of Medical Assistance & Health Services, Department of Human Services, Trenton, N.J. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: 9 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on global hotspots. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee. Continued hearing on the Energy

DOJ_NMG_0094915

Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

1 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on reforming foreign assistance programs.USAID Administrator Randall Tobias. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: GOPAC _ GOPAC holds its Fall Charter meeting. Highlights: 8 a.m. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. 10 a.m. Discussion on what is going to be the next big threat, with Michael Ledeen, American Enterprise Institute; John Lenczowski, The Institute of World Politics; Daniel Pipes, Middle East Forum. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Sen. Chuck Hagel. 3:30 p.m. Session on the next steps for the GOP, with Sen. Mitch McConnell, Craig Shirley. 7 p.m. Dinner speaker - Sen. John McCain. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

BIOETHICS _ The President's Council on Bioethics holds a meeting. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session 1: Stem Cell Research Update. Hans Robert Scholer, Ph.D. Director, Cell and Developmental Biology, Max Planck Institute for Molecular Biomedicine. 10:45 a.m. Session 2: Stem Cell Research Update and Alternative Sources of Pluripotent Stem Cells (May 2005). 2 p.m. Session 3: Overview: Genetics Research and Clinical Applications. Robert L. Nussbaum, M.D., Holly Smith Distinguished Professor of Medicine, Chief, Medical Genetics, University of California, San Francisco. 3:45 p.m. Session 4: Overview: Genetic Ethics and Public Policy. Kathy Hudson, Director, Genetics and Public Policy Center, Johns Hopkins University. Location: Hamilton Crowne Plaza Hotel, 1001 14th St. NW.

FEDERALIST SOCIETY _ The Federalist Society holds its 2006 National Lawyers Convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Solicitor General Paul Element. 11:30 a.m. White House Domestic Poolicy Adviser Karl Zinsmeister. 12 p.m. Session on telecommunications, with William Barr of Verizon, Paul Misener of Amazon.com, others. 1:45 p.m. Session on Criminal law, terrorists and criminal prosecutions, with Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch, Southern District of New York Judge Kenneth Karas, Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein. 3 p.m. Sen. John McCain. 7 p.m. Annual Dinner, with Supreme Court Justices Samuel Alito, Jr. Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Rd. NW. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW, unless otherwise noted.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE _ 7 a.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Woodrow Wilson Center's Program on Science, Technology, America, and the Global Economy hosts a half-day conference on November to examine the economic strategies of advanced and emerging market countries and their impact on the United States. Highlights: 7:30 a.m. Opening Remarks., Lee H. Hamilton, President and Director, Woodrow Wilson Center; Kent Hughes, Director, Program on Science, Technology, America and the Global Economy, Woodrow Wilson Center. 7:45 a.m. Keynote Addresses. Sens. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn.; and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M. 9 a.m. Panel I - Strategies in Industrial Countries. Chair/Moderator Steven Pearlstein, Washington Post; France and Germany--Mark Lehrer, Sawyer Business School, Suffolk University; Japan--Mark Tilton, Purdue University; United Kingdom and Ireland--Gary Hufbauer, Institute for International Economics. 10:15 a.m. Panel II - Strategies in Emerging Market Countries. Vhair/Discussant John Cranford, CQ Weekly. China--Carl Dahlman, Georgetown University India--T.N. Srinivasan, Yale University. Southeast Asia--Bryan Ritchie, James Madison College, Michigan State University. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon and Panel III - Policy and Private Sector Implications. Chair/Discussant Bruce Stokes, National Journal. Negotiating with Advanced Developing Countries--Vinod Aggarwal, University of California, Berkeley. Investing for Competitiveness--Susan Butts, Dow Chemical Company. U.S. Public Policy--Rob Atkinson, Information Technology and Innovation Foundation. What Can the United States Do?--Ralph Gomory, President, Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. 1:15 p.m. Summary Remarks--Katherine Hauser, TransAtlantic Business Dialogue Kent Hughes, Woodrow Wilson Center. 1:45 p.m. Brainstorming and Discussion.

OBAMA _ 8 a.m. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., attends a senators-elect orientation breakfast. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

PRAYER BREAKFAST _ 8 a.m. Congressional Prayer Breakfast, hostedby Rep. J. Gresham Barrett, for newly elected members of Congress. Closed press. Location: Room H-120, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout in the Hall of Columns.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS _ 9 a.m. Meeting of the House Democratic Caucus for leadership elections. Location: Cannon Caucus Room.

ELECTION-MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. The New America Foundation holds a forum dealing with a realistic post-election assessment of the Mideast, with Rita Hauser, Chair, International Peace Academy. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0094916

CONGRESS-HEALTH CARE _ 9:30 a.m. American University sponsors a forum on health care initiatives in the new Congress and by the 2008 presidential hopefuls, with former Sen. John Breaux, former DNC Chairman Terry McAuliffe, former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie, others. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

MENTAL HEALTH _ 9:30 a.m. The National Mental Health Association will introduce a new agenda and name during a Capitol Hill ``launch" event. Under its new name, Mental Health America, the century-old organization will work to improve the health and quality of life of all people by helping them live mentally healthier lives. Mental Health America also will release its national attitudinal survey on American's perceptions of mental health. Participants are Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I.; A. Kathryn Power, director of the Center for Mental Health Services, SAMHSA; David Shern, president and CEO of Mental Health America; and hHealth care stakeholders from across the country. Location: Upper Senate Park on Capitol Hill (on New Jersey Avenue between Louisiana and Delaware Avenues near the fountain).

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. Sen. James Inhofe holds a news conference with scientists to discuss climate change and comment on the UN climate conference in Kenya. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

EVANGELICAL MOBILIZATION _ 10 a.m. The Evangelical Climate Initiative holds a news conference to launch an expanded campaign to educate and mobilize evangelicals on global warming. Location: Riverside Baptist Church, 680, ``Eye" St. SW.

GOLD STAR FAMILIES _ 10 a.m. Move America holds a news conference to report on the trip to Iraq by Gold Star Families whose children died in Operation Iraqi Freedom. The delegation has just returned from Iraq and is releasing the Gold Star Families Iraq Survey Group report on their trip, including recommendations for the future role of the United States in Iraq. Participants include Congressman Duncan Hunter, Chairman, House Armed Services Committee; and John Ubaldi, Veteran of Operation Iraqi Freedom. Location: JW Marriott Hotel, Longworth Room, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-CHINA _ 10 a.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission releases its 2006 annual report to Congress. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

DODD _ 11 a.m. Sen. Christopher Dodd speaks at Howard University to issue a call to action to confront the nation's problems, using ideals that have always inspired patriotism. Location: School of Business Auditorium, Howard University, 2600 6th St. NW.

WOMEN OF THE STORM _ 11 a.m. Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., joins members of the Louisiana Congressional delegation and grassroots leaders, including the Women of the Storm, to encourage the passage of legislation to provide energy producing states with a share of offshore oil and gas revenues and dedicate the funding to coastal wetlands restoration and hurricane protection. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

COMPETETIVENESS _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Newt Gingrich, former Speaker of the House, holds a press conference with David Abshire, President, Center for the Study of the Presidency; former Special Counsel to President Reagan and former Ambassador to NATO; Larry Wortzel, Chairman, U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission and Vice President for Foreign Policy, Heritage Foundation; and Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., House Armed Services Committee. They wil challenge the Administration and Congress to provide greater Defense Department funding of basic research; upport full funding of President Bushs American Competitiveness Initiative; and Release of the 2006 Benchmarks Report of the Task Force on the Future of American Innovation. Location: Reserve Officers Association, One Constitution Ave. NE, 5th Floor Conference Room.

MCCAIN _ 12 p.m. Sen. John McCain speaks a a luncheon on energy, environmental and economic priorities, sponsored by the Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions at Duke University. Location: Mellon Auditorium, 13th St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

ALL-VOLUNTEER FORCE _ 1 p.m. The Miltary Officers Association of America and the National Defense University Foundation host a discussion, ``Can We Sustain the All-Volunteer Force in an Extended Conflict?" Panelists include Gen. Barry McCaffrey, USA ret.; Michael Dominguez, principal undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness; and Selective Service System Director Bill Chatfield. Location: Double Tree Hotel, Crystal Ballroom, Salons A and B, 300 Army Navy Drive, Arlington, Va.

DEMOCRATS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 2 p.m. Senators Kennedy, Schumer, Harkin and Clinton will join leaders and activists from the six states that passed minimum wage initiatives to affirm their commitment to raising the federal minimum wage. Location: Room 430, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0094917

LABOR AWARDS _ 2:30 p.m. US Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao hosts the Labor Hall of Fame induction ceremony. This year's inductees are Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York and presidential candidate; and Charles R. Walgreen Sr., founder of the drug store chain that bears his name. Location: U.S. Department of Labor, Great Hall, 200 Constitution Ave. NW.

PETRAEUS _ 5 p.m. Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, commanding general of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center, gives a lecture at the School of Advanced International Studies on ``Soldiering and the Schoolhouse.'' Location: Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NUCLEAR TERRORISM _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University holds a panel discussion on nuclear terrorism, with retired Gen. Lt. Gen. Robert Gard, Douglas Shaw of the Institute for International Law and Politics, others. Location: Copley Formal Lounge, on campus.

GLENN AWARD _ 7:30 p.m. The National Defense University Foundation hosts its America Patriot Award Gala, honoring John H. Glenn Jr, pioneer astronaut and former U.S. senator. Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Federal Prosecutors Urge Conviction Of Colombian Rebel Leader ... 3
Padilla Case Raises Questions Over Torture And Subsequent Prosecution ... 3
Detainee's Lawyer Tries To Prevent Heart Procedure At Guantanamo ... 3
German High Court Finds Motassadeq Guilty Of Abetting Murder ... 3
Ex-Pentagon Official Says Terror War Tactics Must Reflect US Values ... 4

Homeland Response:

US Seen As Unprepared For Dirty Bomb Attack ... 4
FBI Arrests Massachusetts Student For Bomb Threat Hoax To NSA ... 4
Judge Upholds Law Banning Instruction On How To Make Firebombs ... 4
Hatfill Urges Judge To Fine NYTimes Over Refusal To Disclose Sources ... 4
Attorney Disputes US Claims Of Sexual Activity On Airplane ... 4
Gonzales Meets With Allard About SuperMax Funding ... 5

War News:

Abizaid Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Timetable ... 5
About 70 Freed, But Iraq Kidnapping Leads To Confusion, Infighting ... 7
Six More US Troop Deaths Reported In Iraq ... 7
Locals Afraid To Join Police Force In Anbar ... 8
Soldier Pleads Guilty In Mahmoudiya Rape-Murder Case ... 8
Resurgent Taliban, Al Qaeda Using Iraq Methods In Afghanistan 8
Al Qaeda Finds Fruitful Recruiting Grounds In Pakistan ... 8
Christmas Trees Donated To Troops, Families At Home ... 8

Corporate Scandals:

Former Enron CAO Sentenced For Securities Fraud ... 8
SEC Launches Formal Probe Of Dell's Accounting Practices ... 9
Former Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty ... 9
Auditors Clear SEC's Financial Statements ... 10
Corporate Board Ousters Could Spur More Options Probes ... 10

Criminal Law:

Abramoff Reports To Federal Prison ... 10
Third Man Pleads Guilty In 2002 New Hampshire Phone-Jam Case ... 11
Television Pitchman Sentenced For Selling Faulty Computers .. 11
Global Police Unit Created To Hunt Down Pedophiles ... 11
Judge Rules Alleged Cuban Spy's Statement To FBI Should Be Admitted ... 12
Boston US Attorney's Office Says Reported Bulger Sighting Inconclusive ... 12
Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribe 12
FBI Searches Home Of Philadelphia Labor Leader In Ongoing Tax-Fraud Probe ... 12
FBI Joins Corruption Probe Of Kentucky School Official ... 13
NYPD, FBI Bust Billion-Dollar Sports Betting Ring ... 13
Puerto Rico Secretary Of State Ordered To Turn Over Documents For Fundraising Probe ... 13
California City's Mayor, Administrator Charged With Corruption. 14
New Evidence Found In New York Murder Case ... 14
Simpson Book On Murders Roundly Condemned ... 14

Civil Law:

Unions Object To Latest Bonus Plan For Dana Officials ... 14

Civil Rights:

Man Alleging LAPD Beating Pleads No Contest To Resisting Arrest ... 15
Maryland Police, FBI Continue Investigation Into Racist Graffiti Incidents ... 15
NYTimes Says Election Reform Necessary ... 16

Antitrust:

DOJ Opens Price-Fixing Probe Of Banks' Municipal Bond Deals16
Shareholders Sue Private Equity Firms Alleging Rigged Buyouts16
US Airways Makes $8 Billion Bid For Delta ... 16
DOJ Subpoenas Micron Technology In SRAM Price-Fixing Probe ... 19
Inouye Says Senate Commerce Committee To Review AT&T-BellSouth Merger ... 19
EU Says Microsoft Has Not Supplied Data In Antitrust Probe 19

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Group Sues Administration Over Global Warming Report ... 20
9th Circuit Panel Asked To Rescind EPA Field-Burning Policy ... 20
USDA Reports Says 12% In US Have "Very Low Food Security."20
Senate Approves New Mexico Tribal Land Settlement ... 20

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Arrests Alleged Philadelphia Mob Soldiers On Drug Trafficking Charges ... 21
Detroit Man Accused Of Causing 2 Heroin-Laced Fentanyl Deaths ... 21
Track Coach To Be Arraigned In BALCO Case ... 21
Michigan Bikers To Serve Prison Time For Making Meth ... 21
City Councils In California Seek To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries21
Report: Mexican Cartels Step-Up Meth Operations Following US Crackdown On Labs ... 21
Surrender Program Allows "Favorable Consideration" To Fugitives ... 22

Immigration:

ICE Arrests 29 Muslim Immigrants For Religious Worker Visa Fraud ... 22
DHS IG Says Virtual Border Fence Could Cost Up To $30 Billion23

Tax:

WPost Says Democrats Should Back Tax Reform ... 23

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Resubmit Six Judicial Nominees ... 24
Congress Passes Stopgap Spending Bill ... 24
Democrats Who Opposed Gates In 1991 Said To Face Dilemma24
Seniors Said To Face Confusing Choices For Medicare Drug Plan ... 25
Lott Elected Senate Minority Whip ... 25
House GOP Whip Candidates Outline Strategies To Retake Majority ... 26
Democratic Blue Dogs Hope To Enhance Influence In House ... 27
Murtha Tells Blue Dogs That Ethics Bill Is "Total Crap." ... 28
Five Congressional Black Caucus Members To Head Key House Committees ... 30
Norton Hopeful For Passage Of DC House Vote Bill ... 30
Senate Democrats Planning Agenda For 110th Congress ... 31
Pension Agency Posts Smaller Deficit Than Last Year ... 31
USDA Admits Making Over $2.8 Billion In Improper Payments ... 31
Rodman Leaving Pentagon For Brookings ... 32
Defense Department Travel Reservation System A "Fiasco." ... 32
WSJournal Says Federal Relief For Auto Execs Won't Help ... 32

Other News:

Fed Concerned About Inflation, More Confident About Engineering Soft Landing ... 32
Miners' Union Aims For Revival As Coal Industry Makes Comeback ... 32
Urban Schools Behind Nation In Science Scores ... 33
KBR Will Trade As A Separate Stock ... 33
Democrats Have Good Chance To Expand Senate Majority In 2008 ... 33
Democrats Closed "Parent Gap" In Midterm Elections ... 33
Greenberg, Carville Criticize Dean's DNC Strategy ... 33
Simmons Concedes, After Losing By 91 Votes ... 34
Two Georgia Democrats Certified As House Race Victors ... 34
Accuracy Of Midterm Election Polls Assessed ... 34
NYTimes Says Evangelicals Not Shifting Political Parties ... 35
Riley's Success In Alabama Analyzed ... 35
McCain Launches Presidential Exploratory Committee ... 35
Thompson Announces Presidential Exploratory Committee ... 35
Clinton Says She's Undecided On Presidential Bid ... 36
WPost Sees Lessons On Race In Maryland Senate Campaign . 36
Bush To Promote Trade, Counter-Terrorism In Trip To Asia ... 36
Bush Discusses Proliferation With Putin En Route To APEC Summit ... 38
Democrats Blast Administration's North Korea Policies ... 38
Administration's Iran Policy Seen As "Confused And Defensive."39
Pelosi's Views On China Likely To Set Tone In Congress ... 40
Israel Raids Gaza In Response To Palestinian Rocket Attack ... 40
War Seen As Looming Between Somali Government, Islamists 40
GAO Audit Cites Waste In USAID's Cuban Program ... 40
Hughes Says Diplomacy Rules Have Improved Missions Abroad41
Kabila Reelected In Congo ... 41
French Socialists May Nominate "Glamorous, Unmarried Mother" For President ... 41
Annan Cites "Frightening Lack Of Leadership" On Global Warming ... 41
Pakistan, India Start Peace Talks ... 41
Pakistan Moves To Change Rape Law ... 41
US Support Builds To Release Libyan Dissident ... 42
Darfur Crisis Heightens For Chadian Children ... 42
Rosales Becomes Anti-Chavez Presidential Candidate ... 42
Al Jazeera Launches English-Language Channel ... 42
LATimes Praises South Africa Over Legalization Of Gay Marriage ... 42

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 42

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 43

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0094920

TERRORISM NEWS:

Federal Prosecutors Urge Conviction Of Colombian Rebel Leader. The AP (11/16, Yen) reports, "The government urged jurors Wednesday to convict Colombian rebel leader Ricardo Palmera, saying he should be held responsible in a plot to keep three Americans hostage, whatever his politics. … But the defense portrayed Palmera as a man who deserves jurors' benefit of the doubt as a tangential leftist sympathizer caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government. … 'By definition, if you're a rebel, no state is ever going to recognize you. By definition, a prosecutor is always waiting for you,' said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. 'It tells you, "Don't go for the labels of terrorist. Don't go for the misstatements of evidence."'" The AP continues, "In closing arguments, Justice Department attorney Kenneth Kohl exhorted the jury to look past the 'political smoke' in the five-week trial of Palmera, who has called the aims of his FARC leftist group noble and peaceful. … 'FARC is not above the law,' Kohl said, as Palmera, dressed in khaki pants, a navy blazer and green tie, quietly scribbled on a notepad. 'Holding people against their will for political purposes is what terrorism is.'" The AP adds, "Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan instructed the 12-member jury to begin deliberations Thursday in a case in which the lives of the three Americans – who are still being held in the thick jungles of south Colombia – may hang in the balance. … Palmera, 56, is charged with hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists after a plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in Colombia in February 2003. … Palmera, who is better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States."

Padilla Case Raises Questions Over Torture And Subsequent Prosecution. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Richey, 59K) reports the Jose Padilla case "is raising fundamental questions about whether a US citizen's harsh treatment -- and alleged torture -- while in US military custody should prevent his later prosecution in the criminal-justice system." Padilla's lawyers say he "was tortured while being held for three years and eight months as an enemy combatant," and want all criminal charges against him to be dropped "because of the government's alleged illegal and abusive treatment." While federal prosecutors said in a written motion this that Padilla "was not tortured or abused," even if "he had been tortured, they added, there is no legal support for Padilla's request that all charges against him be dismissed." Assistant US Attorney Russell Killinger wrote, "Padilla has not cited a single precedent absolutely barring a federal criminal prosecution because of alleged due process violations committed during a prior military detention."

Detainee's Lawyer Tries To Prevent Heart Procedure At Guantanamo. The AP (11/15, Selsky) reports an attorney for Saifullah Paracha, a "69-year-old multimillionaire businessman" from Pakistan who is being detained at Guantanamo Bay, "has asked a judge to block a planned medical procedure on the prisoner's heart, saying that performing it at the U.S. base puts his life at risk." Paracha has "already had one heart attack while in U.S. custody and in recent days has suffered chest pains, his lawyers said." The lawyer says the procedure should be carried out at a hospital in the US or Pakistan.

German High Court Finds Motassadeq Guilty Of Abetting Murder. Bloomberg (11/16, Rach) reports, "Germany's highest criminal court found Mounir el-Motassadeq guilty of abetting the murder of more than 2000 people in the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., overturning part of a lower court's decision. The Federal Court of Justice today upheld the lower court's ruling that el-Motassadeq, a 32-year-old Moroccan, was guilty of being a member of the Hamburg terror cell that participated in the attacks. El-Motassadeq's seven-year jail sentence will be reassessed by the Hamburg Higher Regional Court," in light of the ruling.

Motassadeq Case Said To Expose Flaws In International Anti-Terror Cooperation. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Wiltenburg, 59K) writes, "If convicted terrorist-cell member Mounir el-Motassadeq walks free Thursday from a German courtroom, he may have US security policy to thank." Motassadeq, "direct and respectful before his judges," is "less well-known than recently sentenced 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, whose courtroom theatrics drew broad attention to his trial in the US. But the dramatic legal odyssey of the first man ever tried in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks has been the focus of bitter recrimination between German and US officials, who have denied the case's lawyers access to statements from a key witness. As both countries attempt to strike the right balance between national security and the rule of law, observers say the case is a prime example of why it will take better global cooperation to succeed in the war on terror."

DOJ_NMG_0094921

Ex-Pentagon Official Says Terror War Tactics Must Reflect US Values. In a Washington Post (11/16, A27, 690K) op-ed, Center for Strategic and International Studies President John Hamre, a former deputy defense secretary, writes, "In the warm glow of post-election bipartisanship, Congress and President Bush would do well to take on a crucial task: forging a new legal foundation for the global war on terrorism. The current policy framework is a disaster. While I know it's not true, still, the world believes that America condones torture, prison camps and 'disappearance' tactics." The US "will lose the global war on terrorism if we feel we must adopt tactics that undermine our civic values. For generations the world has admired America's commitment to the rule of law and government accountability. Much of the world now questions that commitment."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Seen As Unprepared For Dirty Bomb Attack. In a story titled "Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared," KTVT-TV Dallas (11/15, Riggs) reported on its Web site from a piece broadcast yesterday, "Agents gather outside the nation's capital at the FBI's Training Academy in Quantico, Virginia to train on how to prevent or identify the perpetrators of such an attack. … Travis Callaway, a nuclear specialist with the FBI, says it's easy for terrorists to get their hands on the key ingredients. 'Getting an industrial or medical isotope is not that difficult to come by. There are literally millions of sources around the world. They are used in industry and medical purposes all the time. Most are not guarded at all or under simple lock and key.' Two dozen response teams, based at FBI offices across the country, receive 300 hours of specialized training on weapons of mass destruction. … The teams maintain a low profile at high profile events says John Fraga the chief of the Hazardous Materials Response Unit. 'The majority of our work in prevention has been deploying to special events or events that would attract the attention of certain groups. Having us on site is certainly the better thing to have so we can assess threats and packages and things like that.'" However, Charles Ferguson of the Council on Foreign Relations "says there is a lot of worry that the government is not prepared" for a dirty bomb attack, "especially in the wake of its slow response to Hurricane Katrina." KTVT added, "At the current pace of research and planning, reliable safety advice from the government may be a long time coming."

FBI Arrests Massachusetts Student For Bomb Threat Hoax To NSA. The Boston Herald (11/16, Johnson, 184K) reports, "A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts student sent a booze-fueled bomb hoax to the National Security Agency, claiming a man he'd randomly plucked from facebook.com was planning a suicide attack on the Sears Tower, according to an FBI affidavit. Agents yesterday arrested Adam Hart of Georgetown, at UMass Amherst, where he now goes to school. … He pleaded not guilty to malicious conveying of false information and was released on a $10,000 unsecured bond."

Judge Upholds Law Banning Instruction On How To Make Firebombs. The San Diego Union-Tribune (11/16, Soto, 324K) reports US District Judge Jeffrey A. Miller in San Diego "has rejected a radical activist's request to invalidate a law making it illegal to tell people how to make a firebomb with the intention that they go out and commit a violent crime." Rodney Coronado "argued that the law infringed upon the First Amendment protections of free speech," but "Miller Wednesday sided with prosecutors, who said the law was tailored to apply to specific criminal activity which the government has a responsibility to control." The Union-Tribune notes, "On Aug. 1, 2003, Coronado gave a speech…in which, in response to a question from the audience, he demonstrated how he made a gasoline-fueled device he used to burn down a Michigan State University laboratory in 1992. Hours earlier, an arson fire destroyed a huge housing complex under construction in University City causing $50 million in damage. A group for which Coronado has acted as spokesman, the Earth Liberation Front…took credit."

Hatfill Urges Judge To Fine NYTimes Over Refusal To Disclose Sources. The New York Sun (11/16, Gerstein) reports that in his libel lawsuit against the New York Times, Steven Hatfill "has asked a federal judge to fine the newspaper $25,000 a day for refusing to disclose its confidential sources and to increase the fine amount by $25,000 each month in an attempt to encourage the paper to comply." The Sun notes, "While the FBI searched Mr. Hatfill's home and the Justice Department eventually named him as a 'person of interest' in the anthrax case, neither the scientist nor anyone else was ever charged in connection with the crimes." In the fine motion, Hatfill lawyer Thomas Connolly "painted the Times's refusal to comply as brazen and willful," but NYTimes lawyers note that "the names of only two sources are being withheld. Mr. Kristof has said both were FBI employees."

Attorney Disputes US Claims Of Sexual Activity On Airplane. The AP (11/16) reports from Raleigh, NC, "A man arrested for allegedly engaging in 'overt sexual activity' with his girlfriend on an airliner was lying with his head on her lap because he was not feeling well, his attorney said. … That gesture was misinterpreted by a flight attendant, who humiliated and harassed the couple, said attorney Deb Newton, who represents Carl Persing." The AP continues, "Persing and Dawn Sewell, both of Lakewood, California, face federal charges of interfering with flight crew members, allegedly by disobeying a flight attendant's request that they stop their public displays of affection. … They were arrested on Sept. 15 when they arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport on a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles. … 'The one witness I've talked to and the defendant dispute almost everything in the government's affidavit as to what happened on that airplane,' Newton said."

DOJ_NMG_0094922

Gonzales Meets With Allard About SuperMax Funding. The Rocky Mountain News (11/15) reports, "U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., met today with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to seek support in adding $12 million to the Commerce, Justice and State Appropriations bill to fund a perimeter fence at Supermax in Florence." The News continues, "Allard's office said that during the meeting, Gonzalez pledged to work with Allard to address the funding issue for the fence." The News adds, "The prison holds a number of the nation's most notorious terrorists such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef. … A Justice Department inspector general's report in September criticized the prison for a number of shortcomings, including a lack of security and failure to monitor the mail. … 'Today's meeting was extremely productive,' said Allard. 'Attorney General Gonzales assured me that the mail deficiencies raised in the inspector general's report are being addressed, and he agreed to discuss the need for a perimeter fence with the Bureau of Prisons director and follow up with me on the potential avenues to funding the fence.'"

KCNC- TV Denver (11/15, 6:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "For years, neighbors have been asking the government to improve the security. Today, Allard met with Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. They talked about money for the fence and a recent study that cites several safety issues."

WAR NEWS:

Abizaid Rejects Iraq Withdrawal Timetable. USA Today (11/16, Kelley, 2.27M) reports on its front page that Gen. John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, "urged Congress to resist withdrawing American troops from Iraq any time soon, a stance that drew sharp disagreement from top Republicans and Democrats."

The three broadcast networks focused largely on the domestic political aspect of the story, with ABC World News (11/15, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) saying Abizaid "found himself caught between sort of a rock and a hard place, today, on Capitol Hill. The rock: the unrelenting violence in Iraq. The hard place: the rising tide of American disapproval for the war. A week after voters sent a strong signal of dissatisfaction for the war," Abizaid "warned the Senate Armed Services Committee, do not set a timetable for troop withdrawal."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, lead story, 1:40, Couric, 7.66M) cast it slightly differently, beginning, "They won control of Congress with calls to start pulling US troops out of Iraq. But one week later, the Democrats have run into their first big roadblock, a roadblock with a green uniform and four stars." Meanwhile, NBC Nightly News (11/15, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) focused more directly on the military aspect, saying, "For those Americans in a rush to get out of Iraq, the top US Commander on the ground had a warning today: Don't do it." While Abizaid "is no stranger to incoming fire he faced a lot of tough questions and a lot has changed since his last visit to Capitol Hill, including what the voters had to say."

CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Bash) said Abizaid "came here to Capitol Hill, and a lot of what he did was reject the ideas coming from both sides of the aisle. First and foremost, he said once again that the idea that Democrats are proposing for a timetable for withdrawal, even starting in four to six months, is a non-starter. … He even said no to the idea, floated for some time now by Republican Sen. John McCain, to put more troops into Iraq." The Financial Times (11/16, Sevastopulo) says Abizaid "drew the ire" of McCain "by saying he did not believe more troops would help the US stop the bloodshed." But Abizaid did say he "had requested an increase in the number of U.S. military advisers in Iraq and had sent another 2,000-Marine unit into the country's restive western region," the Los Angeles Times (11/16, Spiegel, 850K) reports.

The New York Times (11/16, Gordon, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports midway through its front-page story that Abizaid "also publicly said for the first time that the American position in Iraq had been undermined by the Bush administration's decision not to deploy a larger force to stabilize the country in 2003." That decision came after then-Army Chief of Staff Gen. Eric Shinseki "told Congress that several hundred thousand troops would be needed. His testimony was derided" by Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

McCain, Clinton Among Most Vocal Critics. The Washington Post (11/16, A22, Ricks, Tyson, 690K) says the "first major Iraq hearings since the Nov. 7 midterm elections revealed blunt impatience among Democrats as well as open frustration from Republicans, and produced the rare spectacle of presidential hopefuls from both parties taking aim at the general." McCain "voiced disappointment that Abizaid seemed to be clinging to the 'status quo,'" while Sen. Hillary Clinton "took exception with Abizaid's talk of all the steps that the Iraqi government needs to take. 'Hope is not a method,' she told him. 'We've had testimony now for four years about what 'must be done' -- and it doesn't get done.'" The Washington Times (11/16, Scarborough, 88K) says McCain said, "It's not encouraging to those of us who heard time after time that things are, quote, 'progressing well,' that we're making progress, et cetera, because we're hearing from many other sources that that's not the case."

DOJ_NMG_0094923

The New York Times (11/16, Zernike, 1.16M) says in a front page story that "there were three contenders for president" on hand -- Clinton, McCain, and Sen. Evan Bayh, as well as Sen. Joseph Lieberman, "the self-described 'Independent Democrat'…who is at risk of bolting and taking his party's new narrow majority with him."

Levin Says He Was Surprised By Abizaid's Assessment. Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer), "What Gen. Abizaid basically said which did surprise me is that he thinks that things are getting somewhat better in Iraq. And according to the two leaders of our intelligence community, the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency and the head of the Central Intelligence Agency, who testified this afternoon, things are getting worse in Iraq."

Levin said on the CBS Evening News (11/15, story 2, 1:15, Couric, 7.66M), "I was somewhat frustrated because I thought basically he was saying that we should stay the course, which is, I think, clearly a position that's been rejected by the American people overwhelmingly, staying in course in Iraq is not a strategy for success. The horrible violence on the ground, it seems to me, is proving that everyday."

The AP (11/15, Flaherty) reports Levin "told reporters he was encouraged the general said all options should remain on the table." Levin said, "The only way for Iraqi leaders to squarely face that reality is for President Bush to tell them that the United States will begin a phased redeployment of our forces within four to six months."

Reed Sees No "Specific Time" For Withdrawal. Asked about withdrawal timelines on MSNBC (11/15, Mitchell), Sen. Jack Reed said, "I don't think there's a specific time. I think we understand that that is essentially a military judgment. But there's a series of very important questions. One is, is there a tipping point in which the chaos is going to become out of control and our presence there will not be particularly effective? Have we reached that tipping point?"

Casey Opposes Timetables. McClatchy (11/16, Youssef, Brown) reports that while Abizaid argued against withdrawal timetables in Washington, US Iraq commander Gen. George Casey said in an interview that the situation "remains too unstable to withdraw troops and that setting a date for U.S. troops to start leaving would 'just allow folks to wait us out.'"

Senate Democratic Leaders Worry Bush Not Ready For Iraq Changes. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Feldmann, 59K) reports the "leadership of the new Senate Democratic majority expressed concern Wednesday that President Bush does not understand the urgency of the situation in Iraq, and does not appear to be planning for change beyond replacing Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense." At a Monitor breakfast, incoming Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "We are bound and determined to change course in Iraq. We have a plan, we have enunciated that plan, we have done it through legislation and a lot of talk, and we'll continue to do that." The Monitor adds Reid was "accompanied by his deputies in the Democratic leadership, Richard Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York, and Patty Murray of Washington." Later, the senators "added that they were not pushing for impeachment, of either Bush or Cheney." Reid said, "One of the things that we were able to cut off pretty quickly is the 'impeach Bush' program. That was because of two words: Dick Cheney." The Monitor adds Schumer "blamed the administration for not listening to multiple points of view, saying that when someone does, 'they kneecap him.'"

Iraq Study Group's "Washington Insiders" Seek Solution. NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 2, 2:15, Williams, 9.87M) profiled the Iraq Study Group, a group of "Washington insiders who hope to forge a way out of a bad spot in Iraq." NBC (Mitchell) added, "To the rescue: Ten Washington veterans -- five Republicans and five Democrats -- battled scarred by decades of political wars, trying to find a way out of a real one. … How to bridge the divide between staying the course and withdrawing starting in four to six months? People close to the commission say it will be tough, a phased withdrawal tied to deadlines for Iraq's government to control the violence."

Iraqis Also Debating Future Of US Operations. The New York Times (11/16, A17, Tavernise, 1.16M) writes, "While Americans in a faraway land debate their fate, Iraqis have already decided on the cure. The only problem is that there is more than one set of Iraqis. Shiites want their country back. Sunni Arabs want a strongman. They cannot agree." As the US "grapples with difficult decisions over the war, Iraqis are also debating. But just when they need to band together, they have never been further apart. … The landscape is that of a country sliding into war, and Sunnis and Shiites, like Republicans and Democrats, desperately look for ways out." Shiites "agree with many Democrats: American soldiers should withdraw to their bases. Sunnis say total control by the Shiite-dominated government could mean massacres."

The Washington Post (11/16, Knickmeyer, 690K) reports on its front page that "while American commanders have suggested that civil war is possible in Iraq, many leaders, experts and ordinary people in Baghdad and around the Middle East say it is already underway, and that the real worry ahead is that the conflict will destroy the flimsy Iraqi state and draw in surrounding countries." The Post says that

DOJ_NMG_0094924

"according to U.S. and Arab analysts and political observers," whether the US "departs Iraq sooner or later, the United States will be hard-pressed to leave behind a country that does not threaten U.S. interests and regional peace."

Iran Now Concerned About Rapid US Exit From Iraq. Meanwhile next door, Iran is expressing concerns about a prompt US withdrawal. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Murphy, 850K) reports the fresh post-election "talk of a phased pullout have touched off a discussion in Tehran about the outright anarchy that could result." A political commentator on Tehran's English-language news channel said Tuesday night that the US should "remain in Iraq until it has established a strong, stable central government capable of providing adequate security."

Kondracke Says More US Troops Needed In Iraq. In his Roll Call (11/16) column, Morton Kondracke writes, "To salvage stability from what looks like inevitable chaos in Iraq, the United States needs a new strategy that produces security, political reconciliation and hope. That should involve sending more U.S. troops -- at least on a temporary basis -- while pressuring the Iraqi government for reform and mounting a massive jobs project to reduce unemployment in the country." While it "would be politically impossible" for the White House to seek a troop level increase following the midterm elections, "conceivably it could be done if the idea is blessed by the Iraq Study Group."

About 70 Freed, But Iraq Kidnapping Leads To Confusion, Infighting. The AP (11/15, Wagner) reports kidnappers "released about 70 people snatched in a mass abduction by suspected Shiite militiamen," a sign the militants "went too far and Iraq's leader may be yielding to intense U.S. pressure to crack down on sectarian violence." But PM Nouri al-Maliki "clearly has more work to do. Iraqi police, hospital and morgue officials reported 105 new violent deaths Wednesday; 54 of the victims were tortured and shot, their bodies dumped in Baghdad." The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 3, , Couric, 7.66M) said officials "are trying to sort out the details of the mass kidnapping. … It's still not clear exactly how many people were kidnapped yesterday, estimates range from 40 to 150, or how many people are still being held."

The New York Times (11/16, A16, Semple, 1.16M) reports that a "dispute erupted Wednesday between Iraqi officials" over the incident. A spokesman for Minister of Higher Education Abed Dhiab al-Ajeeli said "nearly 100" captives were still being held," but chief government spokesman Ali Dabbagh "contended that only 39 people had been kidnapped and that all but 2 had been released. Both men angrily dismissed the other's comments as false."

Educators See Incident As Assault On Schools. The Washington Post (11/16, A23, Raghavan, 690K) runs a feature on the woes of Iraq's colleges in the wake of the "brazen daylight raid on a Ministry of Higher Education building." The "most profound effect of what many Iraqis view as a national calamity was felt in university halls and campuses across Iraq. Here, the abductions highlighted the plight of academics and an educational system besieged by sectarian tensions, lawlessness and government ineffectiveness."

Platoons' Investigation Of Mass Kidnapping Recounted. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Smith, 850K) runs the third installment of its four-part series on the platoons of the 4th (Tomahawk) Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, 172nd Stryker Brigade Combat Team that spent part of October investigating the kidnapping of at least 22 Iraqi men from a meatpacking plant in southwest Baghdad.

More Commentary On Sectarian Violence. In a Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) op-ed, Michael Rubin of the American Enterprise Institute writes that the Maliki government "has proved a grave disappointment. Security has worsened since Maliki has been in power. Ignoring the pleas of U.S. officials, he has been unwilling to crack down on the militias and death squads that fuel sectarian violence -- and the mass kidnapping from a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad on Tuesday by gunmen in police uniforms shows the consequences. … But does this mean that the U.S. ambition to bring democracy to Iraq was a mistake? As a supporter of the war, and later an advisor to the U.S. occupation authority, I don't think so. Despite our disappointment with Maliki, the strategic rationale for promoting democracy in the Middle East -- and in Iraq in particular -- remains sound."

In a Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) op-ed, the American Prospect's Laura Rozen writes, "A debate is emerging inside the Bush administration: Should the U.S. abandon its efforts to act as a neutral referee in the ongoing civil war and, instead, throw its lot in with the Shiites? A U.S. tilt toward the Shiites is a risky strategy, one that could further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and that could backfire by driving its Sunni population into common cause with foreign jihadists and Al Qaeda cells. But elements of the administration, including some members of the intelligence community, believe that such a tilt could lead to stability more quickly than the current policy of trying to police the ongoing sectarian conflict evenhandedly, with little success and at great cost."

Six More US Troop Deaths Reported In Iraq. ABC World News (11/15, story 2, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In Iraq today, the US military reported the deaths of six American forces. Two were killed in a roadside bombing in Baghdad. The others died in fighting in al Anbar province, the volatile region west of the capital."

DOJ_NMG_0094925

Locals Afraid To Join Police Force In Anbar. USA Today (11/16, 11A, Brook, 2.27M) examines the lack of protection and pay for police in Iraq's Anbar Province. The volatile "Sunni stronghold" is "lightly held by about 33,000 U.S. troops spread across 53,000 square miles." USMC Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, the regional commander, "has said he doesn't command enough forces to defeat the insurgency. Instead, American forces are training Iraqi soldiers and police officers to do it." But "locals are reluctant to join the police because insurgents are waging an effective intimidation campaign and there aren't enough American forces to protect every recruit."

Soldier Pleads Guilty In Mahmoudiya Rape-Murder Case. The AP (11/15, Lenz) reports Spc. James Barker, one of the four US soldiers "accused of raping a 14-year-old Iraqi girl last spring and killing her and her family" in Mahmoudiya, has pleaded guilty and agreed to testify against the others. His civilian attorney David Sheldon said Barker "agreed to the plea deal to avoid the death penalty." When military judge Lt. Col. Richard Anderson asked Barker why he participated in the assault, Barker replied, "I hated Iraqis, your honor. They can smile at you, then shoot you in your face without even thinking about it."

Resurgent Taliban, Al Qaeda Using Iraq Methods In Afghanistan. The Washington Post (11/16, A22, Linzer, Pincus, 690K) reports CIA Director Gen. Michael Hayden and Defense Intelligence Agency Director Lt. Gen. Michael Maples told the Senate Armed Services Committee that al Qaeda's "influence and numbers are rapidly growing in Afghanistan, with fighters operating from new havens and mimicking techniques learned on the Iraqi battlefield for use against U.S. and allied troops." They said both al Qaeda and the Taliban "are back, waging a 'bloody insurgency' in the south and east of the country." Hayden said, "The direct tissue between Iraq and Afghanistan is al Qaeda. The lessons learned in Iraq are being applied to Afghanistan." Senators "noted the increased use of roadside bombs and the relatively new phenomenon of suicide attacks, which had not been seen in Afghanistan before the Iraq war."

Al Qaeda Finds Fruitful Recruiting Grounds In Pakistan. ABC World News (11/15, story 3, 2:40, Ross, 8.78M) reported, "Al Qaeda's ability to find new recruits is of great concern to officials. … Much of that recruiting is taking place in Pakistan. This is one of the places where US and Pakistani officials say Al Qaeda has been able to find new recruits: A yearly gathering in a field, held this week outside Lahore, Pakistan, attended by more than one million religious, conservative Muslims who belong to a group that opposes violence. But intelligence sources tell ABC News Al Qaeda uses the setting as cover."

Christmas Trees Donated To Troops, Families At Home. USA Today/AP (11/16, 9A, Kates) reports Christmas tree growers across the US "are donating thousands of trees to them and their families stateside. … The 'Trees for Troops' effort is part of a campaign by the National Christmas Tree Association's Christmas Spirit Foundation to collect more than 11,000 trees in 27 states."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former Enron CAO Sentenced For Securities Fraud. The AP (11/16, Lozano) reports, "Richard Causey, the last of the top Enron Corp. executives to learn his punishment, was sentenced Wednesday to five-and-a-half years in prison for his role in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history." The AP continues, "Causey, the company's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty in December to securities fraud two weeks before he was to be tried along with Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy, fraud and other charges related to the company's collapse." The AP adds, "Causey, 46, had agreed to serve seven years in prison. Prosecutors indicated they could have recommended it be reduced to five if they were pleased with his cooperation. … The maximum penalty for securities fraud is 10 years in prison and a fine of $1 million or twice the amount illegally gained." The AP notes, "Causey also agreed to fork over $1.25 million to the government and forfeited a claim to about $250,000 in deferred compensation as part of his plea deal. Unlike others at Enron, Causey didn't skim millions of dollars for himself from shady deals. … Prosecutors dropped their plan to seize Causey's home, a $950,000 two-story, red brick house in a Houston suburb. … Causey, the government's 16th cooperating witness who entered a guilty plea, had faced more than 30 counts of conspiracy, fraud, insider trading, lying to auditors and money laundering."

USA Today (11/16, Farrell) reports, "Causey's sentence includes $1.25 million in forfeiture and a fine of $25,000. He could have received up to seven years under the plea deal he entered last year." USA adds, "Earlier this year, a jury in Houston convicted Enron's two former CEOs, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, of lying to the public about the company's financial health. For his role in the fraud, Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison. Lay's conviction was vacated because he died in July before he had the chance to appeal the verdict. … Causey was originally scheduled to go to trial as a co-defendant with the two men. … Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, the other member of the company's inner sanctum of management, pleaded guilty in early 2004, agreeing to serve a 10-year sentence for crimes he committed at the company. But because of his cooperation, which culminated in one week of trial testimony on behalf of the government against Lay and Skilling, a federal judge in September reduced his sentence to six years."

DOJ_NMG_0094926

The Washington Post (11/16, D01, Johnson) reports, "Corporate insiders portrayed Causey, a former accountant at Arthur Andersen LLP known for his genial personality and his love of golf, as a man cowed by Enron's aggressive, rules-bending culture. But prosecutors on the Justice Department's since-disbanded Enron Task Force contended that fraud could not have flourished without Causey's actions and his failure to blow the whistle on others. … His get-along attitude helped Causey steadily climb the corporate ladder, and he became Enron's top accountant in 1998, three years before the company's demise. Causey and his wife, Elizabeth, last year forfeited $1.25 million in a bank account, and he gave up the rights to about $250,000 more in deferred pay from Enron."

SEC Launches Formal Probe Of Dell's Accounting Practices. The Austin American-Statesman (11/16, Zehr) reports, "Federal securities regulators have launched a formal investigation into Dell Inc.'s financial record-keeping, upgrading an informal inquiry they started a year ago." The A-S continues, "Dell disclosed the development Wednesday evening. At the same time, it said it would postpone its third-quarter financial report, which had been scheduled for today, until the end of the month. … Dell said the move was related to ongoing reviews of its accounting, not the upgrading of the Securities and Exchange Commission investigation. … 'It really is just a high degree of prudence that's being placed on all our financial reporting right now,' said spokesman Jess Blackburn. 'There's just a high degree of care being given to reviewing that material and being certain of what we want to report before we report it.'" The A-S adds, "The SEC does not comment on investigations, and there have been few clues about what the probe involves. Dell previously has said the reviews focus on 'issues related to accruals, reserves and other balance-sheet items.' … A formal investigation indicates the agency has reason to believe there are problems with Dell's books and gives the agency the authority to subpoena testimony and documents. … The formal investigation and postponed earnings come just as Dell appeared to have shrugged off the most serious effects of a yearlong stretch of setbacks." The A-S notes, "Dell first revealed concerns about its financial reporting in August, when it said it had been the subject of an information investigation by the SEC. In response to that inquiry, Dell said it had found some accounting problems stretched back before the investigation started and asked the audit committee to begin an independent probe. … By September, the reviews had raised the interest of the Justice Department. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York asked for documents going back to 2002."

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A2, Lawton) reports, "Neither Dell nor the SEC has disclosed the exact nature of the issues being investigated. In September, Dell issued a statement noting that the probe could involve potential issues 'relating to accruals, reserves and other balance- sheet items.' Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims." The Journal adds, "The intensifying investigation is the latest in a series of setbacks for Dell. Over the past year, the onetime highflier has suffered slower growth and falling profits amid a struggle to compete against resurgent rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. Dell recently lost its position as the world's largest personal-computer seller, according to market researchers IDC and Gartner. It also announced a battery recall involving millions of laptops in August because the batteries were a potential fire hazard. Dell's stock has fallen 14% so far this year."

The New York Times (11/16, Darlin) reports, "The announcement surprised analysts, as had previous announcements about the accounting investigations. Dell had announced preliminary results for its second quarter in August, but has not yet filed the required 10-Q quarterly report of those earnings with the S.E.C. The company also canceled an analysts' meeting in September at the last moment, citing the S.E.C.'s investigation. … The company said that it would announce its third-quarter results in a news release at the end of the month and its top executives would not hold the customary conference call with analysts and journalists."

Former Hewlett-Packard Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty. The AP (11/16, Robertson) reports, "Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn pleaded not guilty Wednesday to four felony identity theft and fraud charges for allegedly instigating the company's ill-fated spying probe into boardroom leaks." The AP continues, "Dunn appeared briefly for her arraignment in Santa Clara County Superior Court and was released on her own recognizance after her lawyer entered the plea for her. … She and her attorney, Raj Chatterjee, declined to comment as they left court." The AP adds, "Dunn, 53, is one of five people charged in the computer and printer maker's clandestine efforts to unmask board members who discussed company business with reporters. Investigators used a shady ruse known as 'pretexting' to obtain the confidential phone logs of directors, reporters and others to trace the source of the leaks. …

DOJ_NMG_0094927

Testifying before a congressional in September, Dunn said she was repeatedly reassured by HP's lawyers about the legality of its detectives' subterfuge. … She resigned from HP's board after the scandal broke in early September. The two-time cancer survivor recently began chemotherapy for ovarian cancer."

Auditors Clear SEC's Financial Statements. The Washington Post (11/16, D02, Johnson) reports, "Auditors gave the financial statements of the Securities and Exchange Commission a clean bill of health, a sign that the market watchdog has taken steps to fix problems that prompted a lawmaker last year to chide the agency for what he called 'hypocrisy.'" The Post continues, "The Government Accountability Office, which reviewed the SEC's books for the fiscal year ended in September, said in documents issued yesterday that the SEC had come close to fully resolving past weaknesses in its financial controls. … The GAO had cited problems with how the SEC tracks penalties it levies, with its information systems controls and with its financial reporting process. Now, auditors say, those issues are far less serious than they were." The Post adds, "This is the third year the SEC has allowed outside audit of its books and financial controls, which are designed to help prevent fraud and mistakes. … The problems were exposed in March 2005, the same time securities regulators were imposing stiff new rules that forced managers at publicly traded companies to assess their own controls. The rules have proven expensive and controversial and are the focus of an aggressive and well-funded business lobbying campaign. This week, leaders at the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, have been working to resolve differences in their approach to modifying the rules."

Corporate Board Ousters Could Spur More Options Probes. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Petruno) reports, "By ousting KB Home chief Bruce Karatz over inflated stock option awards, the Los Angeles company's board instantly made the executive a high-profile potential target for federal prosecutors, legal experts say." The Times continues, "More than 50 corporate officers nationwide have resigned or been fired in the continuing scandal over alleged option manipulation, but most of those have been at relatively small companies. …As the head of a business with $10 billion in annual sales, Karatz automatically would present a higher priority to government investigators than executives who ran much smaller firms, several attorneys said. … 'Especially if it's someone senior, I think those go to the top of the list' for prosecutors, said John Olson, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington." The Times adds, "Authorities have not accused Karatz of wrongdoing, and spokesmen for both the U.S. attorney's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission declined to comment Wednesday on Karatz or KB Home. The company in August disclosed that the SEC was conducting an informal investigation of its option practices. … On Sunday, the company's board announced that Karatz had resigned following an internal investigation that determined he was responsible for setting 'incorrect' stock option grant dates from 1998 to 2005. The effect was to boost the value of those grants for Karatz and other KB Home executives. … 'It's a huge thing for a board to kick out a CEO,' said Thomas Curran, an attorney at Ganfer & Shore and a former assistant district attorney in New York. … The directors said that Karatz and Gary A. Ray, who had been the company's human resources chief, chose the option grant dates."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Abramoff Reports To Federal Prison. ABC World News (11/15, story 10, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And the man who once wielded tremendous influence in Washington, is tonight, a Federal prisoner. Former lobbyist, Jack Abramoff, at the center of a Capitol Hill corruption scandal, began serving an almost six-year sentence in Maryland. He was convicted of fraud in a Florida business deal. Meanwhile, ABC's George Stephanopoulos reports the Democratic Party's first order of business on Capitol Hill, will be to ban all gifts and travel paid for by lobbyists, once they, the Democrats, take control of the House and Senate in January."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 6, 0:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A former Washington insider has a new roof over his head. Lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported today to the Federal pen in Cumberland, Maryland. He'll serve six years for business fraud. Abramoff is still cooperating with a corruption investigation allegedly involving members of Congress and White House officials."

The AP (11/16) reports from Cumberland, MD, "Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted of federal charges after using expensive gifts, campaign donations and exotic trips to win access to the powerful in Washington, went to prison Wednesday." The AP continues, "Abramoff arrived at about 6:30 a.m. EST at a relatively secluded prison facility in western Maryland to begin serving a nearly six-year prison sentence for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida. … Abramoff was delivered out of sight of waiting reporters and camera crews and his arrival was announced in a two-paragraph statement by a prison representative." The AP adds, "The part of the camp where Abramoff will be kept is a 334-bed minimum security facility located near an industrial park along the north branch of the Potomac River. … The camp is all male. It consists of a number of two-story dormitories that are light red cinderblock structures. Each dormitory contains a number of six-bed cubicles, and Abramoff was being assigned to one of those. The prison is nearly surrounded by Appalachian Mountain ridges rising along either bank of the Potomac on the Maryland and West Virginia sides of the river. … Stephen Finger, executive assistant at the prison, said all inmates work while there. Incoming inmates such as Abramoff typically are assigned to menial jobs such as food service work. Finer said that inmates can work their way up from low-level jobs paying 12 cents an hour to better positions paying up to 40 cents an hour."

DOJ_NMG_0094928

The Legal Times (11/16, Palmer) reports, "Abramoff also faces jail time after pleading guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. Justice Department lawyers have put off Abramoff's sentencing related to those charges, citing his cooperation with the department's ongoing corruption probe. He is expected to be sentenced in that case next year." The Times adds, "Although Abramoff was originally supposed to report to prison in Pennsylvania, the Justice Department intervened in late October, suggesting the Federal Correctional Institute in Cumberland as its preferred choice. Located in western Maryland, the medium-security facility is within driving distance of Washington, allowing federal prosecutors easy access to Abramoff. … Abramoff was sentenced in March by U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in the Southern District of Florida after pleading guilty to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit wire fraud, and mail fraud. He was also sentenced to three years of supervised release."

Third Man Pleads Guilty In 2002 New Hampshire Phone-Jam Case. The Manchester (NH) Union Leader (11/15, Distaso) reports, "A third conspirator has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges in connection with a Republican operation that jammed Democratic get-out-the-vote telephone lines on election day, 2002." The Leader continues, "Shaun Hansen, whose former telemarketing firm placed the hundreds of line-jamming calls after being hired by a Republican operative, admits violating federal statutes outlawing telephone harassment and conspiracy to commit telephone harassment. … He faces maximum penalties of $250,000 and five years in prison for the harassment charge and a fine of $250,000 for the conspiracy charge. But under an agreement filed in U.S. District Court in Concord this week, federal prosecutors agreed not to oppose Hansen's request for sentence reduction 'based upon the defendant's apparent prompt recognition and affirmative acceptance of personal responsibility for the offense.'" The Leader adds, "The Justice Department also agreed not to prosecute Hansen on any additional charges.Hansen owned the former Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises, a telemarketing firm that was paid $2,500 by GOP consultant Allen Raymond to place hundreds of hang-up calls to five Democratic Party offices and the Manchester firefighters union headquarters to jam their get-out-the-vote and rides-to-the-polls telephone lines. The operation proceeded for about 90 minutes on the morning of election day, 2002, before being called off by the former GOP state chairman.According to previous court documents and testimony, Raymond was hired by former state Republican executive director Charles McGee for $15,600 to find a firm to make the calls. McGee and Raymond also spoke with former Republican National Committee official James Tobin about the operation, according to court documents and testimony."

Television Pitchman Sentenced For Selling Faulty Computers. The AP (11/16, Dale) reports from Philadelphia, "A TV pitchman who defrauded customers, banks and vendors out of $39 million by selling them faulty computers was sentenced to more than seven years in prison by a judge who called his conduct 'unforgivable.'" The AP continues, 'George Capell, 51, continued to scheme until the end, tapping a secret bank account even after his bankruptcy and guilty plea to indulge a taste for strip clubs, fancy cars and a Florida condominium, authorities said. … 'This to me is unforgivable,' U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody said Tuesday in handing down an 86-month sentence, near the top of the sentencing guidelines. … Capell's lawyer, Scott DiClaudio, blamed the losses on 'a failed business model.'" The AP adds, "After seeing Capell's TV infomercials, some customers spent upward of $2,000 apiece on computer systems that arrived, if at all, with broken or missing parts. Many of the customers were disabled or unemployed, and needed the computers to find jobs, the judge said. … Others lived in rural areas far from an electronics store, and were forced to buy computers sight unseen, said bankruptcy court trustee Lawrence Lichtenstein. … The bilked customers, from more than a dozen states, have received restitution of 25 cents on the dollar, Lichtenstein said. He hopes to eke out another 10 cents on the dollar for them through the sale of Capell's condominium and half the proceeds of Capell's $1 million home. … Capell pleaded guilty to 41 fraud and money laundering counts in April. His company, which did business as the Video Computer Store, ran a call center and warehouse from 1999 to 2001."

Global Police Unit Created To Hunt Down Pedophiles. USA Today (11/16, Leinwand) reports, "U.S. agents are joining authorities in Canada, Britain and Australia to form a global police unit that will help monitor the Internet for child molesters who seek victims online." USA continues, "Law enforcement representatives from each country met here Wednesday to discuss the program, one of the latest in a series of initiatives aimed at countering the rising number of ways in which pedophiles and pornographers use the Internet to harm children. … Under the program, known as the Virtual Global Taskforce (VGT), agents from each nation will take turns monitoring a London-based website (www.virtualglobaltaskforce.com) that responds to reports from youths and others about suspected predators, says VGT Chairman Jim Gamble, chief executive officer of the United Kingdom's Child Exploitation and Online Protection Center." USA adds, "Investigators can immediately trace a suspect's location through his Internet connection and contact a local police agency to further investigate the case or make an arrest, Gamble says. As authorities have done in anti-child-pornography programs, VGT investigators also will go undercover in chat rooms and on websites where pedophiles are likely to be, he says. … The VGT is one of dozens of ways police and child protection groups try to catch predators and stem the trade in pornographic photos of children. The groups work with Internet service providers and credit card companies to identify websites used to trade such photos. Congress has boosted funding for investigations and prosecutions aimed at child porn."

DOJ_NMG_0094929

Judge Rules Alleged Cuban Spy's Statement To FBI Should Be Admitted. The AP (11/16) reports US Magistrate Judge Barry Garber in Miami "refused Wednesday to throw out a lengthy statement given to the FBI by a college professor charged along with his wife with acting as illegal agents of Cuba's communist government." Garber "ruled that…Carlos Alvarez gave the statements voluntarily, was free to leave the FBI interviews any time and was never promised immunity from prosecution. The statements Alvarez gave to the FBI in summer 2005 are the cornerstone of the federal case." The AP notes, "Alvarez's lawyer will have a chance to contest the ruling before U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore, who is overseeing the case, issues a final decision."

Boston US Attorney's Office Says Reported Bulger Sighting Inconclusive. The Boston Globe (11/16, Murphy, 413K) reports, "The tip sounded like a scene out of a movie: Fugitive gangster James 'Whitey' Bulger was believed to have been spotted at a San Diego theater last month, checking out Jack Nicholson's portrayal of him in the new gangster film, 'The Departed.' … But yesterday, the US attorney's office in Boston, which is overseeing the hunt for Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, said the sighting remains uncorroborated. 'Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego,' Robert Krekorian, executive assistant US attorney, said in a prepared statement. 'At this time, no one has concluded that the individual in question is, in fact, James Bulger.' Krekorian added that, as with every lead in the manhunt, all 'logical and appropriate investigative steps' are being taken."

Federal Agents To Be On Lookout At Funeral For Bulger's Girlfriend's Mother. The Boston Herald (11/16, Sweet, 184K) reports, "The South Boston mother of James 'Whitey' Bulger's girlfriend, Catherine Greig, will be laid to rest today, presumably never to know if her fugitive daughter is dead or alive." Jenit L. Greig "died Monday. … Sources said federal authorities, who have been hunting for Bulger and Greig nearly 12 years, will be watching." The Herald also notes the US attorney's office statement about the sighting report.

Former New Jersey Councilman Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribe. The Newark Star-Ledger (11/16, Martin) reports former West Long Branch Councilman Joseph DeLisa "yesterday admitted taking a $1,500 bribe in an FBI sting, the latest conviction in a long-running investigation of municipal corruption in Monmouth County. … Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc Larkins, DeLisa acknowledged taking the bribe in November 2003 from a cooperating FBI witness posing as a demolition contractor. He said he had been introduced to the contractor by then mayor Paul Zambrano. In return for the money, DeLisa promised his support on no-bid township contracts." The Star-Ledger notes, "Zambrano was the first to enter a plea more than a year ago; he admitted taking $15,000, but has not yet been sentenced." The AP (11/16) adds that DeLisa "could receive as much as 20 years in prison when sentenced in March."

FBI Searches Home Of Philadelphia Labor Leader In Ongoing Tax-Fraud Probe. The Philadelphia Inquirer (11/16, Shiffman, Schaffer, 385K) reports, "Federal agents executed a search warrant at the home of labor union leader John J. Dougherty last week as part of their tax-fraud investigation into a local electrical contractor, sources said. The sources, who declined to be identified because the matter remains under investigation, said agents entered the South Philadelphia home of Dougherty, a possible 2007 mayoral candidate, early Friday morning. Philadelphia FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said she could neither confirm nor deny the raid." The Inquirer notes, "Friday's search represents the most recent turn in the sprawling investigation of the contractor, Donald 'Gus' Dougherty, who is a close friend of but no relation to John Dougherty. … Sources said agents have asked whether electricians' union leaders knew about an alleged scheme by Gus Dougherty to avoid paying federal taxes and union health and pension payments by paying union electricians in cash."

DOJ_NMG_0094930

FBI Joins Corruption Probe Of Kentucky School Official. The Lexington Herald-Leader (11/15, Mueller, 113K) reported, "The FBI has joined a Johnson County grand jury investigation into allegations that a former school district finance director allegedly had her son on the system's payroll while he was in jail." Peggy L. VanHoose "allegedly paid her son, Michael D. VanHoose, thousands of dollars between 2000 and 2005, although he spent 92 weeks of that time in the Big Sandy Regional Detention Center, according to jail records and a recent audit conducted for the school district. Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney David Blankenship said yesterday that an FBI agent had contacted Johnson County prosecutors about the case." The Herald-Leader added, "Meanwhile, a Johnson County grand jury is scheduled to meet Thursday to question witnesses, including new schools Superintendent Steve Trimble, a school board member and VanHoose's former payroll officer, Shelby Jean Coleman."

NYPD, FBI Bust Billion-Dollar Sports Betting Ring. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/16, Hays) reports, "More than two dozen people, including a former professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged Wednesday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books. The massive illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a site called Playwithal.com, run by the poker player, James Giordano, 52, of Pine Crest, Fla., Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown said. A break in the case came last year when New York Police Department investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early Wednesday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortess-like Florida compound." The AP notes, "The scheme involved placing sports bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the restricted Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, car racing and golf."

The Miami Herald (11/16, 286K) reports, "At first, FBI agents and Miami-Dade County police tried to trick Giordano, 52, into letting them onto his property. They phoned him from a call box next to the entrance gate of his walled Pinecrest estate, saying they needed to get in to catch a burglar. He said no. Armed with arrest and search warrants, they then climbed over Giordano's four-foot wall and knocked on his front door. They arrested him about 6 a.m. Tuesday, and he was placed in police custody. FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said FBI agents also searched the South Florida homes of some other suspects and the offices of companies involved." The Washington Post (11/16, E2, 690K) notes, "Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, N.Y., who was identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide."

Newsday (11/16, Parascandola) notes that FBI agents arrested Giordano and reports Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said, "This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered. It rivals casinos for the amount of betting: $3.3 billion over the last 28 months alone. … The suspects in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada have been charged with various counts of enterprise corruption, money laundering, gambling and conspiracy, according to Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, whose office is prosecuting the case because it started in that borough. Seized were gambling records, about $6 million in cash, real estate and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl champion Jets." Also noting the FBI arrest in Florida, the New York Post (11/16, Venezia, Martinez, Livingston, 631K) adds, "Authorities said the ring even had 'wire rooms' in Costa Rica and St. Maarten. It was busted in Queens because authorities there got wind of the operation while investigating a prescription drug resale scheme linked to the Bonanno crime family in 2005." The New York Daily News (11/16, Moore, Shifrel, 729K) also reports the story, under the headline "You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed."

Puerto Rico Secretary Of State Ordered To Turn Over Documents For Fundraising Probe. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (11/16, Robles, 286K) reports, "Puerto Rico's Secretary of State has until Friday to produce documents relating to dozens of people and firms in the latest chapter of a months-long federal probe of donations to a political campaign in 2000 by the current governor. The office of Secretary of State Fernando Bonilla has confirmed that it received a subpoena for all documents…on more than 60 individuals or companies tied to a handful of Philadelphia fundraisers. The fundraisers helped collect campaign contributions for Anibal Acevedo Vila's 2000 race for resident commissioner." McClatchy notes, "FBI San Juan office spokesman Harry Rodriguez said federal law prohibits him from discussing grand jury probes. 'The FBI has jurisdiction to investigate public federal election law violations involving excessive campaign contributions, corporate contributions and conduit contributions made through third parties,' Rodriguez said. 'It is not unusual for these illegal contribution cases to be connected to schemes to corruptly influence elected officials.'"

DOJ_NMG_0094931

California City's Mayor, Administrator Charged With Corruption. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Becerra) reports, "Capping years of investigations into Vernon, Los Angeles prosecutors today filed public corruption charges that accused the small industrial city's longtime mayor of voter fraud and the former city administrator of using public funds for personal use." The Times continues, "The indictment came after decades of complaints by critics that the city south of downtown Los Angeles operates as a fiefdom by leaders, including Mayor Leonis Malburg, who has been in office for more than 50 years. He is the grandson of Vernon's founder." The Times adds, "Most of Vernon's homes are owned by Malburg, other council members and the city. Most of the 91 residents are city employees. .. Prosecutors charged that Malburg has been fraudulently voting in Vernon elections, even though he has long lived in a posh estate in Hancock Park, 20 miles from the gritty city that is home to various manufacturing businesses and factories. … The district attorney's office charged that longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. used $60,000 in city money for personal uses. Makenhorst was the highest paid city official in the state before stepping down two years ago, earning more than $600,000 a year for running a city of fewer than 100 people."

New Evidence Found In New York Murder Case. The New York Times (11/16, Dwyer) reports, "More than two years ago, investigators from the Queens district attorney's office sat in Jaime Acevedo's living room and listened to him describe a night in 1992 -- an instant, really -- that has yet to end." The Times continues, "Mr. Acevedo, seen by the authorities as an ordinary, law-abiding, working man with no reason to lie, said that he knew the inside details on a little-noticed murder in Woodside, one that seemed to have been solved and settled long ago." The Times adds, "Investigators had never spoken with Mr. Acevedo or realized that he knew anything about the case. But in fact, Mr. Acevedo told them, he had unwittingly given the killer a ride to and from the murder scene. The man he named had never been connected or charged with the crime. .. .There was more. .. .Mr. Acevedo said the one person accused and convicted of the murder had nothing to do with it. That man, Joshua Rivera, sentenced to 37 years, had not even been present, according to Mr. Acevedo. … The story did not end there. The district attorney's investigators found another man who told essentially the same story as Mr. Acevedo: he, too, said that he had been in the car with the killer and that Mr. Rivera was not involved." The Times notes, "Two years later, Mr. Rivera, 36, is still serving time for the murder, and the man named as the real killer by the two new witnesses has not been charged. .. .In an era when DNA tests seem to have made unraveling convictions as easy as untying a shoe, Mr. Rivera's case is a reminder that the criminal justice system, by law and custom, generally resists the reopening of jury verdicts, at times even in the face of new evidence that seems strong. … It is also a vivid example of the discretion that prosecutors can exercise in not only bringing cases but also reviewing their outcomes."

Simpson Book On Murders Roundly Condemned. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Abcarian, Miller) reports, "The two abiding emotions that characterized the O.J. Simpson double murder case -- revulsion and fascination -- surfaced again this week when, just in time for November television sweeps, Simpson revealed that he will take part in a two-part Fox television special and release a book that will address how he might have killed his ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend Ron Goldman. … 'If I Did It,' is to be released Nov. 30 by Regan, an imprint of HarperCollins, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. Another division of News Corp, the Fox network, will air a two-part interview with Simpson, conducted by his publisher, Judith Regan, on Monday, Nov. 27 and Wednesday, Nov. 29. In the book and the interviews, according to a statement from HarperCollins, Simpson will give a 'bone-chilling account of the night of the murders,' which took place on June 12, 1994." The Times adds, "As condemnation flowed from victims' families, publishers, broadcasters, bloggers and others involved in the sensational criminal case, Regan defended her decision to publish the book. . 'It's not fiction,' she said Wednesday evening at a dinner for the National Book Awards in New York. As to whether Simpson would agree with that, she replied, 'I don't know.' She sidestepped questions about whether the former football star had approached her, or the other way around, and how he might be paid. But she acknowledged the torrent of criticism already directed at the joint television-book project. … Simpson, who was acquitted of murder, was found responsible for the killings in a subsequent civil trial. The televised trial deeply divided the U.S., often along racial lines, changed the way crime scenes are handled and spawned a new category of TV personality -- the courtroom legal analyst."

CIVIL LAW:

Unions Object To Latest Bonus Plan For Dana Officials. The AP (11/16, Hopkins) reports, "Unions representing Dana Corp. employees say its proposal to pay millions to executives while it plans to cut health care and retiree benefits should be struck down. … 'It is precisely this double standard — insulating executives from the consequences of bankruptcy while workers must cope with harsh, draconian consequences — that Congress sought to eliminate' with the a recent bankruptcy reform act, the unions said in court papers." The AP continues, "The joint objection from the United Autoworkers and United Steelworkers unions comes in the midst of Dana's renewed efforts to get bankruptcy court approval for a long-term incentive plan. … Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on customers General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co. … The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy due to production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers." The AP notes, "Under the proposal, Dana Chief Executive Michael J. Burns will receive up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008. The payments are tied to the achievement of various earnings benchmarks. The payments aren't guaranteed. … Dana's latest proposal is a step down from a previous plan that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection. … The latest proposal is Dana's second attempt to get Judge Burton Lifland to sign off on the bonus plan. He denied the first plan on Sept. 5, saying it clashed with provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay. … The Justice Department has consistently opposed Dana's efforts, and in court papers Tuesday, U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said the company again failed to meet the requirements for bonus payments under the reform act."

DOJ_NMG_0094932

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Man Alleging LAPD Beating Pleads No Contest To Resisting Arrest. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hong, McGreevy, 850K) reports, "The man who was repeatedly punched by a Los Angeles police officer on a video circulated on the Internet struck a plea bargain Wednesday and was released from jail." William Cardenas "pleaded no contest to a misdemeanor charge of resisting, delaying or obstructing an officer." The Times adds, "Asked whether the video had led to the deal, Deputy Dist. Atty Michael Yglecias said: 'I would be lying if I said it didn't.'" However, "LAPD Chief William J. Bratton told Patt Morrison in an interview on KPCC-FM…that he did not think the release of the video, and the widespread exposure that followed, had an effect on Cardenas' getting a reduction in charges." Bratton added, "If anything, the video would show he resisted arrest." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (11/16) notes, "The clip caused a sensation, with 155,000 views, and eventually prompted the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department to investigate. Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property when they confronted him."

Video Shows Third Alleged Excessive Force Case. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Covarrubias, Silverstein, 850K) reports, "The latest in a recent spate of cellphone videos documenting questionable arrest tactics surfaced Wednesday, this one showing a UCLA police officer using a Taser to stun a student who allegedly refused to leave the campus library. Grainy video of the Tuesday night incident at UCLA's Powell Library was broadcast Wednesday on TV news and the Internet, prompting a review of the officers' actions and outrage among students at the Westwood campus. The footage showed the student, Mostafa Tabatabainejad, falling to the ground and crying out in pain as officers stunned him." The Times notes that some witnesses disputed the police account, "saying that when campus police arrived, Tabatabainejad had begun to walk toward the door with his backpack. When an officer approached him and grabbed his arm, the witnesses said, Tabatabainejad told the officer to let go, yelling 'Get off me' several times."

Los Angeles Police Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe. The AP (11/16) reports, "A district attorney's investigation has cleared police officers of wrongdoing in a videotaped incident in which a transient in handcuffs was apparently pepper-sprayed in a police car, police Chief William Bratton said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The February 2005 incident came to light this week when the videotape, shot by a citizen, was released by the man's attorney. … The tape of Benjamin Barker's arrest surfaced on the heels of an 18-second video showing a Los Angeles officer repeatedly punching a suspect in the face while another officer tried to handcuff the man during a struggle on a Hollywood street on Aug. 11." The AP adds, "At a news conference, Bratton cited a Nov. 15, 2005, decision by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office in which prosecutors declined to file any charges against officers in the arrest of Barker, who had been in a scuffle with a Venice merchant. … 'Examination of the videotape clearly shows (the officers) did not use excessive force on Benjamin Barker, nor did they assault him under color of authority,' Bratton said, quoting the decision. 'The officers showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy to Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior.' … The Los Angeles Times reported Tuesday that the tape shows an officer take pepper spray out of a holster, then raise it toward Barker's face, but the actual spraying is obscured by shadows."

Maryland Police, FBI Continue Investigation Into Racist Graffiti Incidents. The Washington Post (11/16, SM3, Morse, 690K) reports, "Local and federal investigators continued this week to probe a string of racist graffiti incidents in Charles County, the latest one occurring at an African American church that had received a bomb threat a week before." Last weekend at the Zion Baptist Church in

DOJ_NMG_0094933

Welcome, "someone had used bright orange paint to spray 'KKK,' 'White Power' and 'Bang Boom' on a roadway leading to the church's parking lot." The Post notes, "In all, there have been 11 such cases in Charles since August. … In September, local officials contacted the FBI, and the agencies have conducted a joint investigation of the incidents since, said Kristen Timko, a sheriff's office spokeswoman. 'Our detectives meet regularly with them,' she said."

NYTimes Says Election Reform Necessary. The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) editorializes, "Last week's elections provided a lot of disturbing news about the reliability of electronic voting," and serious questions about some races "only add to the high level of mistrust that many people already feel about electronic voting." With Democrats in control of Congress, "fortunately, that may be about to change," and "there is an excellent chance of passing tough electronic voting legislation." Election reform "has tended to be a partisan issue," but "Congressional Democrats should make fixing this country's broken system of elections a top priority, and Republicans should join them."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Opens Price-Fixing Probe Of Banks' Municipal Bond Deals. Bloomberg (11/16, Selway, Braun) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice is conducting a criminal investigation into whether banks and brokers conspired to rig the bidding for contracts that U.S. local governments use to invest bond proceeds." Bloomberg continues, "Municipalities purchase guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, with bond money until they need the funds to pay for projects. The contracts are what banks and brokers used to invest at least $7 billion of bond proceeds raised by local governments across the U.S. in the past decade that were never spent, according to an Oct. 4 Bloomberg News report. … 'It's about time,' said Mark Schwartz, a Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania-based lawyer and former head of municipal bonds for Prudential Financial Corp.'s mid-Atlantic region, about the investigation. 'This is an incestuous little business.'" Bloomberg adds, "Dexia SA's Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd. unit today said it was subpoenaed by the U.S. Justice Department as part of the probe by antitrust regulators. Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a GIC broker and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, was searched by Justice Department officials, Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the firm, said. … The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest the money raised in the $2 trillion tax-exempt bond market has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue. … Kathleen Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice, confirmed an 'investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal bond industry.' She declined to provide further detail of the subpoena of Financial Security or whether other subpoenas were issued."

Shareholders Sue Private Equity Firms Alleging Rigged Buyouts. Bloomberg (11/16, Glovin) reports, "Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Carlyle Group, the manager of the biggest U.S. buyout fund, are among 13 private equity firms accused in a class-action lawsuit of rigging the market to take companies private." Bloomberg continues, "The class action was filed in Manhattan federal court by investors who claim they didn't receive full value for their shares because of a conspiracy that violated antitrust laws. … 'Investors in the target company are deprived of the full economic value of their holdings and `squeezed out' at artificially low valuations,' the suit says." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. Justice Department launched an informal antitrust investigation into allegations that private-equity firms collaborated on leveraged buyouts, according to a person familiar with the matter. … The suit alleges violations of federal antitrust laws, which entitle successful plaintiffs to recover triple damages. It seeks to represent tens of thousands of shareholders in dozens of deals in which public companies were taken private."

US Airways Makes $8 Billion Bid For Delta. The Washington Post (11/16, D01, Wilber) reports, "US Airways Group Inc. yesterday launched an $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., a move that would create the nation's largest carrier and possibly trigger other airline mergers in an industry recovering from a major downturn." The Post continues, "US Airways chief executive Doug Parker said combining carriers would boost profit and substantially cut costs by eliminating overlapping work and flights. Parker, who is credited with helping to successfully merge US Airways and America West in 2005, said he wanted to take advantage of Delta's status in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. If he waited until after the carrier exited bankruptcy, it would be harder to jettison unneeded Delta aircraft, he said. … Topping the list of potential obstacles is Delta's management, which isn't excited about any merger. Chief executive Gerald Grinstein sent a memo to employees later in the day, saying he didn't want Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a 'merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline.'"

The New York Times (11/16, Sorkin) reports, "The surprise offer may presage a wave of mergers in the struggling airline industry. While consolidation of companies often leads to higher prices, it is unclear at this point whether this merger would do anything like that. … But any deal for Delta would have to overcome high hurdles, including antitrust scrutiny and a lack of support from Delta's management, which rebuffed advances from US Airways this summer." The Times adds, "In an unusual tack, the unsolicited offer is being made to the creditors of Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy protection — a process that will give Delta management control over any plan to get out of bankruptcy for at least several more months. … Delta said yesterday that it would review the offer. Delta is now the fourth-largest domestic airline and US Airways is No. 5. US Airways said the combined carrier would be bigger than the current leader, American Airlines, and would be called Delta Air Lines. It noted that Delta is a 'very, very powerful' brand worldwide."

DOJ_NMG_0094934

The Financial Times (11/16, Cameron) reports, "Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive, launched his second effort in 18 months to buy a bankrupt carrier and push an enlarged US Airways into the global airline elite. … However, Delta quickly repeated its opposition to the move after rebuffing an approach this year, forcing US Airways to appeal directly to its unsecured creditors." The Times adds, "Mr Parker maintained that the rise of low-cost carriers in the US meant there would be no antitrust issues with the proposed takeover. He intends to close the deal by mid-2007 when Delta aims to emerge from the bankruptcy protection it sought in September last year. The US justice department blocked an attempt by United to acquire the old US Airways in 2000 on competition grounds, scuppering another proposed combination between American and Northwest."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (11/16, Fitzpatrick, Belko) reports, "A longtime cheerleader for industry consolidation, Mr. Parker wants the Delta deal done before the nation's No. 3 carrier emerges from bankruptcy next year, making it easier for the combined company to cut costs, give back planes to lenders, renegotiate contracts and shed unprofitable leases -- just as the twice-bankrupt US Airways did last year while merging with America West Airlines. … After that, 'it will be too late,' he said yesterday. 'We will all regret not acting sooner.'"

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Pae) reports, "If approved — and there are several hurdles to overcome, including federal regulatory approvals — the merger could set off a wave of consolidation in the domestic airline industry, analysts said. … The takeover bid is a fallout of overcapacity in the airline industry that has financially hurt the larger airlines, analysts said. According to the Airline Transport Assn., U.S. commercial airlines have lost $35 billion since 2001, though the industry is recovering and may turn a profit this year. … For its part, Delta said in a statement that it intends to emerge from Bankruptcy Court protection as a stand-alone carrier."

Bloomberg (11/16, Schlangenstein) reports, "A combined US Airways-Delta would retain Delta's name and vault past AMR Corp.'s American Airlines to become the world's largest carrier, as measured by miles flown by paying passengers. By that standard, Delta is the third-largest U.S. airline and US Airways is the seventh-biggest." Bloomberg adds, "The combined airline would be the largest in terms of passengers carried in the northeastern and southeastern U.S. and Florida, and second-biggest in the Southwest, US Airways said. … A merged US Airways-Delta also would have more than 18 percent of the U.S. industry's capacity, US Airways said. Any merger agreement must be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, US Airways shareholders and the court overseeing Delta's bankruptcy."

USA Today (11/16, Adams) reports, "The takeover bid would require the approval of Delta's bankruptcy judge, US Airways' shareholders, Delta's creditors and the U.S. government. And it might not be the only offer for Delta, a potentially attractive target as the USA's third-biggest carrier. … A merger between two such big carriers needs Justice Department approval. The agency would have to determine whether the deal would help or hurt consumers in terms of fares and flight options. Antitrust considerations are particularly strong along the East Coast, where the route networks of both Delta and US Airways are heavily concentrated."

Experts Differ On Antitrust Challenges. The Washington Times (11/16, Lengell) reports, "Under the proposal, the combined airline would serve as many cities as US Airways currently does but with 10 percent fewer flights because some duplicate routes would be eliminated. … The merged company also would sell one of its shuttle operations that operate in the Northeast, mostly between Washington, New York and Boston, to eliminate the overlapping routes and to alleviate antitrust concerns. … But Delta's management has said it is committed to leaving Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in the first half of 2007 as a stand-alone carrier. … 'We received a letter from US Airways [yesterday] morning and will of course review it,' said Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein. But 'our plan is working, and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective.'" The Times notes, "Justice officials declined to comment on the proposal. … But some industry watchers doubt the Justice Department would approve the proposal. … Ray Neidl, an equity analyst for the airline industry, agreed that the merger proposal wouldn't be an easy sell to the Justice Department, saying the offer has a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of rejection."

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, Perez) reports, "While antitrust concerns would be among several hurdles to the combination, Mr. Parker said he didn't think there were any issues that couldn't be resolved. He suggested that either of US Airways' and Delta's competing Northeastern U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0094935

'shuttles,' which connect Boston, New York and Washington, DC, could be put up for sale in order to satisfy antitrust problems. The merger last year of US Airways and America West, Mr. Parker said, shows that mergers 'can be good for investors and consumers.' … US Airways said frequent-flyer customers at the two carriers would have their current mileage balances combined as part of a Delta takeover. But the airlines participate in different global marketing alliances, so US Airways would have to narrow that to a single partnership."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (11/16, Geewax) reports, "If US Airways Group can persuade investors and creditors to accept its unsolicited $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., federal regulators likely will approve the deal as well, analysts said Wednesday. … 'I don't believe there will be any antitrust problems,' said John Pincavage, a longtime airline adviser with Pincavage & Associates." The AJC continues, "US Airways spokeswoman Valerie Wunder said the airline will work with regulatory agencies to free up whatever routes, airport slots and gates might be necessary to eliminate monopoly concerns. 'We are confident any antitrust issue can be resolved,' she said. … Pincavage noted that US Airways has specifically said that the combined company would sell off one of its two lucrative shuttle services linking Boston, New York and Washington to avoid gaining a monopoly in that market." The AJC notes, "To avoid antitrust problems, the Justice Department likely would want the combined carrier to scale back operations at those hubs to make room for competitors. It also might insist on reductions in operations at Delta's hub in Salt Lake City, which is relatively close to US Airways' hubs in Phoenix and Las Vegas. … But Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said it is too soon say exactly which concessions would be required to win approval. … If the proposed takeover were to move forward, 'we would be interested in taking a look at it,' she said. Divestiture decisions then 'would have to be made on a case-by-case basis,' she said."

The Financial Times (11/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "US Airways' hostile bid for Delta will face a tough antitrust review by the Department of Justice, according to Washington experts who say authorities are likely to take into account the companies' concentration of routes along the east coast." The Times continues, "US Air is likely to approach an antitrust probe with an arsenal of arguments to support the proposed deal. … These include the changing dynamics of the troubled airline industry, the fact that it is willing to divest one of the companies' north-east shuttles and that the emergence of cheaper airlines has given passengers more options." The Times notes, "The airline may also highlight proposed synergies of $1.65bn a year - an argument that has resonated in the past with Thomas Barnett, the head of the antitrust division. … But one Washington source with knowledge about such investigations said the division has historically not always been swayed by divestiture offers from airlines, because they may not create enough competition in the marketplace. … Although the justice department would not make an antitrust ruling based on Delta's willingness to be taken over, an unwilling merger partner could offer ammunition to build a case against the deal."

The AP (11/16, Weber) reports, "Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who is set to become chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he is concerned the combination would reduce competition and increase costs for travelers. … 'If the Justice Department on its own does not initiate an antitrust review, I would ask them to do that,' he said."

Deal Could Alter Airline Industry. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, D1, Everson, Mckay) reports, "US Airways Group Inc., which yesterday bid $8.67 billion to acquire Delta Air Lines, believes consolidation would help the troubled airline industry. But in the wake of US Airways' own purchase by America West, it's less clear how much consumers stand to benefit." The Journal continues, "Delta has rejected the offer by US Airways. But if the hostile bid should prove successful, analysts say there could be some advantages for consumers, but also some risks. Users of US Airways frequent-flier miles, for instance, could benefit from having access to Delta's extensive international route system. On the other hand, overlaps in service, especially in some Southern cities where both airlines have major operations, could reduce competition and lead to increased fares. What's more, persistent glitches in the process of integrating US Airways and America West raise concerns about customer service should the Delta bid succeed." The Journal adds, "So far, US Airways has disclosed little about how a takeover of Delta would affect each airline's operations. One exception: One of the two companies' overlapping East Coast shuttle services, which connect Boston, New York and Washington, would probably have to be sold to satisfy antitrust concerns, US Airways says. … Beyond the shuttles, there is significant overlap in the South, with Delta's main hub situated in Atlanta and US Airways having significant operations in Charlotte. The concentration means that 'it would destroy competition in the deep South,' says Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation-industry advisory group in Evergreen, Colo."

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram (11/16, Banstetter) reports, "Imagine booking a flight on Americanorthwest Airlines, an aviation behemoth with six domestic hubs and unmatched service to Asia, Latin America and Europe. .. Or flying on United-Continental Airways (or perhaps Continental United Airlines, or even UniCont Air), a powerhouse in the West and on the East Coast. And for a low-fare trip, you could check prices on FronTranBlue. … The airline industry is buzzing over those potential airline combinations and more, after US Airways sparked the latest round of merger speculation Wednesday with a hostile bid to take over the bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion in cash and stock." The Star-Telegram adds, "The chatter sent airline stocks soaring, despite warnings from some experts that industry consolidation is likely to move slowly and that any US Airways-Delta deal faces significant challenges. Delta executives said they weren't interested, and even if creditors sign on, a merger would receive intense scrutiny from regulators and the Justice Department. … And some analysts pointed to the industry's record of failed airline mergers. … 'It's a terrible idea,' said consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group of Evergreen, Colo. 'It's a bad deal for the customers, the employees, for everybody, really, except the financial types.'"

DOJ_NMG_0094936

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/16) editorializes, "The nation's airline industry has been in a gradual recovery lately. But US Airways Group Inc.'s announced bid to acquire Delta Air Lines Inc. promises to set off a needed consolidation of the business that will make it better able to weather the next financial downturn. Let's hope federal regulators don't block such a transformation this time around. … That's precisely what happened in 2001 when the Department of Justice ill-advisedly blocked the merger of US Airways and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines on antitrust grounds. The airline industry then had to confront an economic slowdown and the post-9/11 trauma with excess capacity, losing billions of dollars. Since 2002, four major U.S. airlines have sought bankruptcy protection; two (Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp.) are currently in Chapter 11." The Times adds, "The federal government should carefully review the deal if it goes forward, as well as any other such mergers. (Continental Airlines Inc. and Northwest have been eyeing each other for years, and United Chief Executive Glenn Tilton has been a vocal advocate of more aggressive consolidation in the industry.) Some routes will need to be dropped, some gates surrendered to competitors. … But regulators need to recognize that the industry is changing. The country needs fewer first-tier coast-to-coast airlines with a broader reach at home and abroad. … If Congress really wants to help consumers and shore up the financial health of airlines, it should allow the entry of foreign carriers and investors, which it has repeatedly declined to do. This is a global industry, after all."

DOJ Subpoenas Micron Technology In SRAM Price-Fixing Probe. The Idaho Statesman (11/16, Dey) reports, "Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed Micron Technology in an investigation into possible price-fixing of static random access memory, or SRAM, by semiconductor companies. This week, Micron was also named with more than 20 other semiconductor companies in a price-fixing lawsuit filed in Boise." The Statesman continues, "The lawsuit, filed Tuesday on behalf of Idaho residents Mark Alon Davis and Kenneth W. Herbert, alleges that between Jan. 1, 1998 and Dec. 31, 2005 the companies agreed to combat declines in prices for SRAM — a type of memory used in computers and electronic products — by manipulating the wholesale price. The lawsuit alleges the manipulation ultimately led to higher prices of consumer electronic products that used SRAM." The Statesman adds, "Micron confirmed in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it received a subpoena Oct. 11 related to the investigation. … 'Micron believes that it is not a target of the investigation and will fully cooperate with the Department of Justice,' Micron said today in a statement to the Idaho Statesman. 'Micron will vigorously defend against any civil class action cases that are filed.' … The Justice Department hasn't said what period its SRAM investigation covers, but a similar department investigation of alleged dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, price fixing covered 1999 to 2002. Micron has cooperated with the Justice Department in that investigation."

Inouye Says Senate Commerce Committee To Review AT&T-BellSouth Merger. The San Antonio Express-News (11/16, Nowlin) reports, "The next chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee said San Antonio-based AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp. needs more scrutiny and should be the focus of a hearing when Democrats assume control of Congress in January." The Express-News continues, "Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman, told reporters late Tuesday that his committee should take a look at the telecommunications megamerger. He said he would like the Federal Communications Commission to delay approval until after the hearing. … 'We'd like to know what the impact would be,' Inouye said. 'I think the people of the United States would like to know.'" The Express-News adds, "The hearing will take place, a spokesperson for Inouye later said, whether or not the FCC approves the merger by the end of the year. … Investors appear to be bracing for what the congressional power shift means for AT&T. .. .Company shares dropped 1.52 percent to $32.46 on Wednesday on concern the new Congress will bring a less-friendly regulatory environment for the telecom giant. … The shift comes on top of investor worries that the FCC has three times delayed a vote on the deal. … Although the Justice Department and 18 state bodies have cleared the AT&T-BellSouth deal, it's still awaiting a nod from the FCC, the last regulatory agency needed to approve it. The commission's two Republican and two Democratic commissioners are divided over what conditions to apply to the deal."

EU Says Microsoft Has Not Supplied Data In Antitrust Probe. The AP (11/16, White) reports,

DOJ_NMG_0094937

"Microsoft Corp. still has not supplied the 'complete and accurate' documentation necessary to comply with a 2004 antitrust order, European Union regulators said Wednesday. They warned that new fines could be imposed unless Microsoft supplies full information by Nov. 23." The AP continues, "The European Commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for not providing the technical information, said it expects 'the remaining omissions and deficiencies' to be remedied quickly. … 'Our patience is finite,' EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. 'Until we have the whole set of documents, it's worth nothing.'" The AP adds, "Microsoft said it already had made "very significant progress" in improving the information it has given regulators, which aims to help rivals make server software that works smoothly with its desktop operating system Windows. … 'We stand ready to do any additional work that is required to comply with the commission's decision,' Microsoft said. … But the EU's executive arm said that what Microsoft has done so far is not enough and that there are still problems with the technical manual that will eventually be turned over to rivals to check before Microsoft can get the all-clear."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Group Sues Administration Over Global Warming Report. The AP (11/16, Chea) reports, "Environmentalists sued the Bush administration for failing to produce a report on global warming's impact on the United States' environment, economy and public health." The AP continues, "Tuesday's lawsuit seeks to compel the U.S. Climate Change Science Program to issue the national assessment, which should contain the most recent scientific data on global warming and projections for its future impacts. The plaintiffs claim the government must complete such a report every four years under the Global Change Research Act of 1990. … 'Global warming is one of the most serious threats facing humanity today,' according to the complaint. Without the report, decision makers and the public 'are without one of the most important tools to grapple with this complex, potentially overwhelming and yet all important issue.'" The AP notes, "The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, which was named in the lawsuit, had not received the complaint Tuesday and could not comment on it, said spokesman Ben Fallon. … But Fallon defended the administration's record on combating global warming, pointing to increased funding for alternative energy research and partnerships with other countries."

9th Circuit Panel Asked To Rescind EPA Field-Burning Policy. The AP (11/16, Johnson) reports, "The dense plumes of smoke that arise when grass-seed farmers in Idaho burn their fields cause asthma in children, reduce visibility on highways and actually kill people, but the Environmental Protection Agency did not study those effects before changing a federal rule to allow such fires, a lawyer for a clean-air group told judges Wednesday. … 'The smoke from this burning is so thick it sends people to the hospital,' attorney David Baron told the three-judge panel from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, where such cases are heard." The AP continues, "Baron represents Safe Air For Everyone, a Washington and Idaho clean-air group, as well as the American Lung Association, which sued late last year to undo the EPA's rule change on the grounds that the agency made the decision without first studying what the effects would be." The AP adds, "Kentucky bluegrass seed grown in northern Idaho is shipped across the nation to be used in landscaping and golf courses. Farmers contend they must burn the stubble left on fields to improve the production of the next year's crop and control pests. The smoke often drifts into neighboring states and Canada. … Hundreds of doctors have signed petitions seeking an end to the burning, saying their patients suffer ill effects from the dense smoke; in 2000, a coroner determined that a Rathdrum, Idaho, woman died from inhaling it. Clean-air groups argue that a 1998 decision to ban grass-field burning in Washington state has not harmed the seed industry. … The field burning has gone on for years in Idaho, where it is allowed under state law but historically not under the federal plan for Idaho established under the Clean Air Act. Last year, after health groups threatened to sue farmers for burning fields, the EPA changed the plan for Idaho, saying it had intended to allow grass-field burning all along."

USDA Reports Says 12% In US Have "Very Low Food Security." The Washington Post (11/16, A01, Williamson, 690K) reports that in an annual report, the USDA said "that 12 percent of Americans -- 35 million people -- could not put food on the table at least part of last year." Eleven million of them "reported going hungry at times," and "beginning this year, the USDA has determined 'very low food security' to be a more scientifically palatable description for that group." The report suggests that the USDA "scrap the word hunger, which 'should refer to a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness, or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation.'"

Senate Approves New Mexico Tribal Land Settlement. The AP (11/16) reports from Albuquerque, "The Senate has passed a $40 million settlement negotiated by Isleta Pueblo and the federal government over past mismanagement of tribal land. … The measure, unanimously approved by the Senate on Monday, now heads to President Bush for his consideration." The AP continues, "The pueblo sued the government, seeking compensation for damages to its land south of Albuquerque. The pueblo, the Interior Department and the U.S. Justice Department spent years reviewing the claims and reached agreement in June on how to resolve the matter." The AP adds, "The legislation establishes a natural resources fund of more than $32 million for the pueblo to use to restore agricultural, range and forestry property. The measure also authorizes $7.2 million, but that money is subject to administration budgeting and the federal appropriations process. … Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said the legislation, once signed by the president, will allow Isleta Pueblo to improve drainage on its agricultural lands and rehabilitate lands damaged by trespass grazing and excessive logging."

DOJ_NMG_0094938

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

FBI Arrests Alleged Philadelphia Mob Soldiers On Drug Trafficking Charges. The Philadelphia Daily News (11/16, Caparella, 106K) reports that "after a four-year rebuilding phase in Philadelphia and South Jersey, organized crime is making a comeback in federal court. Today, reputed mob soldier Damion Canalichio, 37, once a top aide to jailed mob underboss Steve Mazzone, will seek bail on federal drug-trafficking charges, according to his attorney Joseph Santaguida." Canalichio "and his sidekick, Christopher Cerr, 36, of Glenolden, were arrested yesterday without incident by FBI agents in South Jersey and in Delaware County." The Daily News notes, 'During a one-month investigation by FBI agent John Augustine, the two allegedly sold" more than 300 grams of cocaine "in South Philadelphia, according to the indictment."

Detroit Man Accused Of Causing 2 Heroin-Laced Fentanyl Deaths. The AP (11/16) reports federal prosecutors "charged a Detroit man with causing the deaths of two people by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl, a combination blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year. James E. Coleman, 36, was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death."

The Detroit News (11/15) reports, "They are the first such state or federal charges in connection with the street sale of fentanyl-laced heroin in the Detroit area in 2005-06, which killed an estimated 133 drug users between September and July."

Track Coach To Be Arraigned In BALCO Case. USA Today (11/16) reports, Trevor Graham, who "triggered the BALCO steroid scandal, is expected to appear in federal court Thursday in San Francisco for his arraignment on a three-count indictment. Graham, a high-profile coach whose track athletes have accumulated medals as well as drug positives, is accused of lying to federal investigators three times in BALCO inquiries."

Michigan Bikers To Serve Prison Time For Making Meth. The AP (11/15) reports several people "affiliated with a biker gang will face prison time for a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Prosecutors describe it as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. Seven individuals from the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months."

The Detroit Free Press (11/15) reports a similar story.

Port Huron, Michigan's Times-Herald (11/15) reports, "In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, the Algonac area and Chesterfield Township revealed labs frequently had been relocated."

City Councils In California Seek To Ban Marijuana Dispensaries. The Tri Valley Herald (11/15, Foley) reports Livermore city "are moving forward with plans to permanently ban medical marijuana dispensaries. An existing moratorium is scheduled to expire Sept. 11, 2007, after the council voted to extend it two months ago. City officials say that the City Council didn't want to wait until the last minute to make a permanent decision. … On Monday, a handful of opponents urged the council to show restraint, reminding them that with Congress shifting to Democratic control that federal marijuana laws might change."

Torrance, California's Daily Breeze (11/15) reports, "Weeks after ordering two medical marijuana dispensaries to close, the Gardena City Council imposed a moratorium on such facilities Tuesday night. … The council passed the 45-day moratorium with little fanfare on Tuesday night. The temporary ban will give the city's planning staffers time to draft permanent regulations."

Report: Mexican Cartels Step-Up Meth Operations Following US Crackdown On Labs. On its Web site, ABC News (11/15) reports Mexican drug-trafficking cartels "have moved in to fill the void left by the successful crackdown on small methamphetamine labs across the United States, and the foreign traffickers have brought the highly addictive drug into parts of the country where it was rarely seen before, according to a new report by the National Drug Intelligence Center. … DEA officials believe that five main Mexican drug cartels have increased operations in the United States. Mexican drug-trafficking organizations have 'gained considerable strength and greatly expanded their presence in drug markets throughout the country, even in many smaller communities in Midwestern and Eastern states,' said the report." Since 2004, there "have been fewer U.S.-based labs, judging from the DEA's seizure data. 'We've had a significant reduction in domestic labs, with Mexican [drug trafficking organizations] filling the void,' one DEA official, who requested anonymity, told ABC News." The DEA "has engaged in a series of training programs with Mexican law enforcement agencies to try to dismantle their networks."

DOJ_NMG_0094939

Heroin Use Increasing Among Painkiller Abusers. In its report, ABC News also says the threat assessment "notes that the Mexican groups have the 'ability to advance Mexican heroin beyond traditional Western state heroin markets.' … The assessment also found that heroin use has increased among some drug addicts who abuse prescription painkillers."

The Washington Times/UPI (11/16) reports larger amounts of drugs "are coming into the United States from Mexico, Colombia and Asia," according to the National Drug Intelligence Center. The center "said organizations producing ice methamphetamine in Mexico have expanded their presence throughout the United States. … Rates of prescription drug abuse top those of other drugs, except marijuana, but the center said law enforcement agencies have had recent success in reducing illegal use of prescription drugs. However, that has caused some addicts to substitute drugs such as heroin for prescription narcotics."

Canada-Based Traffickers Expand Reach. The Canadian Press (11/16) reports, "Asian drug traffickers based in Canada have gained control over most of the Ecstasy distribution in the United States and expanded their reach, said an American drug report released Wednesday. The National Drug Threat Assessment by the U.S. Justice Department also said the production of high-potency marijuana in Canada is a problem, although marijuana use has declined slightly."

Canada's Globe and Mail (11/16) writes, "Canadian-based Asian crime syndicates have become the No. 1 distributors of ecstasy in the United States, according to a new report released yesterday. The business of Vietnamese and other Asian gangs, who started out by growing the popular form of marijuana known as B.C. Bud, has boomed, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. … It adds that in the United States 'an estimated $5.2-billion (U.S.) to $21.2-billion is generated through the wholesale distribution of marijuana and MDMA [Ecstasy] by Canada-based [drug-trafficking organizations], and much of the illegal drug proceeds are transported in bulk' back to Canada."

Surrender Program Allows "Favorable Consideration" To Fugitives. USA Today (11/16, Wagner, Collom) reports, "Sean White, wanted on criminal warrants for a probation violation and failure to appear in court, went to church Wednesday morning to get right with the law. … The 32-year-old man was among the 120 suspects who turned themselves in during the first four hours of Fugitive Safe Surrender." USA continues, "The program, which ends Saturday, basically is an invitation from federal and state authorities who are telling fugitives they might receive 'favorable consideration' by turning themselves in at a makeshift justice center at Pilgrim Rest Baptist Church. … Doug Weiner, a former Cuyahoga County, Ohio, prosecutor and co-founder of Fugitive Safe Surrender, said the long-term goal is to conduct programs nationwide. Plans already are underway for ones in Indianapolis; Rochester, N.Y.; Akron, Ohio; and Richmond, Va." USA adds, "David Gonzales, U.S. Marshal for Arizona, said the program gives suspects a chance to deal with criminal warrants at a neutral site, which cuts costs for the public and reduces the chance of a dangerous situation for law officers. … Defendants who show up at the Phoenix church find public defenders to represent them and judges to conduct hearings. Often, when fugitives are caught in traffic stops or tracked down by agents, they face the humiliation of being handcuffed in front of family and the hassle of going straight to jail. … Under Safe Surrender, Gonzales said, most of those wanted for non-violent offenses will be processed within hours and released without going behind bars. The fugitives who turned themselves in Wednesday morning were suspects in cases involving drunken driving, disorderly conduct and failure to pay fines."

IMMIGRATION:

ICE Arrests 29 Muslim Immigrants For Religious Worker Visa Fraud. USA Today (11/16, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Federal agents on Wednesday arrested 29 people, mostly Pakistanis, who allegedly posed as Muslim religious workers to obtain special visas to enter the USA. The immigrants, arrested in Boston; New York City; Buffalo; Hartford, Conn.; Atlanta; St. Paul; Newark, N.J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D.C., and Harrisburg, Va., face civil immigration charges and could be deported if they are found to have violated federal law, said Marc Raimondi, spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement." ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said that "the immigrants paid fees, sometimes several thousand dollars, for the fraudulent paperwork." USA notes, "The immigrants arrested Wednesday worked at non-religious jobs, Raimondi said. Among them: gas station attendant, truck driver and factory worker."

DOJ_NMG_0094940

DHS IG Says Virtual Border Fence Could Cost Up To $30 Billion. The Washington Post (11/16, A10, Hsu, Witte, 690K) reports DHS Inspector General Richard L. Skinner said yesterday that the agency's Secure Border Initiative program, which would create "virtual fence" along US borders, "is likely to cost far more than the $2 billion that industry analysts initially estimated, possibly up to $30 billion," providing a new source of skepticism in "the national debate to curb illegal immigration, which has focused in large part on gaining control of the borders. … Immigration-policy experts said the red flags raised over the border-security initiative could increase pressure on Congress to act on other measures they say are needed, such as stepping up enforcement against US employers who hire illegal workers, cracking down on immigrants who overstay their visas, and overhauling legal immigration channels." Meanwhile, "Gregory Giddens, director of the DHS Secure Border Initiative program, and Deborah J. Spero, deputy commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said cost estimates are premature because the administration has not settled on a strategy or decided what it will buy."

Tancredo Says Democrats Will Not Build Physical Fence. Rep. Tom Tancredo, appearing on MSNBC's Situation Room (11/15, Carlson) said a border fence is "an easy thing for people to understand. They know what the fence is all about. And when the Democrats stop this, we're going to be out on the stump about it -- certainly I will. And people understand this. It's clear. They're not going to build the fence. They come up with the stuff about: 'Oh, don't worry, we're going to have sensors and monitors.' Hogwash. You can have sensors and monitors across 2,000 miles, that's not going to stop anybody from coming. We can't get to them quick enough. You need a fence."

Congress To Restart Immigration Reform Debater. The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 8, 2:55, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Congress will once again debate whether to start a guest worker program which would allow more immigrants to work here temporarily. President Bush and House Speaker in waiting Nancy Pelosi both say it's urgently needed," but as Bill Whitaker reports, "finding the votes won't be easy." CBS (Whitaker) added, "We have Democrats who will not vote for anything that has a new temporary worker program in it. We have Republicans who will not vote for anything that has a broad-ranging legalization program in it. But now, with the President and presumed House leader Nancy Pelosi both wanting a guest worker program and both parties eager to win alienated Latino voters, the time might be right for immigration reform."

Manuel A. Miranda writes in a column for The Hill (11/16), "We all need to take a deep breath and start working for a reform short on slogans and Band-Aid solutions and long on far-sighted policy." He says that achieving "a cohesive reform requires abandoning Band-Aid solutions." Exit polls" show that 57 percent of voters want to offer a legal status to illegal immigrants, while 38 percent want to deport them." The White House "needs to give up the guest-worker program as the only solution, and congressional leaders on each side must distance themselves from the simplistic desires of their supporters." He adds, that no one could "reasonably disagree with placing security and employment enforcement first," and "political reality suggests that there will be no solution that disguises an amnesty or fails to legalize millions, but there will be no cohesive reform if millions today translate into tens of millions tomorrow."

More Commentary. Mark Krikorian, executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, writes in USA Today (11/16, 19A, 2.27M), "President Bush and his Democratic allies on immigration are pointing to the results of last week's elections as a mandate for what they call "comprehensive" reform — but what most people would rightly call amnesty for illegal aliens." He suggests "there is a third way, and that is the approach embodied in the bill passed nearly a year ago by the House," called "attrition through enforcement." This policy "would strictly enforce immigration laws (something we have never tried) so as to limit new illegal settlement and cause illegal immigrants already here to go home over time." The result would be "an annual decrease in the illegal population," and research by Center for Immigration Studies show that this approach "could cut the illegal population by half in five years, requiring only a modest increase in resources and using only normal law-enforcement tools."

TAX:

WPost Says Democrats Should Back Tax Reform. The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) editorializes, "The midterm elections were in part a repudiation of Republican economic priorities. The economy has grown strongly for five years even though it is slowing now, but the fruits of prosperity have not been shared widely. … Raising the federal minimum wage makes sense because it is so low that lifting it probably won't hurt job creation. Beyond that, Democrats need to come up with policies that address inequality while not damaging growth, starting perhaps with tax reform. The existing system of tax breaks for savings, homeownership and health care favors the wealthy while draining billions from the government. Restructuring these tax breaks could shrink the deficit while freeing money for Democratic spending plans. Moreover, the Bush administration is on record as supporting tax reform. Here is an opportunity to make bipartisan progress: in a word, to govern."

DOJ_NMG_0094941

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Resubmit Six Judicial Nominees. The New York Times (11/16, Lewis) reports, "White House officials said Wednesday that President Bush would renominate six of his earlier choices to sit on the federal appeals court, leaving Democratic senators and other analysts to ponder what message he is sending." The Times continues, "At least four of the nominations have been declared dead on arrival in the Senate by Democrats who have consistently opposed them as unacceptable. All six nominations will remain before the Senate through the lame-duck session of Congress and then will expire. … When the 110th Congress is seated in January, Mr. Bush can deliver another list of judicial nominees to the Senate, which will by then have a Democratic majority." The Times adds, "Mr. Bush's motive in sending up the nominations has been closely analyzed, with several Democrats and liberals labeling it as provocative and a sign that he does not intend to seek compromise as he suggested he would after Republican losses in the elections last week. … The four nominees whose chances of confirmation are viewed as nearly impossible are: William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's general counsel who was involved in setting many of the interrogation policies for detainees; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association. … The other nominees, who have not aroused as much opposition, are N. Randy Smith, a district judge in Idaho, and Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the civil division of the Justice Department."

The AP (11/16, Barrett) reports, "Under Senate rules the nominations must be resubmitted after Congress takes an extended break, as was the case this year for the 2006 election. … 'Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request,' said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Judiciary Committee. 'For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base, rather than an indication of things to come.'"

Bloomberg (11/16, Rowley) reports, "The Judiciary Committee's current chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, said yesterday, 'It is obvious that they cannot move' through the Senate before the Democrats take control."

The Washington Post (11/16, A3, Baker, 690K) says all six nominees were "previously blocked" by Democrats, and adds the move is "triggering the first real battle with ascendant Democrats since the midterm elections and signaling what could be the start of a fierce two-year struggle over the shape of the federal judiciary." Bush's decision "heartened conservatives who worried that Bush would scale back his ambition to move courts to the right and outraged liberals, who called it a violation of the spirit of bipartisanship promised since Democrats captured Congress. Both sides saw it as a possible harbinger for the remainder of Bush's presidency, particularly if a Supreme Court vacancy opens."

The Washington Times (11/16, Dinan, Hurt, 88K) reports Republicans said the nominations were "a signal…Bush will fight over judges even under Democratic control." The Times notes that "in addition to the six resubmissions -- needed because the nominees had been automatically returned to the White House during the October recess -- Mr. Bush also sent over four new nominees." The new nominees "are James Edward Rogan to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, Benjamin Hale Settle to the District Court for the Western District of Washington and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott Wallace Stucky to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces." A "Republican aide, who…asked not to be identified," said, "There is zero, zip, zilch chance of any of these judges making it through the Senate killing fields in the waning days. … Without a plan for successful confirmation from the White House, the only point is to fly the flag as the judicial-confirmation ship slips beneath the waves. Burble, gurgle."

Congress Passes Stopgap Spending Bill. The AP (11/16, Taylor) reports, "Congress passed a bill Wednesday that keeps open those agencies awaiting approval of their budgets as lawmakers seek a deal on lots of unfinished fiscal business. The temporary spending measure sped through the House and Senate on voice votes. Without passage, 13 Cabinet agencies would have had to close down Friday at midnight. When President Bush signs the bill, the government will remain open through Dec. 8." The AP adds "there are divisions among Republican over whether to even try to advance the spending bills. Without GOP unity, it will be virtually impossible to do so. That raises the prospect that Democrats will have to tackle the difficult task after taking control of Congress in January."

Democrats Who Opposed Gates In 1991 Said To Face Dilemma. The Hill (11/16, Schor) reports Senate Democrats "could find themselves walking a fine line as the chamber takes up" the nomination of Robert Gates to lead the Pentagon, "weighing the value of regime change at the Pentagon after six stormy years of Secretary Donald Rumsfeld against their new position of power as an incoming majority." The "dozen sitting Democrats who voted against Gates when he took over as CIA director in 1991 face a particular challenge." The first of the 12 "to reveal that he would reverse an old vote against Gates" was Sen. Joseph Biden, who said this week that "a desire to change course in Iraq would overcome his former skepticism." Biden said, "To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there."

DOJ_NMG_0094942

Seniors Said To Face Confusing Choices For Medicare Drug Plan. ABC World News (11/15, story 8, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "It is time, again, for older Americans to sign up for a Medicare drug plan. Most remember the confusion just a few months ago of choosing between dozens of very different plans. Well now, 43 million senior citizens, eligible for the drug benefit have to enroll for 2007. And there is no prospect that it's going to be any easier." ABC (Stark) added, "Those who've studied next year's options warn that seniors need to look closely at the fine print." Ron Pollack, Families USA: "The premium is likely to be different. What drugs are covered are different. Other out-of-pocket costs will be different. What drugstore you can go to may be different." Stark: "More than three-quarters of the plans will increase premiums next year, some more than 25%. Premiums for the most widely used plan, sponsored by AARP, jump 6%. Those for the second-most popular, from Humana, go up 60%. Melvin London is angry his monthly premium for his Humana plan will nearly triple next year." Humana "insists, even with the increase, it still has among the lowest premiums. Seniors have until the end of the year to sign up or switch plans. But the government is urging them not to wait until the last minute. Saying it's better to sign up early, making sure there is no interruption in coverage." Leslie Norwalk, Center for Medicare & Medicaid Services: "They should make that choice, and hopefully early. We say December 8th. Don't be late." Stark: "That leaves just three weeks for seniors to make a decision that will impact them for the next 12 months."

Lott Elected Senate Minority Whip. In what ABC World News (11/15, story 9, 0:25, Gibson, 8.78M) called a "remarkable comeback," Sen. Trent Lott yesterday was elected Senate Minority Whip. The Hill (11/16, Schor) reports Lott bested Sen. Lamar Alexander "by 25 votes to 24." The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A6, Rogers, 2.04M) reports that for President Bush, "the Mississippian's return could be a mixed blessing. Mr. Lott blamed the White House for contributing to his ouster, but he brings a set of legislative skills that the administration sorely needs to move its agenda in the new Democratic-controlled Congress." USA Today (11/16, Nichols, Kiely, 2.27M) describes Lott as "a blunt White House critic," and notes President Bush called him "from Air Force One to offer congratulations after Lott won the GOP's minority whip job over Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, who had predicted victory Tuesday night. 'We have a lot of important priorities to work on and as the president told Sen. Lott, he very much looks forward to working with him,' White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said." Lott "stepped down as Senate majority leader in 2002 after he suggested the nation would have been better off if then-senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run as a segregationist 'Dixiecrat.' Since then, Lott has not shied from criticizing the White House."

The AP (11/16, Kellman) reports Vice President Dick Cheney also called Lott to congratulate him, and "a few hours later, Cheney again delivered an atta-boy in person during a GOP policy lunch. So did White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolton." The AP adds, "Lott's redemption had begun -- just four years after the same White House helped engineer his ouster as the party's Senate leader. It must have been sweet." Lott "did little to hide his resentment during his exile from the party's top Senate ranks." Now he is "powerful enough to get the White House's attention once again."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Neuman, 850K) reports "the vote within the Republican caucus could also reflect unhappiness with President Bush for engineering the switch to Frist, who was not considered a strong leader."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 7, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) also noted Lott's "big comeback," while NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 6, Williams, 9.87M) referred to the senator's "stunning victory," and went on to show a clip of the comments that got Lott in trouble in 2002: "When Strom Thurman ran for President, we voted for him. We are proud of him. If the rest of the country followed our lead we would not have had all of these problems."

Outgoing Maryland Lt. Gov Michael Steele was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer) about Lott's controversial comments on Thurmond. Steele said, "I think he asked for forgiveness and received it from the party and from the country. And I think he's going to make a good leader in the Senate. … You can't hold stuff like that against him. It was a birthday event, you know? The guy's sitting there in the chair. What are you going to say? You say nice things. You get caught up in the moment. Folks know where his heart is, and I think he's going to be a good leader in the Senate."

Roll Call (11/16, Billings, Pierce) says Lott proved himself "once again to be the master vote-counter the job requires." Roll Call adds, "In signature Lott style, the veteran Senator was able to win by corralling a solid base of support, picking off a number of Alexander's backers and working his candidacy right up to the Wednesday-morning vote. Lott was seen walking into the Old Senate chambers talking with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), whom several GOP Senate aides characterized as one of the few remaining undecided lawmakers." CQ (11/16) notes Alexander "announced a week ago that he had lined up more than 25 votes -- a majority of his caucus. But secret ballot elections for leadership posts are notorious for wrecking all advance nose counts."

DOJ_NMG_0094943

The New York Times (11/16, Leibovich, 1.16M) reports, "In their rehabilitation campaign, Senate Republicans will rely heavily on a man whose recent history is itself a testament to sudden falls, unlikely recoveries and the fickle hands of fortune in American politics. … Usually, the choice of a whip, a vital but unglamorous job, would draw little attention. But the election of Mr. Lott offers an unlikely study in professional redemption. 'One thing that this proves is that the United States Senate, like the American public, likes a comeback story,' said" Sen. Alexander. Sen. John McCain, Republican of Arizona, "who was said to be an important supporter of Mr. Lott, added, 'He paid a pretty high price for the statement he made.'"

The Washington Post (11/16, A4, Babington, 690K) says "Lott's feat ranks among the more impressive political comebacks of recent times, just as his fall from grace in December 2002 was spectacular and painful." The Post adds, "As GOP senators emerged from their closed-door meeting at the Capitol yesterday, several said the shock of last week's results prompted wavering colleagues to vote for Lott, who has spent 34 years in Congress (to Alexander's four), and much time negotiating deals and crafting compromises."

McClatchy (11/16, Talev) reports that "as expected, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky was chosen unanimously for the top job of Senate minority leader, beginning in January." The Senate GOP leadership team "represents a return to pragmatism. They're seasoned GOP parliamentarians who are expected to cross party lines and buck the White House more often than did" Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, "who concentrated more on pleasing the president and the Republican Party base that's key to his presidential hopes for 2008." McConnell and Lott "are Senate traditionalists, and while both are conservative partisans, they also know how to cut deals to get things done."

The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M), in an editorial focusing on the Democratic house leadership dispute, says "the Republicans' defeat at the polls has sparked decidedly Transylvanian initiatives: Mr. Lott, who tripped from power over racially charged remarks he made in a fit of Dixiecrat nostalgia, has returned to new life as No. 2 in the minority leadership."

Alexander Says Loss Will Enable Him To Be More Independent. The Nashville City Paper (11/16, Allen), under the headline "Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents," reports that Alexander "had said as late as Tuesday night that he had 27 of the 49 Republican votes. … Saying that last minute 'changes or switches are not unusual,' Alexander explained that he was likely beaten by a delayed backlash against those," including Frist, "who helped orchestrate Lott's ouster as Majority Leader four years ago. 'One of the senators said to me at lunch that this was about redemption. Some senators felt as though [Lott] was treated unfairly four years ago and wanted to give him a second chance,'" said Alexander. Alexander said that he "believes his loss will free him up to vote his conscience on issues, rather than fight for party votes. 'I'm a pretty independent fellow, anyway,'" Alexander said, adding, "And having my independence increased on the issues I care about the most appeals to me a lot."

Senate Republicans Assess Election Outcome, Future Strategy. The Hill (11/16, Bolton) reports, "Newly elected Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) convened his new leadership team for the first time late yesterday afternoon to take stock of its party's recent setback at the polls and to plot the future." The new GOP leaders "discussed next month's leadership retreat and the importance of keeping open the channels of communication among themselves, but they did not discuss in depth how to handle the few remaining weeks of the Republican majority. Leaving Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in charge of next month's agenda has created somewhat of a leadership vacuum in a growing split within the Senate GOP conference over spending priorities." Incoming GOP whip Sen. Trent Lott said, "We might have an opinion, but others are in charge right now." The Hill adds that earlier in the afternoon, "the entire Republican conference met to assess last week's election and discuss what they hoped to accomplish before turning power over to the Democrats. Behind closed doors, frustrated Republicans voiced concern that they lost six seats because they have drifted away from their core principles, said participants." Republican senators "are distressed that the GOP is no longer regarded as the party of fiscal discipline, an anxiety that is fueling a debate over how to handle the pending appropriations bills."

House GOP Whip Candidates Outline Strategies To Retake Majority. The Hill (11/16, O'Connor) reports House Republicans have "already begun mapping their attack strategy for the next two years." GOP leadership candidates have "highlighted their plans to hammer the incoming Democratic majority for ethical lapses, fiscal irresponsibility and legislative mismanagement, borrowing from a playbook those same Democrats used with great success to unseat the Republican majority." Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), "who is locked in a tight race with Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to retain his post in the next Congress, released a detailed roadmap yesterday to unify Republicans on tough votes, offer viable alternatives to Democratic bills on the floor and target potentially vulnerable Democrats on every tough vote." Blunt is "trying to make his procedural knowledge a big advantage over Shadegg heading into a potentially tight election with the Arizona conservative." In the strategy memo, "entitled '24 Months to a New Republican Majority — A Plan for Victory,' Blunt outlined 60 Democratic seats carried by President Bush in 2004 where Republican leaders will apply pressure either to flip Democrats on the floor or punish them in campaign materials for voting with party leaders." Blunt "outlines amendments he would offer to projected votes implementing pay-go rules in the budget process, raising the minimum wage and allowing the federal government to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, each of which is expected to be part of package offered by Democrats in the first 100 hours of their majority." Shadegg also "offered members his own broad vision statement yesterday in which he promises to work with the next chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee to hold freshman Democrats accountable for the campaign promises they made during the last cycle."

DOJ_NMG_0094944

On CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Blitzer), Shadegg discussed his bid, saying, "We got shellacked in this election. The American people, I think, are trying to send us a message. If we re-elect the exact same two top leaders that we had going into the election, when we come out of the election, I think we will have said to the American people: 'We don't really care about the fact that you want change.' And I think we will have said to them: 'Yes, we've become Washington-focused and we want to stay Washington focused.' I don't think we can stay Washington-focused if we want the majority back."

Boehner Says GOP Needs To "Get Back To Basics." In a Roll Call op-ed (11/16), Rep. John Boehner, who is expected to become House Minority Leader, says, "Instead of settling for our minority status back in 1993-94 and adopting the mindset of a permanent minority, we set out to change things in a big way. In 1994 we developed the vision that led to the 'Contract with America,' which proudly said that House Republicans were ready as a team to take on the Washington, D.C., status quo. One of the secrets of the contract's success was that we recognized the things that unite Republicans across the spectrum are tax cuts, spending taxpayers' dollars wisely, ethics and accountability, and reforming government programs to demand results. We also recognized these ideas and policies have the added benefit of bringing in more and more Americans to support the conservative cause." If we "want our majority back in 2008, House Republicans need to get back to these basics and rededicate ourselves to the reform mindset that put us in the majority. We need to rebuild the Republican coalition by focusing on conservative ideas that can win broad-based support not just among House Members, but among the American people."

Democratic Blue Dogs Hope To Enhance Influence In House. The AP (11/16, Abrams) reports that for "a dozen years, the Democratic conservatives known as Blue Dogs have been baying at the moon, ignored by Republicans and tolerated by their more liberal Democratic colleagues. Now, these House lawmakers say that is about to change." Rep. Mike Ross of Arkansas said Republicans "'did not lose their seats to liberal Democrats' in last weeks elections." He added, "Republicans lost their seats to Blue Dog Democrats." The AP adds that with "the addition of nine newly elected freshmen, the Blue Dogs claim 44 members, nearly 20 percent of the incoming Democratic majority. They will be led by Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla., and include Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., in line to become the next Agriculture Committee chairman." Already, "leaders from both parties are courting their votes." Incoming Speaker Nancy Pelosi "has promised to make 'paygo,' a Blue Dog-backed principle that any new spending be paid for with cuts in other programs or new revenues, one of her first legislative goals." Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., "who is running for the position of Republican leader in the next Congress, listed cooperation with the Blue Dogs as part of his platform."

Moderate Democrats, Republicans May Coordinate Efforts. Roll Call (11/16, Yachnin, Davis) reports that in an "effort to boost their influence in the sharply divided chamber, members of the moderate Republican and Democratic House factions indicated Wednesday that the two groups may coordinate efforts in the 110th Congress and could move to create a formal bipartisan coalition in the new session." Members of "the fiscally conservative Democratic Blue Dog Coalition and the centrist Republican Tuesday Group met in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Wednesday, to discuss areas where the groups could align." Matheson, who met with Tuesday Group co-chair Rep. Mark Kirk, said, "We have a lot of common interests." Roll Call adds, "According to Matheson, the moderate coalitions are most likely to work together on pro-growth and fiscal legislation, while Kirk cited issues such as expanding stem-cell research and portions of the 'Suburban Agenda,' an effort spearheaded by Kirk that includes legislation to stop online sexual predators and improve access to health care."

Rothenberg Says Incoming Democrats Are "Conventional," Not Conservative. In his Roll Call column (11/16), Stuart Rothenberg says, "It quickly has become conventional wisdom that last week's Democratic House victory swept in a crop of moderate and conservative Democrats who'll both keep party liberals in check and help remake the image of the party of former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.). Well, I met dozens of Democrats running in 2006 — no, not everyone, but most of them — and I can't find much more than a couple who merit the label

DOJ_NMG_0094945

'conservative.' That's not meant to be either criticism or praise. It's merely a statement of fact." Though there 'were obvious exceptions, most of the House takeovers occurred in swing and Democratic-leaning districts, and those districts elected pretty conventional Democrats."

Gingrich Says Bush Should Build Coalition With Conservative Democrats. In a Wall Street Journal op-ed (11/16), former Speaker Newt Gingrich says, "An establishment bipartisanship between the White House and liberal congressional leaders will almost certainly make it necessary to focus narrowly on how to minimize difficulties in Iraq and postpone consideration of the larger threats to America for the remainder of this and into the next presidency. By contrast, a conservative bipartisanship that knits together the House Republicans and the Blue Dog Democrats into a floor majority, working with a White House that emphasizes popular issues at the grassroots, would make it much easier to focus on the larger threats to American safety. (Such a bipartisanship could stress making the cap gains tax cut permanent; controlling set-asides and discretionary spending; oversight on failing bureaucracies and waste; English as the language of government; and biofuels as part of an energy policy.)" Gingrich adds, "Ironically, the very nature of the Democratic victory makes it possible to re-establish the conservative Democrat and House Republican coalition which made the Reagan legislative victories of 1981-82 possible." If President Bush "decides to govern as President Reagan did, he will work to unify the Blue Dog Democrats with the Republicans to win a handful of very large victories while accepting a constant barrage of unhappiness from the liberal leadership."

Murtha Tells Blue Dogs That Ethics Bill Is "Total Crap." Roll Call (11/16, Bresnahan) reports Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) "told a group of Democratic moderates on Tuesday that an ethics and lobbying reform bill being pushed by party leaders was 'total crap,' but said that he would work to enact the legislation because Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) supports it." Murtha and current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) "are locked in a battle for the House Majority Leader post, and both men made presentations to the Blue Dog Coalition on Tuesday in a bid for their votes." Three sources "who were at the meeting" said Murtha said, "Even though I think it's total crap, I'll vote for it and pass it because that's what Nancy wants." Roll Call adds Pelosi has "made enactment of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act the cornerstone of her legislative agenda for the 110th Congress, and she is preparing to make it the first bill introduced under her reign. Murtha voted against the legislation earlier this year on the House floor." A Democratic lawmaker "said he was 'surprised' by the tone of Murtha's comments, especially Murtha's repeated claim that he would back any proposal that Pelosi favored."

Murtha, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (11/15, Matthews), said, "There's a lot of crap going on in Congress all the time. Guys violate the law, some do. But the problem we have is a few people violate the law and then the whole Congress has to be changed? … The idea we have to deal with an issue like this -- and it is total crap -- that we have to deal with an issue like this when we've got a war going on and we've got all these other issues."

The New York Times (11/16, Hulse, 1.16M) reports, "In an interview on the MSNBC show 'Hardball' Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Murtha said that at the time of Abscam he was interested in attracting foreign investment to relieve high unemployment in his Pennsylvania district and, though suspicious of the offer, wanted to keep open the possibility of legitimate investment. As for the ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi, Mr. Murtha said he was complaining that Congressional wrongdoing was superceding other matters 'when we've got a war going on and we got all these other issues — $8 billion a month we're spending.'"

Majority Leader Race Quickly Divides Democrats. The Washington Times (11/16, Hurt, 88K) reports House Democrats "will decide today whether to install as their majority leader one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress." The vote on Murtha, "whom likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi enthusiastically supports -- comes 10 days after Democrats seized control of the House and Senate after promising to clean up the corruption that they said had become a hallmark of the Republican Congress." Most "of the attention on Capitol Hill yesterday fell on Mr. Murtha's run for House leadership, which many Democrats worry will sully their stunning victories last week and ruin any hopes of a reputation for ethical reform. Mr. Murtha didn't help his case when reports surfaced yesterday that he dismissed the party's plans for ethics reform during a gathering of newly elected Democrats."

The Hill (11/16, Hearn) reports the race "has reinforced longstanding divisions between different factions in the caucus, members and observers said, and has diverted their attention from a positive message they hoped to project just days after winning control of the House." Many Democrats were "dismayed at the ever more heated and at times ugly battle between two of their most senior members, much of it playing out on national television. Some Hoyer backers questioned Pelosi's political judgment, arguing that the effort to 'purge' Hoyer from the leadership would damage caucus unity."

CQ (11/16, Ferrechio) reports, "Little more than a week after they won control of the House, Democrats appeared deeply divided Wednesday on their first major decision — whether to give the majority leader's job to heir apparent Hoyer of Maryland, the current Democratic whip, or to honor

DOJ_NMG_0094946

Pelosi's preference for Pennsylvania's Murtha." Many Democrats "were hesitant to assess the impact of the contest, which has divided their caucus into two camps, or to analyze Pelosi's effort to oust Hoyer from the leadership team." But some "said they are worried about long-term damage to the fragile unity of the Democratic caucus." One senior Democrat said, "If Murtha wins, the resentment members are going to feel over the arm-twisting will be devastating. If Hoyer wins, people will never forget she tried to kick him out."

The New York Times (11/16, Hulse, 1.16M) reports House members "acknowledged on Wednesday that the increasingly bitter contest for majority leader was sullying the image of unity and new direction that Democrats hoped to convey." The "downtrodden Republicans were enjoying the spectacle of the split between" Pelosi, "who is publicly pushing" Murtha, "her longtime ally, and Democrats rallying behind Mr. Hoyer." Rep. Ray LaHood said, "I can't believe they are self-destructing before they even get started. Everyone on our side is giddy." The Times adds the race has "left Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate straining to understand Ms. Pelosi's strategy. They wonder why, in her moment of victory, she injected herself into a leadership fight that will end with the selection of her rival or her own choice, a lawmaker criticized for his ethics record, after an election in which Democrats campaigned on a clean-government theme." Murtha "himself has thrown more fuel on that fire. Members of the conservative Democratic Blue Dog group said that during an appearance before them Tuesday, Mr. Murtha disparaged an ethics overhaul that Ms. Pelosi and the leadership have been promising as one of their first orders of business."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hamburger, Neubauer, 850K) reports, "Though incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to push through ethical reforms in Congress, both of the Democrats vying to be her second-in-command have long histories of earmarking, close relationships with corporate interests, and using their positions to raise millions of dollars in campaign contributions." Murtha "used his seat on the appropriations committee and the largely secret earmark process to obtain $121 million in earmarks during the current session, making him one of the top earmarkers in Congress, according to the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense." Hoyer, "also on appropriations, sent $61.7 million to his district just outside of Washington during this Congress, the watchdog group says. That put him among the top 10% of earmarkers in the House."

The AP (11/16, Taylor) reports Pelosi "faces a major leadership test Thursday, barely a week into her new role, as Democrats vote on her choice for majority leader. She's supporting a lawmaker once caught up in a bribery scandal and known more recently for trading votes for pork projects." With her "prestige is on the line," Hoyer "appeared to carry a lead into Thursday's secret ballot despite Pelosi's opposition." But "allies such as Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. — also a top confidant of Pelosi — have been working this week to peel away votes from Hoyer. Pelosi also has intervened more directly, making the case for Murtha in one-on-one meetings with Democratic freshmen — sessions in which the incoming lawmakers ask for all-important committee assignments."

The Washington Post (11/16, A1, Wiesman, Romano, 690K) reports the "showdown over the House majority leader's post" has "Democrats bitterly divided only a week after their party took control of Congress and has prompted numerous complaints that" Pelosi "and her allies are using strong-arm tactics and threats to try to elect Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) to the job." Pelosi's "aggressive intervention on behalf of Murtha has baffled and angered many Democrats, who think she has unnecessarily put her reputation on the line out of misplaced loyalty to a friend and because of a long-standing feud with Hoyer, the minority whip. Pelosi has pushed Murtha's candidacy at social events, in private meetings and with incoming freshman Democrats; they have been called to her office to discuss committee assignments, only to hear first that she needs Murtha in order to be an effective leader." Hoyer "was heavily favored to win the race until Sunday, when Pelosi -- in a move that shocked even her staff -- openly threw her support to Murtha, despite a vow to stay neutral."

The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Chaddock, 59K) reports Rutgers University political analyst Ross Baker said, "The fight between Murtha and Hoyer is a template for Democrats on the war and corruption. Until this election, Murtha had an iconic status as an outspoken, truth-telling Democrat, and all of a sudden ethics has become a liability. It's an awkward position for Pelosi, whatever the outcome." The Monitor adds, "Most immediately, Murtha's opposition to ethics reform, including past brushes with ethics issues, open Pelosi to charges that she hasn't heard voters on the importance of cleaning up the culture of corruption in Washington."

Asked on Fox News' The Big Story (11/15, Gibson) if Murtha is "actually going to win this thing," ex-Rep. John Kasich replied, "No, no, no. Hoyer's going to win this thing. He has the support of the bulk of the Democratic Party." Pelosi "doesn't like Steny is what I'm told. So she got Murtha as a stalking horse. And then I think she sort of got pinned down and was forced to endorse him, although I'm told she's making no calls. I think Steny will win this comfortably."

On MSNBC's Tucker (11/15), host Tucker Carlson said, "It sounds like when the incoming speaker of the House tells you to do it, you don't necessarily do it, since Steny Hoyer is ahead."

Novak Says Damage To Pelosi Is "Irrevocable." In his column in the Washington Post (11/16, A27, 690K), Robert Novak says "the damage" to Pelosi "was irrevocable when she wrote her colleagues Sunday urging them to pick Murtha over Rep. Steny Hoyer. Close associates of Hoyer say her letter stunned him, and he was not alone. While Pelosi had made it clear that she would vote for Murtha, the public endorsement was unexpected." This is "a no-win situation for Pelosi. If Murtha wins today, she will be accused of personal vindictiveness in derailing Hoyer, who is more popular in the caucus and better qualified for leadership. If Murtha loses, as is much more probable, she will be seen as bumbling her first attempt to lead the new Democratic majority. Pelosi could have avoided this dilemma by standing aside as Newt Gingrich, then the presumptive speaker, did when he voted for his ally Robert Walker as majority whip but did not ask members to oppose Tom DeLay." Pelosi's "mistake confirms long-standing, privately held Democratic apprehension about her abilities." Her "colleagues worry that her decision making may be distorted by personal considerations."

DOJ_NMG_0094947

Other Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) says in an editorial Rep. Murtha is "an old hand in the sort of politics that voters supposedly rebelled against last week." Murtha's "history would seem to belie Pelosi's call for 'the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history.' But like the Republicans in the Senate, the new speaker seems willing to go only so far in satisfying the voters' appetite for change. If that disappointing pattern persists, Americans who thought they voted for change might echo the title of the Who classic we quoted above: "Won't Get Fooled Again."

The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "So far, the Democrats seem not to have paid much attention to the tattered baggage lugged into the limelight by Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Iraq war critic who is Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice for second in command." And while Pelosi is "vowing to hammer home ethics reform as her first order of business, the Capitol newspaper Roll Call reported that Mr. Murtha was vulgarly belittling her program in private meetings with lawmakers."

WSJournal Says Earmark Reform Another Test For Pelosi. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "We'll find out when Democrats vote today if Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi was able to push aside her long-serving deputy in favor of her antiwar friend, John Murtha, as House Democratic majority leader. But an even bigger sign of how Democrats plan to govern is whether they implement the 'earmark' reform they campaigned on this fall." Murtha is "a champion of earmarked spending projects and his brother was a renowned earmark lobbyist. If he wins, Democrats will be rewarding his antiwar stance over the need for a cleaner Congress. All eyes should then turn to whether Ms. Pelosi follows through on her promise to clean up earmarks. So far, she's said the right things about greater transparency that would require every Member to disclose his support for every earmark, which have become such opportunities for corruption. Last weekend she was quoted as saying, refreshingly, that 'I'd just as soon do away with all' earmarks." But some Republicans "are already questioning Ms. Pelosi's sincerity."

Five Congressional Black Caucus Members To Head Key House Committees. The Washington Post (11/16, 690K) reports five members of the Congressional Black Caucus "are poised to take the helm of key House committees when Democrats assume control of Congress next year: John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of Judiciary, Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.) of intelligence, Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.) of House Administration, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) of Ways and Means, and Bennie Thompson (Miss.) of Homeland Security." Another member, Rep. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), is "slated to be named majority whip, which would make him the third-ranking Democrat in the House. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the 110th Congress, has campaigned on his behalf." University of Maryland political analyst Ronald Walters said, "If they accede to that much power, it would truly be the realization of the kind of dream we've been waiting for since the civil rights movement." Walters added that "is a big 'if.' The appointment of Millender-McDonald is less certain than those of some of the others, and Hastings faces a steep uphill climb in his bid for the intelligence post because of past ethics problems." Further, CBC members, "who tend to be more liberal, might find it hard to push their traditional social agenda. Conservative and moderate 'Blue Dog' Democrats, whose numbers are nearly equal to those of Black Caucus members, have vowed to counter agendas that they deem too liberal."

The Washington Times (11/16, DeBose, 88K) reports the CBC "expects at least five committee chairmanships and as many as 17 subcommittee chairmanships to be led by its members in the 110th Congress after a vote by the Democratic Caucus concludes shortly after noon today. But some said the numbers might not exactly reflect seniority alone on the subcommittee seats."

Norton Hopeful For Passage Of DC House Vote Bill. On MSNBC's Hardball (11/15, Matthews), Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton was asked about the prospects for a District of Columbia House vote bill this year. Norton said, "That would be a nice bipartisan to do in the lame-duck session but, look, we have only a week in December to get it through the House and the Senate. So I'm calling on my Senate colleagues to join us. After all, we've got Republicans and Democrats -- got it out of one committee. Almost equal number of Republicans and Democrats -- let's get it out of the House and the Senate in December."

DOJ_NMG_0094948

Senate Democrats Planning Agenda For 110th Congress. Roll Call (11/16, Pierce) reports the Senate Democratic leadership team "plans a long, laborious slog for the Senate next year even as party leaders continue to formalize their legislative agenda for the 110th Congress — an agenda that already includes a couple of surprises." At a breakfast with reporters Tuesday, "incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) warned that the 'do-nothing' Congress, as his party has labeled recent Republican rule in the chamber, will soon be over." Reid promised "to 'work long hours,'" saying, "We're going to work more than just Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday until noon." Roll Call adds Reid "outlined some of his top legislative priorities for next year, which include an effort to 'do everything we can to make elections more civil.' Principally, Reid said that would mean passing a bill to create criminal penalties for election fraud, including offenses such as voter misinformation campaigns carried out by robo-calls and misleading flyers." Reid also "indicated that he wants to rein in independent campaign expenditure groups, known as 527s, even though many of them have helped Democrats even out the edge in hard-dollar fundraising that Republicans have typically enjoyed." As they "assess the rest of their agenda — much of which they already have talked about in broad terms — Democratic Senators and aides said choices still have to be made about what specific legislation should be included under the rubric of their election-year themes of energy independence, modifying the Medicare prescription drug benefit, making college more affordable, raising the minimum wage, passing terrorism prevention measures and protecting employee pensions."

Sen. Patty Murray, appearing on MSNBC (11/15, O'Donnell), said, "There are obviously a number of challenges. Iraq is the elephant in the room. … There are a number of domestic items, too. We're being handed a budget that is very difficult to deal with, and there's tremendous domestic needs on the Medicare Prescription Drug Plan, on families' access to health insurance, on making sure that our students get access to college in an affordable way. Families are feeling the stress of pensions and just everyday, average concerns of Americans. And we'll be putting that agenda together and begin to move this country back on track so we address those concerns."

Narrow Majority To Put Reid To The Test. In his Washington Post column (11/16, A27), David Broder says the need for 60 votes in the Senate to move legislation "puts an enormous strain on Harry Reid, the Nevadan who has struggled these past two years to master the less arduous duties of Senate minority leader. The risk for Democrats is that Reid may not be up to the challenge. We saw how weakness in the majority leader could hurt a party in the recent example of Sen. Bill Frist. More than once Frist was unable to hold his own troops together on big issues or to thwart Reid and the Democrats when they built roadblocks to administration bills. Now the situation is reversed, and it is Reid who will be tested." The Senate is "chockablock with presidential wannabes," and Reid will also "have to contend with a few real mavericks and independent spirits in his caucus." As minority leader, Reid was "remarkably effective in keeping the Democratic caucus united but far less successful as a public spokesman for his party. His partisan comments were often too sharp, his television appearances less than commanding. In his new role, he will be far more exposed, and his flaws more conspicuous."

Samuelson Says Democrats Have Few Big Opportunities. In his Washington Post column (11/16, A27), Robert J. Samuelson says, "Even forgetting possible vetoes by President Bush, the Democrats have less leeway to alter policy than their rhetoric implies. Although Democrats didn't promise much -- they benefited heavily from unhappiness with the war in Iraq -- they still succumbed to exaggeration. Their sound bites ran ahead of plausible solutions." On "domestic policy, Democrats have few big opportunities. This creates a dilemma. They can either concentrate on symbolic acts (the minimum wage, the drug benefit) that sharpen their differences with Republicans. Or they can find less controversial matters, where cooperation seems possible, to advertise their fitness to govern and their credentials as centrists. It will be difficult to do both. There's only one solace -- the Republicans face the same dilemma."

Pension Agency Posts Smaller Deficit Than Last Year. The Washington Post/AP (11/16, D3, Aversa) reports, "The federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans logged a deficit of $18.1 billion this year, a big improvement from last year thanks to a new pension law." The ""narrower deficit for the 2006 fiscal year reported by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp." yesterday "was down from a shortfall of $22.8 billion recorded in 2005 and a record $23.3 billion posted in 2004."

USDA Admits Making Over $2.8 Billion In Improper Payments. The AP (11/16, Quaid) reports, "The Agriculture Department on Wednesday acknowledged making improper payments to farmers worth more than $2.8 billion last year. Officials explained that most of the payments involved missing or incomplete paperwork." Chuck Christopherson, the department's chief financial officer, said, "We take this very seriously. … We know this is something that we can address and that we can fix." The AP adds, "The amount of improper payments in fiscal 2006 was about 11 percent of farm program payments, the department said. The fiscal year ended on Sept. 30."

DOJ_NMG_0094949

Rodman Leaving Pentagon For Brookings. The AP (11/15) reports Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs Peter Rodman "is leaving his post, in the first announced Pentagon departure" since Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's resignation. He "will join the Brookings Institution as a senior fellow."

Defense Department Travel Reservation System A "Fiasco." The AP (11/15, Margasak) reports the Defense Department's computerized travel reservation system "has turned into a half-billion-dollar fiasco, so flawed that only 17 percent of the travelers are using it as intended," according to the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. The system "was designed as the Pentagon's version of an Internet travel site," but the probe found that 83% of DOD travelers "have been contacting professional travel agents first -- and then using the new system to book the travel afterward."

WSJournal Says Federal Relief For Auto Execs Won't Help. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A18, 2.04M) editorializes, "Auto executives from the Big Three finally got their sit-down with President Bush this week, where they (surprise!) pleaded for federal relief." The Big Three "still dominate U.S. auto production, but foreign makers continue to gain market share, currently accounting for some 40% of all passenger cars and light trucks sold in the U.S." President Bush "had been resisting their overtures and appears to be standing his ground, agreeing to little more after this week's meeting than a 'continuing dialogue.'" However, with Democrats in control, "there's likely to be increased pressure for some kind of government aid." The President's "inconsistency on bailouts won't help matters," as airlines "have received between $15 billion and $20 billion in cash to help keep them afloat in the wake of 9/11." Detroit auto makers are "angling for a similar deal, but it would only retard the necessary if painful transformation that is currently taking place at the Big Three." Government intervention "in a market this healthy can only increase the chances that it won't stay that way."

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Concerned About Inflation, More Confident About Engineering Soft Landing. The Financial Times (11/16, Guha, Mackenzie) reports, "Federal Reserve policymakers are becoming a little more confident about their ability to engineer a soft landing for the US economy, minutes published on Wednesday reveal. The minutes, from the last Fed policy meeting on October 25, show that most Fed policymakers thought the downside risks to growth had "diminished a little" since the previous meeting, while some thought the upside risks to inflation had also declined, though 'only slightly.'" However, "the outlook for both inflation and growth remains very uncertain. … All members of the committee 'expressed concern about the outlook for inflation' and all 'agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of the greatest concern.'"

The Wall Street Journal (11/16, Ip, 2.04M) reports, "The minutes said FOMC members expect core inflation to decline, as the indirect effects of the retreat in energy prices feed through to other goods and services, and the cost of housing ceases to be a source of upward pressure." They also "said the decline in housing activity is unfolding as expected and that the 'risk of an even larger contraction in this sector had ebbed.' Some, however, fretted that it could yet spill over to other areas of consumer spending." USA Today (11/16, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) runs a similar report titled "Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns," reporting the Fed "in particular noted that a tight labor market could lead to a 'sustained increase in wage pressure,' and thus inflation."

Stocks Hit New Records. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, McKay, 2.04M) reports, "Investors bid stocks to fresh highs, their hopes for a less-than-traumatic economic slowdown buoyed by newly released comments by Federal Reserve policymakers. … The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied 33.70 points, or 0.3%, to a record 12251.71, up 14.3% on the year. … The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index crossed 1400 for the first time in more than six years but finished shy of that psychologically important number. The index ended 0.2% higher, up 3.35 points at 1396.57, its highest close since Nov. 9, 2000, and up 11.9% on the year. It still would have to rise more than 9% to top its record set in early 2000." The Nasdaq "rose 0.5%, or 12.09 points, to 2442.75, up 10.8% on the year. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001, though the index would have to more than double to reach a new record." NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 5, Williams, 9.87M) was the only network newscast that noted the stock numbers.

Miners' Union Aims For Revival As Coal Industry Makes Comeback. The Washington Post (11/16, Russakoff, 690K) reports from Southern Illinois that "global economic forces have realigned, and coal mining is back. And a new generation of miners is living the good life not seen here since coal was king." As the coal "industry withered east of the Mississippi River, so did the United Mine Workers of America -- from 167,000 active members in 1980 to 16,000 today. ... Now the union is trying to come back, too, beginning with an organizing campaign targeting Peabody Energy Corp., ... the world's largest coal company." The union "is struggling to bridge a gap between young workers ..., giddy over high wages in this long-depressed region, and older ones focused on pensions and gold-plated health care in retirement." The Post adds, "Coal's rebound here is a direct result of soaring U.S. demand for electricity, half of which currently comes from coal. The Bush administration is promoting coal as a 'freedom fuel' -- in contrast to foreign oil -- and utilities are on a coal binge, with 154 new coal-fired plants on the drawing board. ... [C]oal states and the industry are investing heavily in technologies to convert coal into liquid fuel to power cars and jet planes."

DOJ_NMG_0094950

Urban Schools Behind Nation In Science Scores. The New York Times (11/16, Schemo, 1.16M) reports the National Assessment of Educational Progress shows that "at least half of eighth graders tested in science failed to demonstrate even a basic understanding of the subject in 9 of 10 major cities, and fourth graders, the only other group tested, fared little better." Further, "student performance in urban public schools was not only poor but also far short of science scores in the nation as a whole." Only Austin had a majority of 8th graders meet basic standards and only Austin, Charlotte and San Diego had a majority of 4th graders meet the basic standard.

The AP (11/16) reports, "Minorities in the city schools often performed similarly to students with the same backgrounds in the national sample." Nationwide, "just a little more than a quarter of students in both grades" met proficient standards while "34 percent of fourth-graders" were "unable to perform at even a 'basic' level."

KBR Will Trade As A Separate Stock. USA Today (11/16, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Today, KBR, which runs almost every aspect of the Iraq war except the fighting, will trade as a separate stock after an initial public offering. It raised $473.3 million Wednesday, after pricing the 27.8 million shares it's selling at $17 a share." Ben Holmes, publisher of MorningNotes.com, a market and IPO research firm, said that for investors, "KBR is the demon spawn of Halliburton." A Democratic Congress "may further investigate the company." Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop said, "But KBR "has been broadening its business outside Iraq. Its backlog of business jumped 42% from last year to September, largely on non-Iraq jobs," but the backlog "is the salvation of a company that normally would struggle to win over investors. But it's unclear how profitable it is and whether investors are willing to pay up."

Democrats Have Good Chance To Expand Senate Majority In 2008. The Hill (11/16, Blake) reports Senate Democrats will "have a wider field of possibilities and probably more open seats available to expand their majority in 2008, though Senate Republicans will have several chances to pick off red-state Democrats." Of the "33 seats up for election two years from now, 21 are held by Republicans. Eight of those 21 were elected with 55 percent of the vote or less in 2002, and in seven of them the incumbent is a freshman. The party also faces several retirement questions." Democrats "might not lose any incumbents to retirement now that they are in the majority — a crucial first step to maintaining and growing that majority. Two big Democratic retirement risks, 82-year-old Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and 69-year-old Sen. Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), intend to run again in 2008, according to their offices." Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), 72, "who has not decided," and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), 64, "who did not respond to inquiries, may be re-energized by capturing prized committee chairmanships." Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report "expects Democrats to skate into 2008 with all five of these potential retirees." On the Republican side, "Sens. Pat Roberts (Kan.), 70, Pete Domenici (N.M.), 74, and Ted Stevens (Alaska), who turns 83 on Saturday, have all told The Hill they intend to seek reelection. But speculation is rampant about Sens. John Warner (Va.), 79, and Wayne Allard (Colo.), who is at the tail end of a two-term-limit pledge." The "most vulnerable incumbents are Allard, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), according to the Cook Political Report. No races are yet listed as tossups."

Democrats Closed "Parent Gap" In Midterm Elections. The Washington Times (11/16, Wetzstein, 88K) reports Democrats "closed a so-called 'parent gap' in this month's election and should seize the moment by pushing family-friendly legislation, analysts told a Capitol Hill briefing yesterday." Married parents – "especially married mothers -- have voted Republican in recent years, partly because of a perception that Democrats don't care about family issues, said Michele Stockwell, a social policy analyst with the Progressive Policy Institute." The election results "show that Democrats 'closed this parent gap, at least temporarily,' she said. But the gap needs to be closed permanently by addressing families' concerns." The Times adds, "Some family advocates, however, expressed dismay at the lack of attention to family issues in Democratic platforms."

Greenberg, Carville Criticize Dean's DNC Strategy. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, Cook, 59K) reports, "Sweet as it was to win control of the House and the Senate in the 2006 election, some Democratic operatives think their victory could have been bigger if national party chairman Howard Dean had been willing to spend more in districts where races were close." At a Monitor breakfast, Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg said, "There were two dozen seats in which Republicans got 51 percent or less....There is a very big difference between defending these seats as incumbents or still trying to pick these up while they are being protected by Republicans." James Carville, "who along with Greenberg co-founded Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group, told a Monitor breakfast on Wednesday, 'We beat the hell out of them at the committees, at the congressional [campaign] committees. The DNC [Democratic National Committee] left the money on the table.'" Carville said DNC Chairman Howard Dean "should be dumped. Carville added that Dean 'should be held accountable' and described his leadership as 'Rumsfeldian in its competence.'"

DOJ_NMG_0094951

The New York Times (11/16, Nagourney, 1.16M) reports, "The Democrats are celebrating their big victory of Nov. 7 with recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting, no matter that they won control of the Senate and the House for the first time since 1994." State Democratic leaders "are saying Howard Dean, the party chairman, is not receiving the credit he deserves for the triumph." On the other hand, Greenberg and Carville "rebuked Mr. Dean on Wednesday, saying the Democrats could have captured 40 House seats rather than 29 had Mr. Dean bowed to demands by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, leader of the effort to recapture the House, to put more money into Congressional races." Liberal bloggers "say they are not receiving the credit they deserve and are chafing at how what they call the mainstream media has showered too much credit on Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Charles E. Schumer of New York, for the sweep." And on Capitol Hill, "soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California has waded into a leadership fight that has divided her caucus." The Times adds that in an interview, Carville asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C minus general at the D.N.C.?"

The Austin American Statesman (11/16, Shepard) reports Carville, "during coffee and rolls with political reporters today, said Democrats could have picked up as many as 50 House seats, instead of the nearly 30 they have so far. The reason they didn't, he said, is the Democratic National Committee did not spend some $6 million it could have put into so-called 'third tier' House races against vulnerable Republicans."

Simmons Concedes, After Losing By 91 Votes. The AP (11/16, Haigh) reports, "More than a week after Election Day, Republican US Rep. Rob Simmons conceded to Democrat Joe Courtney on Wednesday, but did not rule out running again in two years." Simmons "spoke to supporters -- some tearful -- who packed his headquarters Wednesday afternoon, a few hours after Secretary of the State Susan Bysiewicz confirmed that Courtney had won by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast."

CQ (11/16) reports "the Courtney-Simmons contest was the closest of many tight races in a midterm election cycle that boosted Democrats to control of both chambers of Congress. Many of the Democratic takeovers came in districts held by moderate Republicans such as Simmons; a similarly positioned Connecticut Republican, 12-term incumbent Nancy L. Johnson, was unseated in the 5th District by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy." Courtney "had declared victory on Election Night, when returns indicated he led Simmons by 167 votes. He has been in Washington this week, attending freshman orientation."

Two Georgia Democrats Certified As House Race Victors. The AP (11/16, McCaffrey) reports Democratic Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall "were certified the winners of their respective races Wednesday, all but ending GOP hopes of knocking off at least one Democratic incumbent in the Nov. 7 congressional races." Barrow "defeated Republican Max Burns in eastern Georgia's 12th District by just 864 votes out of 142,438 cast, according to the final tallies released by Secretary of State Cathy Cox. In middle Georgia's 8th District, Marshall defeated Republican Mac Collins by 1,752 votes out of 159,568 cast."

The New York Times (11/16, Dewan, 1.16M) reports, "Neither of the Republican challengers had conceded, and Mr. Barrow, who won by 864 votes, could face a recount if his opponent, Max Burns, requests one. Georgia law allows a recount if the margin of victory is less than 1 percent of the votes cast."

Accuracy Of Midterm Election Polls Assessed. In his Wall Street Journal column (11/16), Carl Bialik says, "Pollsters earned high marks in last week's elections: Surveys correctly predicted that the Democrats would win control of the House of Representatives, that the Senate would be closely contested and that Democratic gubernatorial candidates would sweep into statehouses." That "doesn't mean that some pollsters didn't do better than others, however, and firms haven't hesitated to trumpet their results." Bialik adds, "I looked at five pollsters that were among the most prolific: Rasmussen, SurveyUSA, Zogby (which releases separate telephone and online polls) and Washington, D.C.-based Mason-Dixon." There were "some interesting trends: Phone polls tended to be better than online surveys, and companies that used recorded voices rather than live humans in their surveys were standouts. Nearly everyone had some big misses, though, such as predicting that races would be too close to call when in fact they were won by healthy margins. Also, I found that being loyal to a particular polling outfit may not be wise. Taking an average of the five most recent polls for a given state, regardless of the author -- a measure compiled by Pollster.com -- yielded a higher accuracy rate than most individual pollsters." In the Senate races, "the average error on the margin of victory was tightly bunched for all the phone polls. Rasmussen (25 races) and Mason-Dixon (15) each were off by an average of fewer than four points on the margin. Zogby's phone polls (10) and SurveyUSA (18) each missed by slightly more than four points. Just four of the 68 phone polls missed by 10 points or more, with the widest miss at 18 points."

DOJ_NMG_0094952

NYTimes Says Evangelicals Not Shifting Political Parties. David Kuo writes in a column for The New York Times (11/16, 1.16M) that this year's elections doesn't mean evangelicals "aren't re-examining their political priorities nearly as much as they are re-examining their spiritual priorities," which "could be bad news for both political parties." Evangelicals are "beginning to see the effect of their political involvement on those with whom they hope to share Jesus' eternal message: non-evangelicals," as Beliefnet's poll showed that "nearly 60 percent of non-evangelicals have a more negative view of Jesus because of Christian political involvement; almost 40 percent believe that George W. Bush's faith has had a negative impact on his presidency." Conservative Christians were "promised that having an evangelical like Mr. Bush in office was a dream come true," but "it wasn't…not by a long shot." He wrote, "The administration accomplished little that evangelicals really cared about." However, Lewis says not to "expect conservative Christians in politics to start to disappear."

Riley's Success In Alabama Analyzed. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A19, Hillyer, 2.04M) reports as Republicans "coast to coast were burying their many political dead, a Republican governor once given up for dead was enjoying a landslide victory. Alabama Gov. Bob Riley was re-elected last week, beating long-popular Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley with more than 58% of the vote, including an impressive 20% of the black vote." Riley's win "was not simply the result of Alabama being a Republican state: Democrats won the two next most prominent statewide races, those for lieutenant governor and Supreme Court chief justice. In Alabama as elsewhere, this was a Democratic year -- with the notable exception of Mr. Riley, a conservative reformer in cowboy boots, with a cheerful, Reagan-like demeanor." Riley and editorial writers "across the state will readily identify his successes in the 'Three Es': Economic development, education and, not least, ethics." These accomplishments "stand in marked contrast to the record" of former Gov. Don Siegelman, who "presided over a budget crisis and now stands convicted of bribery and other infractions."

McCain Launches Presidential Exploratory Committee. USA Today (11/16, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) "is forming a presidential exploratory committee in order to start amassing money for the 2008 Republican nomination contest," and he says "he'll make a final decision with his family over the Christmas holidays." McCain's new committee "will file quarterly reports to the FEC," and he could put "about $1 million toward a bid." In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in the past week, "26% of Republicans and independents who lean toward the GOP picked McCain," while former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, "was first at 28%."

The AP (11/16) reports that McCain also "launched a Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — that allows supporters to donate and join his effort." If McCain runs, "he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Hook, 850K) reports, "McCain has been considered the front-runner for the Republican nomination in a field that changed rapidly after the tumultuous midterms," and he has been "moving to make a fresh appeal to the surly voters who helped end GOP control of the House and the Senate -- Republicans and independents angry about government corruption and excessive spending." However, the midterms also show a "growing risk" for McCain as polls show that a "majority of voters disapprove of the war in Iraq and want at least some troops withdrawn," and McCain is "almost alone in calling for a larger deployment." Today, he made a speech to GOPAC, a conservative political group, he will speak again today to the Federalist Society.

CNN's The Situation Room (11/15, Crowley) also said that "as he approaches '08, McCain will need to align his more troops in Iraq position with an antiwar electorate."

On MSNBC's Hardball (11/15), host Chris Matthews discussed the 2008 presidential race with political strategist Mark McKinnon and former Clinton Press Secretary Joe Lockhart. Matthews asked McKinnon, "On the Republican side…[John] McCain, Mitt Romney or Rudy [Giuliani]? Anybody else can win that nomination right now?" McKinnon: "I think those are the big three, I really do." Matthews then asked Lockhart, "In your party, Hillary [Clinton], [John] Edwards…[Barack] Obama?" Lockhart: "I think those are the three."

Thompson Announces Presidential Exploratory Committee. The AP (11/16, Glover) reports, "Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who served as Health and Human Services Secretary in President Bush's first term, said Wednesday he intends to form a committee to explore a possible run for the White House in 2008." During his stop in Iowa, Thompson "argued that his background as a Midwest governor and HHS secretary would appeal to voters," and said, "The three big issues in 2008 are going to be health, energy independence and the war in Iraq." Thompson "faces a daunting task in what's expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential candidates." Other potential candidates "include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki. California Rep. Duncan Hunter also has announced a presidential bid."

DOJ_NMG_0094953

Clinton Says She's Undecided On Presidential Bid. The AP (11/16, Fouhy) reports that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's (D) "professed indecision about a presidential bid seems a bit disingenuous," as "she has millions in the bank, a national network of supporters and an unrivaled team of political strategists." Earlier this week, she said, "I will look at the possibilities, but I ... haven't really had the time to talk to people about it." Polls "show her the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination," but Clinton "insists she's just starting the process of making a final decision." Among "registered black Democrats, she led Obama 29 percent to 10 percent on the same question in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll." She has "as much as $13 million remaining from her Senate run that can be used in a presidential bid, far more than lesser known candidates."

The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 10, 2:25, Borger, 7.66M) said Sen. Clinton " is the person to beat," but "she does have one problem," which is that "she voted for the war in Iraq and that won't help with the liberal wing of the party." Sen. Barack Obama "was a sensation during this election cycle," but his problem is that "he's only been in the Senate for two years, he has no national security credentials so one of the reasons he's talking about Iraq in Chicago next week is to talk about his feelings about the war." He voted "against the war, and he wants to present his credentials to the American people." John Kerry, John Edwards, Joe Biden, General Wesley Clark, and maybe even former Vice President Al Gore are all on the "growing list" of potential candidates.

WPost Sees Lessons On Race In Maryland Senate Campaign. The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) editorializes, "There are lessons for both political parties in the conduct and outcome of the U.S. Senate race in Maryland this year." Republicans "discovered that identity politics and fraudulent campaign literature are not enough to drive African American voters into jettisoning their loyalty to the Democratic Party en masse. Democrats, who nominated white candidates for the Senate and every other marquee statewide race, were put on notice not to take their indispensable core constituency, African Americans, for granted. Both parties might profit from treating black voters, who account for between 20 and 25 percent of the state's electorate, with more respect."

Bush To Promote Trade, Counter-Terrorism In Trip To Asia. ABC World News (11/15, story 4, 0:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush landed in Singapore a short time ago. He's beginning a week long Asian trip for a series of summits and economic conferences and his first visit to Vietnam." The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Gerstenzang, 850K) says the trip will knit together "the twin issues of economic security and counter-terrorism that are at the center of his agenda for the final two years of his presidency." Bush's trip "is centered on a three-day visit to Vietnam, his first and the second by a US president since the end of the Vietnam War. President Clinton visited in November 2000, two months before leaving office."

Much of the media coverage on Bush's trip portrays him as a president weakened by the midterm elections and the recent House defeat of his Vietnam trade bill. USA Today (11/16, Jackson, 2.27M) says "some Asian leaders wonder whether last week's elections were a vote against free trade and their countries' economic opportunities." Tonight, Bush "delivers a major speech on US-Asian relations that will include a renewed commitment to what national security adviser Stephen Hadley called 'trade liberalization.'" USA Today adds, "Delegates to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, to be held this weekend in Hanoi, will assess Bush's political strength in light of the election victories by the Democrats." The AP (11/16, Hunt) reports Bush is now "seeking to reassure nervous Asian allies that the United States will remain a reliable partner in liberalizing trade" after the "early embarrassment" when the House "failed to approve normalized trade relations with Vietnam."

The Financial Times (11/16, Beattie, Kazmin) reports the Administration "scrambled on Wednesday to play down the significance of the US House of Representatives defeating a motion to treat Vietnam as a full trading partner. … Though the bill is very likely to pass when Congress reconvenes in December, the timing of the vote, days before Mr Bush attends the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) forum in Vietnam is highly unfortunate for the White House." Susan Schwab, US trade representative, "used a press conference in Hanoi on Wednesday to argue that the defeat arose from procedural problems, not fear of Vietnam or rejection of trade deals. 'You have to be a student of our congressional system to understand the vote,' she said. 'The fact is that there was strong bipartisan support in favour of permanent normal trade relations for Vietnam in the House of Representatives.'"

NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 11, Williams, 9.87M) said the "subplot" of Bush's Asia trip is "how angry some of his fellow Republicans are at the election results at home. 'The Wall Street Journal' reports Republicans in Congress intentionally didn't pass two bills the President badly wanted before he left. One of them is aid for Vietnam and another is a bill to pay for the US government, which will now have to be flown to Asia by a White House aide for the President's signature."

The New York Times (11/16, Weisman, 1.16M) says the Vietnam bill "result was an embarrassment for the White House, suddenly deprived of a tangible way to prove that relations with Vietnam were improving under Mr. Bush. Even administration officials said they were not sure why the bill failed and seemed ready to blame Republicans as well as Democrats." The Times adds, "A day after Republican leaders decided not to even try to pass the bill before Mr. Bush's visit, new details of the inner workings of the House bill were emerging. Legislative aides said Republican skeptics of the bill were furious with their leaders that it was being scheduled so soon after an election in which trade was an issue." A similar piece in the Financial Times (11/16, Beattie, Callan) reports, "Never mind the Democrats: it's those Capitol Hill Republicans you need to watch out for. That was the conclusion of frustrated Bush administration officials as they blamed the ineptitude of the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives for trying and failing to rush through the Vietnam trade bill on Monday."

DOJ_NMG_0094954

UN Ambassador John Bolton, appearing on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/15), said, "My understanding is the House had some difficulties with the terms of the bilateral agreement. I think they'll certainly take a look at that again. But I don't see anything inconsistent with being in favor of free trade and also aggressively promoting American interest, which I think the Administration is trying to do."

The New York Times (11/16, A6, Sanger, 1.16M) reports Bush's five-day visit to Asia "will test whether the Republican defeat last week diminished his influence as he presses other nations to confront Iran and North Korea." Discussing the president's meeting the Putin, Hadley "acknowledged that the two countries were still well apart on such [UN] sanctions" against Iran. Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing the nuclear issue, Hadley said the administration had "no intention of letting up the pressure" to win Iran's help. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq." Meanwhile, the Times says when Bush arrives Friday in Hanoi, "he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of normal trade relations with Vietnam." Also in Hanoi, the Times says Bush is "likely to have a testy encounter with President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea," who "has been critical of what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea."

In a similar report, the Washington Times (11/16, Curl, 88K) reports, "While Mr. Bush will be president for another two years, his loss of Congress considerably weakens his clout at home. One former White House adviser said the strong hand he held when he bucked the international community and invaded Iraq may be all but played out." Mike Green, who is now an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language. … They know he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

The Los Angeles Times (11/16, Tran, 850K) reports from Little Saigon, in Los Angeles CA, where "the talk is of optimism and new freedoms for a country many fled decades ago." Bush's "visit to Vietnam today is seen in the nation's largest Vietnamese American community as a heartening, profoundly important event. For some, there is even the hope that the president will find a way to champion reform in a country that still evokes bitterness and memories of terrible times. … Many in Little Saigon, a bustling Vietnamese American community that sprawls through parts of Westminster, Garden Grove and Santa Ana, say it's the perfect time for Bush to voice their concerns."

Rice Backs Restart To Global Trade Talks. The AP (11/16, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "endorsed an attempt to restart global trade talks that collapsed over the summer, telling Asian trade partners on Thursday that a new trade agreement is 'critical to global prosperity and security.' Rice pledged $1 million in new US funding for an Asian trade development initiative and unveiled a US program allowing expedited visas and other services for approved business travelers from nations" in the APEC forum. Rice insisted that "both as a trade issue and a foreign policy issue, the success of the Doha round is critical to global prosperity and security."

Vietnam Promotes Ho Chi Minh's Image To Fight "Rampant Corruption." The Washington Times (11/16, Kralev, 88K) reports, "Vietnam's ruling Communist Party is turning to the ideology and social teachings of its founder, Ho Chi Minh, in an uphill battle against rampant corruption that has resulted in the dismissal of thousands of officials in recent years. The Politburo instructed the party's local branches this week to begin a campaign 'to encourage party members and the general public to study and follow [Ho's] virtuous personality.'" The Times adds, "By doing this, it said, 'the party believes people will be able to effectively push back social evils' such as 'corruption, waste and individualism,' a reference to the diminished role of the individual in communist ideology."

Spellings Leads Delegation To Boost Foreign Student Enrollment From Asia. The Christian Science Monitor (11/16, LaFranchi, 59K) reports on "a modest rise in the number of new foreign students in the US, the first increase after several years of declines after the 9/11 attacks." Now "educators" believe it will "take a more coordinated effort from the government and higher-ed institutions" to continue that increase. So U.S. Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings is "in China, Korea, and Japan this week with a group of university presidents -- a first-of-its-kind mission -- to tout the virtues of American higher education."

The Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K) writes in an editorial, "It is welcome news that after two years of decline, students from foreign countries are steadily coming back to U.S. college campuses." Also "this week a delegation of college presidents, led by education and State Department officials, is in Asia on a mission to recruit foreign scholars. America can't afford not to put out the welcome mat."

DOJ_NMG_0094955

Bush Discusses Proliferation With Putin En Route To APEC Summit. The Washington Post/AP (11/16, A21, Loven) reports President Bush, "eager for Russian help in nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, tended to the sometimes frosty Washington-Moscow relationship Wednesday by paying a quick call on President Vladimir Putin. Bush paused to visit the Russian leader for an hour and a half during an airport stopover on his way to Asia for a week-long trip." Russian news agencies "quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as saying the two presidents discussed the Iranian nuclear program, the situation in the Middle East and nuclear nonproliferation." Speaking to reporters on Air Force One after the meeting, NSA Hadley said the president's "get-together" with Putin "was a social meeting, as we said it would be. This was a refueling stop." He also said the two men "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea. Hadley also said he had spoken with his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, "about efforts to reach agreement on a new UN security resolution on Iran."

Calling Wednesday's meeting "unusual," the Financial Times (11/16, Buckley) says Bush and Putin "confirmed the two countries would this weekend sign a bilateral accord on Russian entry to the World Trade Organization." Meanwhile, "Analysts said the gesture by Mr. Putin to travel to the airport…may have reflected a desire to ease relations between Moscow and Washington, currently seen as at their poorest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991."

Democrats Blast Administration's North Korea Policies. The Washington Post (11/16, A21, Kessler, 690K) reports the Bush administration "came under fierce attack yesterday from Democrats for its North Korea policy, with the incoming chairman of the House International Relations Committee saying that change is 'long overdue' and that the United States should allow its chief nuclear arms negotiator to visit Pyongyang. … Meanwhile, a group of experts returning from talks with top North Korean officials offered a pessimistic report on the prospects of reaching a deal when the long-stalled six-nation talks resume later this year. North Korean officials told the experts that they would take a much tougher stance when Pyongyang returns to the negotiating table, believing it is on 'equal footing' with the United States now that it has tested a nuclear weapon." At a hearing yesterday on the administration's preparation for the talks, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) "faulted the administration's exclusive reliance on the six-nation negotiating framework, arguing that substantial bilateral contacts are necessary to reach any deal." Lantos also charged that Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill has "been undercut in his diplomacy" by "hard-liners lodged in the office of the Vice President and the Defense Department." Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns countered, "Some people are insisting that the United States should negotiate with North Korea solely on a bilateral basis, but the North Korean problem, especially its pursuit of nuclear weapons, is a regional problem, it's not just a bilateral issue, because this problem poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

Meanwhile, the AP (11/16, Schweid) reports Rep. Brad Sherman of California proposed that the US offer Pyongyang "a nonaggression pact as part of a deal in which the North Koreans permanently and verifiably give up their nuclear weapons." But GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida cautioned against concessions or any acts of "appeasement."

Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown On Pyongyang. AFP (11/16) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "urged Asia-Pacific nations to crack down on illicit financial activities by 'weapons proliferators,' in an indirect reference to North Korea." Speaking at an APEC ministers meeting in Hanoi, Rice said, "Confronting the threats posed by terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, natural disaster and pandemic disease is inextricably tied to the prosperity of the region. We also hope that APEC members will take all necessary actions to prevent the abuse of their financial systems by weapons proliferators."

North Korea Unlikely To Give Up Nuclear Program, US Experts Say. McClatchy (11/16, Schoof) reports North Korean officials are "proud of their country's nuclear test and are unlikely to be persuaded easily to give up their nuclear weapons," a group of Korea experts said Wednesday after a visit to the reclusive communist nation. Siegfried S. Hecker, a nuclear scientist and former director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, "said he and the others met with the head of North Korea's Yongbyon nuclear center, Ri Hong Sop, but weren't allowed to visit the center. They also spoke with high-ranking officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the army and the government."

Frist Seeks $10 Billion For Humanitarian Assistance For North Korea. AFP (11/16) reports out-going Senate Majority leader Bill Frist introduced a bill "calling for the establishment of a $10 billion fund to prepare for any humanitarian crisis" in North Korea. Frist said President Bush should have "all necessary tools at his disposal to deal with foreseeable humanitarian contingencies on and around the Korean Peninsula." The retiring senator said the proposed legislation was to be "a sign of hope to the people of North Korea, who have suffered for six decades under one of the cruelest regimes the world has ever known."

DOJ_NMG_0094956

Administration's Iran Policy Seen As "Confused And Defensive." The Financial Times (11/16, Dinmore) reports, "Rarely has the Bush administration seemed so confused and defensive about its policy of seeking to isolate Iran as it responds to mounting public and international pressure to find a way out of Iraq, even if that involves making a U-turn and engaging Tehran. On Monday, in reply to a question about the US opening a dialogue with Iran over Iraq, the president made a direct link with the nuclear issue, demanding that Tehran first verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment program. Since then senior officials have had to row back from those comments on the nuclear link. A US offer, extended earlier this year to Tehran to discuss Iraq, can be 'reactivated,' officials said." For his part, Assistance Secretary McCormack said, "If, in the future, we want to avail ourselves of that channel, then it certainly is a possibility," noting that he "did not think it was under consideration." However, the Times says Deputy Assistant Secretary Satterfield "contradicted this assertion," telling a Senate committee Thursday that the US was "reviewing the timing of a 'direct dialogue' with Iran on the subject of Iraq." Meanwhile, "Analysts say that as the US scrambles to find an honorable exit from Iraq, opening a new channel to Iran is very much under consideration."

Similarly, the Washington Post (11/16, A22, Wright, 690K) reports that the White House is "under growing pressure to talk to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, but mounting violence in Iraq and the Bush administration's political woes give the negotiating edge to Tehran and Damascus and complicate any US outreach, experts say. The idea of talks is widely expected to be on the list of proposals that will come out of the Iraq Study Group report next month, because co-chairman and former secretary of state James A. Baker III and other members back engaging enemies as well as allies. British Prime Minister Tony Blair this week endorsed talking with Tehran and Damascus, with caveats. The CIA director and the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency said yesterday that talks could help. And an array of experts has encouraged the administration to reach out to the countries that have meddled most in Iraq. But the Bush administration is already questioning the idea, and even supporters admit that full cooperation by both Iran and Syria may have little impact on the many-sided insurgency. Neither country has much sway over Iraq's Sunnis or the al-Qaeda branch in Iraq, as both are ruled by Shiites or Shiite offshoots." The Post notes that Secretary Rice, traveling yesterday to a conference in Vietnam, said that she is prepared to talk to "anybody, anywhere, anytime" under circumstances in which she believed progress was really possible.

Author Says Olmert Sought "Green-Light" From Bush For Pre-Emptive Strike On Iran. In a Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) op-ed, Michael B. Oren, author and senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, recalls former President Lyndon B. Johnson's message to Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban in 1967 that "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." According to Oren, "A similar message was imparted by George W. Bush in his meeting earlier this week with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Much like 1967, Israel faces a Middle Eastern leader who has repeatedly sworn to wipe it off the map, and to that end is assiduously trying to acquire nuclear weapons. … In the absence of international commitment to thwart Iran's nuclear plans, Israel has no choice but to consider striking pre-emptively. Doing so, however, requires explicit US support, or at the very least, an indication that the US will not oppose such action. … Mr. Olmert came to Washington in search of a green light." However, Oren says the US is "hardly in the position to sanction an Israeli attack. Bogged down in Iraq and hemorrhaging political capital at home, Mr. Bush resembles Johnson in his inability to approve risky military initiatives." Therefore, he says Olmert and his government "must consider [the] consequences as they decide on Israel's next moves. The ramifications of that decision are certain to affect America as well. … Israel may indeed act alone, but in the minds of a great many people in the Middle East, the US acts with it."

Envoys Fail To Break Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions. AFP (11/16) reports, "Six major UN powers failed to break the deadlock in their bid to agree on a package of targeted sanctions against Iran over its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear fuel work." US Ambassador to the UN, John Bolton, said diplomats "did not make any progress" at talks Wednesday, but will "meet again in the near future." He also noted that the sanctions issue "may also be discussed at the foreign minister level on the margins" of the APEC summit in Hanoi.

During an appearance on CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (11/15), Bolton said, "It's pretty clear that Ahmadinejad is not at all impressed with the Security Council's last resolution which requires that Iran suspend its uranium enrichment activities. This is a key element of getting nuclear weapons capability. We're trying to move for sanctions in the Security Council. We've run into a roadblock with the Russians. We're still working on it. We met again today, but with no progress. … The International Atomic Energy Agency just issued another report saying that for the last three months, Iran has not cooperated at all in resolving some of the key unresolved questions. The Iranians are, obviously, feeling their oats and this is a real issue, whether the Security Council can follow through on its earlier resolution."

Iran Dismisses UN Report On Uranium. The AP (11/16, Karimi) reports Iran Wednesday "dismissed a UN report that inspectors found new traces of enriched uranium and plutonium at a nuclear waste facility, saying it had already explained that discovery." Meanwhile, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "insisted the West will gradually back down in its standoff with Iran and eventually accept its nuclear program." Speaking to a crowd during a visit to Iran's Kurdistan province, Ahmadinejad said, "While the West tries to thwart the progress of our nation, time is on our side. They would have to take one step back with every passing day and approve the right of the Iranian people."

DOJ_NMG_0094957

Pelosi's Views On China Likely To Set Tone In Congress. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, A4, King, 2.04M) reports that when Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker in January, her views on China -- which include "criticisms [of its] human-rights abuses and unfair trade practices, as well as allegations that China is manipulating its currency and seeking technologies to undermine US national security" – "could set the tone for a new Congress looking to get tough on Beijing." However, the Journal concedes that "just how much Mrs. Pelosi and other top Democrats will focus on China -- and how much influence they will have on China policy -- is hard to predict. But apprehensions run high in Beijing and Washington that a Pelosi-led, Democrat-controlled House could seize on China trade and security issues to bash President Bush, much as congressional Republicans did in the final years of the Clinton administration."

Israel Raids Gaza In Response To Palestinian Rocket Attack. The Washington Post (11/16, A18, Wilson, 690K) reports, "An Israeli woman was killed Wednesday in a Palestinian rocket strike on the town of Sderot, prompting some Israeli lawmakers to demand a sharp military response in an effort to end such attacks from the Gaza Strip." The attack "brought competing assertions of responsibility from the Hamas and Islamic Jihad movements, both of which said the attack on a residential neighborhood was retaliation for Israeli shelling last week." Meanwhile, the Washington Times (11/16, Mitnick, 88K) reports that "Israeli warplanes raided the Gaza Strip overnight" in retaliation for the Palestinian rocket attack. The Chicago Tribune (11/16, Greenberg, 617K) also reports on the attack.

WSJournal Says Human Rights Commission Biased Against Israel. The Wall Street Journal (11/16, 2.04M) editorializes that the UN's new Human Rights Council "has been worse," after replacing the Human Rights Commission this year, despite US objections. Legal scholar Bayefsky has "pointed out" the "obsessive focus on Israel." In July, the Council "condemned Israeli operations in the West Bank and Gaza," and in August, "it cited Israel for 'massive violations of human-rights' in Lebanon." Now the Council "has dispatched 'fact-finders' to Gaza to report on the latest fighting.

War Seen As Looming Between Somali Government, Islamists. McClatchy (11/16, Bengali) reports, "Five months after Islamist militias defeated a coalition of CIA-financed warlords, Somalia appears to be sliding toward a major war that diplomats fear will draw thousands of foreign fighters to the Islamist side and spill into neighboring countries. The rise of the Islamists, who took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and since have seized most of southern Somalia, already was a setback for US counterterrorism efforts in the region, where al-Qaida loyalists are believed to be hiding." McClatchy adds, "A full-scale war would be a major test for Bush administration policy in a place that Osama bin Laden has called a battlefield in his war against the West." Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Djibouti and Eritrea "are backing the Islamists with a dizzying influx of weapons, supplies and military personnel, according to a new United Nations report to be presented Friday to the UN Security Council. The support ranges from uniforms to first-aid kits to surface-to-air missiles, and, in one case, guerrilla training at a camp in Syria, the report says. On the other side is Somalia's weak interim government, backed by US ally Ethiopia, which the report says has sent thousands of troops to protect the government's hold on its only major outpost." A "senior US military officer conceded last week that the U.S. has no strategy in place should war break out."

GAO Audit Cites Waste In USAID's Cuban Program. The Washington Post (11/16, A12, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Nearly all of the $74 million a federal agency has spent on contracts to promote democracy in Cuba over the past decade has been distributed without competitive bidding or oversight in a program that opened the door to waste and fraud," according to a report released yesterday by the Government Accountability Office. In "one of the more extreme cases of apparent abuse," the GAO said the Miami-based Accion Democratica Cubana used government money to purchase "a gas chainsaw, computer gaming equipment and software (including Nintendo Game Boys and Sony PlayStations), a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat, and Godiva chocolates." Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who requested the audit along with Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.), "said the lack of oversight and the failure to follow government rules led to creation of a money trough that existed largely to provide jobs and operating funds to Miami-based activists who oppose Cuba's communist government." Meanwhile, Delahunt "said at a Capitol Hill news conference that he would hold hearings on issues raised in the audit when the new Congress convenes under Democratic leadership." In its official response to the 59-page GAO report, USAID said that it was "taking issue" with unspecified findings but that it would "seek to improve agency performance in managing, monitoring and evaluating this assistance." The AP (11/16, Abrams) runs a similar report.

DOJ_NMG_0094958

Cubans Using Alternate Routes Into US. The USA Today (11/16, Gomez, 2.27M) reports that as the Coast Guard and Border Patrol agents "are heavily focused on the eastern shore," more fleeing Cubans "driving high-speed boats are popping up on Florida's less-populated, less-patrolled southwestern coast." On Monday, "28 Cubans reached land in Naples," and on the previous day, "17 landed on Sanibel Island." That trend "forced the Border Patrol to shift a special unit to southwest Florida this year to help law enforcement track down the smugglers." New routes "account for only part of the recent upswing in Cuban migration to the USA."

Hughes Says Diplomacy Rules Have Improved Missions Abroad. In a letter to the editor of the Washington Post (11/16, A26, 690K), Undersecretary of State Karen Hughes writes, "The memorandum that was the subject of 'Karen's Rules on Diplomacy: Talk to the Media -- if You Dare' [Federal Page, Nov. 8] was originally distributed more than a year ago and is having its intended effect of freeing US ambassadors to engage with the media around the world. It's disappointing that neither The Post nor the organizational psychologists it consulted bothered to check with the State Department before publishing the article. If you had, you would have learned that these guidelines empower our ambassadors rather than restrict them." Hughes says that when she "arrived at the State Department and met with ambassadors last year, many told me that they felt they were not allowed to speak on the record to the media unless the interview was 'pre-cleared' by Washington. While this perception was not entirely accurate, many ambassadors hesitated to speak on the record without specific permission." In response, Hughes says the "the resulting rules cited by The Post have been applauded by our missions abroad; in fact, they were reissued at the request of public affairs officers because many ambassadors are new."

Kabila Reelected In Congo. The AP (11/16, Faul) reports, "Incumbent President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner Wednesday of Congo's tense runoff election, defeating his rival and ex-rebel leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba, in the country's first multiparty contest in more than four decades." Kabila "won with about 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for Bemba, said Apollinaire Malu Malu, chairman of the Independent Electoral Commission." The Washington Post (11/16, A18, McCrummen, 690K), among other newspapers, also reports on the election.

French Socialists May Nominate "Glamorous, Unmarried Mother" For President. USA Today (11/16, Stinson, 2.27M) reports, "Is France, which has been led by male political lions like Charles de Gaulle, Francois Mitterrand and now Jacques Chirac, ready for a female president? And a woman who is a glamorous, unmarried mother -- and a new-breed Socialist at that? Segolene Royal, 53, who hopes to be the republic's first female president, will get a partial answer to that question this week." Socialist Party members "go to the polls today to choose their nominee for April's presidential election. Results are due Friday. … If no candidate emerges with a majority Friday, Socialists will hold a runoff between the top two vote-getters next Thursday."

Annan Cites "Frightening Lack Of Leadership" On Global Warming. The New York Times (11/16, Gettleman, 1.16M) reports, "Secretary General Kofi Annan on Wednesday put the blame for global warming on 'a frightening lack of leadership,' saying the poorest people in the world, who do not even create much pollution, bear the brunt of rising temperatures." Said Annan, "The impact of climate change will fall disproportionately on the world's poorest countries, many of them here in Africa. … Poor people already live on the front lines of pollution, disaster and the degradation of resources and land." He adds that "for them…adaptation is a matter of sheer survival." The Times adds, "When pressed at a news conference afterward about his comments on poor leadership, Mr. Annan denied that he was singling out the United States."

Pakistan, India Start Peace Talks. The New York Times (11/16, Sengupta, 1.16M) reports, "Peace talks between India and Pakistan, which had stalled after the bombings of commuter trains in Mumbai in July, limped forward this week," but the "dialogue between their top diplomats ended Wednesday without movement on a crucial and closely watched item: India, having accused Pakistan of involvement in the Mumbai bombings." In a joint statement, the two nations "agreed to continue talking and said they had reached agreement on 'reducing the risk from accidents relating to nuclear weapons.'"

Pakistan Moves To Change Rape Law. The New York Times (11/16, Masood, 1.16M) reports that on Wednesday, the Pakistani government "finally pushed legislation through the lower house of Parliament to amend rape laws that human rights advocates say have led to punishment for thousands of innocent victims." The legislation "gives judges the discretion to try rape cases in a criminal rather than an Islamic court," and "allows forensic and circumstantial evidence to be used as a basis for convictions, as with other crimes." It also "introduces the concept of statutory rape, outlawing sex with girls under 16."

DOJ_NMG_0094959

The Washington Post/AP (11/16, A19, Garwood) also reports that Pakistan's lower house of Parliament "ditch[ed] the death penalty for extramarital sex and revising a clause on making victims produce four witnesses to prove rape cases." Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, "praised lawmakers for approving the amendments and criticized fundamentalists for their 'unnecessary' opposition and their claims that his government was acting against Islam." He said, "I have taken a firm decision to change these unjust rape laws as it was necessary to amend them to protect women."

US Support Builds To Release Libyan Dissident. The Washington Post (11/16, A20, Boustany, 690K) reports, "Several members of Congress, 36 human rights organizations in the United States and abroad, and other concerned citizens plan this week to send a petition to President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging them to take swift action" to secure the release of Fathi al-Jahmi, a leading Libyan dissident "a possible death sentence while being held in solitary confinement in Libya." The petition says, "The United States has now restored diplomatic relations with Libya." A State Department official said, "We do remain concerned about Libya's human rights record. We have raised Mr. al-Jahmi's case with Libyan authorities and we continue to do so since we have normalized relations. We want the Libyan government to release Fathi al-Jahmi immediately." Telephone calls to Ali Suleiman Aujali, Libya's ambassador to Washington, "were not returned."

Darfur Crisis Heightens For Chadian Children. NBC Nightly News (11/15, story 7, 2:10, Williams, 9.87M) reported that across the border in Chad, Ann Curry said, "We look at the children of this war. They are suffering from all of the violence. Even here children are vulnerable to soldiers who stalk the area, hope to kidnap and recruit boys. In the past few weeks villagers have been attacked and burned. As the fighting rages closer, there is no telling when he and his friends can go home."

Rosales Becomes Anti-Chavez Presidential Candidate. The AP (11/16, Toothaker) reports Manuel Rosales "has managed to galvanize the fractured opposition as its unity candidate to face Chavez in Dec. 3 elections, and is drawing giant crowds even though he trails the incumbent by 20 points or more in most opinion polls." However, in Venezuela's "highly polarized society, this former mayor of Maracaibo, the country's second-largest city, has seen the campaign take on religious overtones." Rosales is "one of just a handful of opposition politicians to remain a regional powerbroker in defiance of the pro-Chavez tide."

Al Jazeera Launches English-Language Channel. The CBS Evening News (11/15, story 11, 2:15, Couric, 7.66M) reported that al Jazeera, "the Arab television channel that has outraged much of the Western world by broadcasting messages from Osama bin Laden and a rogue's gallery of other terrorists," has "started a new channel, broadcasting in English. It's not exactly must-see TV; in fact, here in the US, it's can't-see TV." CBS (Wyatt) added, "Depending on where you live, al Jazeera's launch of a global English language channel marks either the first day of worldwide terror TV or the first global newscast not dominated by Western thinking."

LATimes Praises South Africa Over Legalization Of Gay Marriage. The Los Angeles Times (11/16, 850K) editorializes that the South African government's move to legalize gay marriage "reminded the world that its break from colonial apartheid wasn't just about changing the power structure. It was about conferring broad civil rights within its borders." The vote is "all the more extraordinary for its contrast with much of Africa on the question of homosexuality, which is illegal in most sub-Saharan countries." It's "regrettable" that South Africa will "allow civil officials to opt out of performing gay-marriage ceremonies," however "time might cure what Parliament didn't." South Africa is far from a perfect democracy, and government action alone," but on Tuesday, the nation "showed that it has shed the worst of its past and is growing into a rights-based democracy."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"L.A. Files Patient `Dumping' Charges."
"Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions."
"Game Is Afoot For Sony's PlayStation3."
"Even War Can't Stop Her Party."
"Iraq Pullout Talk Makes Iran Uneasy."
"Airport Hotels Ordered To Pay A `Living Wage'."

USA Today:
"Neanderthal Genome Mapping Begins."
"General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout."
"Nev. Town To Fine For Foreign Flags."

New York Times:
"General Warns Of Risks In Iraq if G.I.'s Are Cut."

DOJ_NMG_0094960

"US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1."
"In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott."
"Plea Deal In Seton Hall Dormitory Fire."
"Agricultural Mainstay Gets A New, Urban Face."
"New DNA Test Is Yielding Clues To Neanderthals."

Washington Post:
"O'Malley Faces A Run Of Budget Shortfalls."
"In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines."
"Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn."
"D.C. Moves To Become Pioneer In Forcing 'Green' Construction."
"Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry."
"New Methods Let Scientists Analyze Neanderthal DNA."
"Pelosi's Role In Leadership Race Splits Democrats."

Washington Times:
"Episcopal Leaders Vote To Leave."
"Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle."
"Group Helps Siblings Save On D.C. Utility Bills."
"Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats."
"House Race Pits Murtha vs. Ethics."
"Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched."

Detroit Free Press:
"Ailing Ford's Crucial Edge Crossover Is Running Late."
"POWER PLAY: New Sony, Nintendo Systems Go Head-To-Head For Holiday Dollars."
"MITCH ALBOM: He Made Them Believe."
"United Way Beats Goal."
"Levin, General Tangle On Iraq."
"Auction To Unload New Condos, Homes."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"A Grab For Delta."
"Katrina Brought Chaos To CDC."
"GOP's Lott Comes Back In No. 2 Role."

Houston Chronicle:
"Baylor Teams With UNICEF For Largest AIDS Initiative."
"Victim Says He Has No Memory Of Pipe Assault."
"Enron's Top Accountant Sentenced To 5 Years, Fine."
"Texas Windstorm Coverage Rates Up 4.1 Percent."
"Tougher Texas Grad Plan Gets An Early OK."
"Houston Mayor Searches For New City Marketer."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; Americans Soldiers Killed-Iraq; Al Qaeda Recruiting; Bush-In Asia; US Airways Bids For Delta; Severe Weather; Tsunami Warning; Medicare Drug Plan; Lott Back In Republican Leadership; Abramoff-Six Year Sentence; Defense Travel System-Too Costly; Sony Playstation 3 On Sale; Atlanta Aquarium.
CBS: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; Senator Levin Interview; Iraq Mass Kidnapping-Aftermath; US Airways Bid For Delta; Severe Weather; Abramoff-Six Year Sentence; Lott back In Republican Leadership; Immigration Reform; Male Biological Clock; Democrats For President 2008; Al Jazeera Goes English.
NBC: Status On Iraq Sectarian Violence; ISG Goes To Work; US Airways Bid For Delta; US Airways Bid-Analysis; Lott Back In Republican Leadership; Darfur Crisis; Severe Weather; Republican's Angry Over Election Results; OJ' s Book; Veterans Return Too Teach.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Visits Asian Civilizations Museum, Singapore; meets with US Embassy staff, Shangri-La Hotel, Singapore; courtesy call with the Acting President of Singapore, the Istana; meets with the Prime Minister of Singapore, the Istana; speaks at the National University of Singapore; attends social dinner with the Prime Minister of Singapore and Mrs. Lee.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Tours the National Library. Singapore.

US Senate: 9:30 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Readiness and Management Support Subcommittee. Hearing on the DoD business systems modernization and financial management. Comptroller General David Walker, GAO; Army Secretary Francis Harvey; Navy Secretary Donald Winter; Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne. Location: Room 232A, Russell.

9:30 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department. Assistant Attorney General Wan Kim; Michael A. Carvin, partner, Jones Day; Ted Shaw, director-counsel and president, NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund; Robert N. Driscoll, partner, Alston and Bird; Joseph Rich, director, Fair Housing and Community Development, Lawyer's Committee for Civil Rights Under Law. Location: Room 226, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Full Committee. Hearing on reauthorization of the Pipeline Safety Program. Vice Admiral Thomas J. Barrett, USCG (Ret.), Administrator, Pipeline and Hazardous Materials Safety Administration; Timothy Felt, President and CEO, Explorer Pipeline Company; Terry Boss, Senior Vice President, Environment, Safety and Operations, Interstate Natural Gas Association of America; E. Frank Bender, Vice President of Gas Distribution and New Business Division, Baltimore Gas and Electric Company. Mr. Carl

DOJ_NMG_0094961

Weimer, Executive Director, Pipeline Safety Trust. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. HEALTH, EDUCATION, LABOR AND PENSIONS _ Full Committee. Hearing on proposals to improve drug safety and innovation at the FDA. Sheila Burke, Institute of Medicine; Diane Thompson, Glaser Pediatrtic AIDS Foundation; Steven Nissen, Cleveland Clinic; Adrian Thomas, Johnson and Johnson Pharmaceutical Group; Jim Guest, Consumers Union; Greg Simon, FasterCures. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY AND GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS _ Permanent Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on the Defense Travel System.Acting DoD Inspector General Thomas Gimble; McCoy Williams, GAO; Undersecretary of Defense David Chu. Location: Room 342, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES _ Public Lands and Forests Subcommittee. Hearing on pending legislation. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. FINANCE _ Health Care Subcommiyttee. Hearing on the CHIP program. Nate Checketts, Director of Bureau of Access, Utah Department of Health; Lisa C. Dubay, Associate, Bloomberg School of Public Health, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore; Sharon Carte, Executive Director, West Virginia CHIP State Capital Complex, Charleston; Nina Owcharenko, The Heritage Foundation; Ann C. Kohler, Director, Division of Medical Assistance & Health Services, Department of Human Services, Trenton, N.J. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on pending matters. Location: Room 219, Hart.

US House: 9 a.m. SELECT INTELLIGENCE _ Full Committee. Closed briefing on global hotspots. Location: Room H-405, Capitol.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Immigration, Border Security and Claims Subcommittee. Continued hearing on the Energy Employees Occupational Illness Compensation Program Act. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

1 p.m. INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on reforming foreign assistance programs.USAID Administrator Randall Tobias. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

Other: GOPAC _ GOPAC holds its Fall Charter meeting. Highlights: 8 a.m. Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. 10 a.m. Discussion on what is going to be the next big threat, with Michael Ledeen, American Enterprise Institute; John Lenczowski, The Institute of World Politics; Daniel Pipes, Middle East Forum. 12:30 p.m. Luncheon speaker - Sen. Chuck Hagel. 3:30 p.m. Session on the next steps for the GOP, with Sen. Mitch McConnell, Craig Shirley. 7 p.m. Dinner speaker - Sen. John McCain. Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

BIOETHICS _ The President's Council on Bioethics holds a meeting. Highlights: 9 a.m. Session 1: Stem Cell Research Update. Hans Robert Scholer, Ph.D. Director, Cell and Developmental Biology, Max Planck Institute for Molecular Biomedicine. 10:45 a.m. Session 2: Stem Cell Research Update and Alternative Sources of Pluripotent Stem Cells (May 2005). 2 p.m. Session 3: Overview: Genetics Research and Clinical Applications. Robert L. Nussbaum, M.D., Holly Smith Distinguished Professor of Medicine, Chief, Medical Genetics, University of California, San Francisco. 3:45 p.m. Session 4: Overview: Genetic Ethics and Public Policy. Kathy Hudson, Director, Genetics and Public Policy Center, Johns Hopkins University. Location: Hamilton Crowne Plaza Hotel, 1001 14th St. NW.

FEDERALIST SOCIETY _ The Federalist Society holds its 2006 National Lawyers Convention. Highlights: 9 a.m. Solicitor General Paul Element. 11:30 a.m. White House Domestic Poolicy Adviser Karl Zinsmeister. 12 p.m. Session on telecommunications, with William Barr of Verizon, Paul Misener of Amazon.com, others. 1:45 p.m. Session on Criminal law, terrorists and criminal prosecutions, with Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch, Southern District of New York Judge Kenneth Karas, Assistant Attorney General Kenneth Wainstein. 3 p.m. Sen. John McCain. 7 p.m. Annual Dinner, with Supreme Court Justices Samuel Alito, Jr. Marriott Wardman Park, 2660 Woodley Rd. NW. Location: Renaissance Mayflower Hotel, 1127 Connecticut Ave. NW, unless otherwise noted.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE _ 7 a.m. - 2:30 p.m. The Woodrow Wilson Center's Program on Science, Technology, America, and the Global Economy hosts a half-day conference on November to examine the economic strategies of advanced and emerging market countries and their impact on the United States. Highlights: 7:30 a.m. Opening Remarks., Lee H. Hamilton, President and Director, Woodrow Wilson Center; Kent Hughes, Director, Program on Science, Technology, America and the Global Economy, Woodrow Wilson Center. 7:45 a.m. Keynote Addresses. Sens. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn.; and Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M. 9 a.m. Panel I - Strategies in Industrial Countries. Chair/Moderator Steven Pearlstein, Washington Post; France and Germany--Mark Lehrer, Sawyer Business School, Suffolk University; Japan--Mark Tilton, Purdue University; United Kingdom and Ireland--Gary Hufbauer, Institute for International Economics. 10:15 a.m. Panel II - Strategies in Emerging Market Countries. Vhair/Discussant John Cranford, CQ Weekly. China--Carl Dahlman, Georgetown University India--T.N. Srinivasan, Yale University. Southeast Asia--Bryan Ritchie, James Madison College, Michigan State University. 12:15 p.m. Luncheon and Panel III - Policy and Private Sector Implications. Chair/Discussant Bruce Stokes, National

DOJ_NMG_0094962

Journal. Negotiating with Advanced Developing Countries--Vinod Aggarwal, University of California, Berkeley. Investing for Competitiveness--Susan Butts, Dow Chemical Company. U.S. Public Policy--Rob Atkinson, Information Technology and Innovation Foundation. What Can the United States Do?--Ralph Gomory, President, Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. 1:15 p.m. Summary Remarks--Katherine Hauser, TransAtlantic Business Dialogue Kent Hughes, Woodrow Wilson Center. 1:45 p.m. Brainstorming and Discussion.

OBAMA _ 8 a.m. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., attends a senators-elect orientation breakfast. Location: Room S-211, Capitol.

PRAYER BREAKFAST _ 8 a.m. Congressional Prayer Breakfast, hostedby Rep. J. Gresham Barrett, for newly elected members of Congress. Closed press. Location: Room H-120, Capitol. Notes: Stakeout in the Hall of Columns.

DEMOCRATIC CAUCUS _ 9 a.m. Meeting of the House Democratic Caucus for leadership elections. Location: Cannon Caucus Room.

ELECTION-MIDEAST _ 9 a.m. The New America Foundation holds a forum dealing with a realistic post-election assessment of the Mideast, with Rita Hauser, Chair, International Peace Academy. Location: 7th floor, 1630 Connecticut Ave. NW.

CONGRESS-HEALTH CARE _ 9:30 a.m. American University sponsors a forum on health care initiatives in the new Congress and by the 2008 presidential hopefuls, with former Sen. John Breaux, former DNC Chairman Terry McAuliffe, former RNC Chairman Ed Gillespie, others. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

MENTAL HEALTH _ 9:30 a.m. The National Mental Health Association will introduce a new agenda and name during a Capitol Hill ``launch'' event. Under its new name, Mental Health America, the century-old organization will work to improve the health and quality of life of all people by helping them live mentally healthier lives. Mental Health America also will release its national attitudinal survey on American's perceptions of mental health. Participants are Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I.; A. Kathryn Power, director of the Center for Mental Health Services, SAMHSA; David Shern, president and CEO of Mental Health America; and hHealth care stakeholders from across the country. Location: Upper Senate Park on Capitol Hill (on New Jersey Avenue between Louisiana and Delaware Avenues near the fountain).

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 10 a.m. Sen. James Inhofe holds a news conference with scientists to discuss climate change and comment on the UN climate conference in Kenya. Location: Room 328A, Russell.

EVANGELICAL MOBILIZATION _ 10 a.m. The Evangelical Climate Initiative holds a news conference to launch an expanded campaign to educate and mobilize evangelicals on global warming. Location: Riverside Baptist Church, 680, ``Eye'' St. SW.

GOLD STAR FAMILIES _ 10 a.m. Move America holds a news conference to report on the trip to Iraq by Gold Star Families whose children died in Operation Iraqi Freedom. The delegation has just returned from Iraq and is releasing the Gold Star Families Iraq Survey Group report on their trip, including recommendations for the future role of the United States in Iraq. Participants include Congressman Duncan Hunter, Chairman, House Armed Services Committee; and John Ubaldi, Veteran of Operation Iraqi Freedom. Location: JW Marriott Hotel, Longworth Room, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

US-CHINA _ 10 a.m. The US-China Economic and Security Review Commission releases its 2006 annual report to Congress. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

DODD _ 11 a.m. Sen. Christopher Dodd speaks at Howard University to issue a call to action to confront the nation's problems, using ideals that have always inspired patriotism. Location: School of Business Auditorium, Howard University, 2600 6th St. NW.

WOMEN OF THE STORM _ 11 a.m. Sen. Mary L. Landrieu, D-La., joins members of the Louisiana Congressional delegation and grassroots leaders, including the Women of the Storm, to encourage the passage of legislation to provide energy producing states with a share of offshore oil and gas revenues and dedicate the funding to coastal wetlands restoration and hurricane protection. Location: Room SC-6, Capitol.

COMPETETIVENESS _ 11 a.m. - 12 p.m. Newt Gingrich, former Speaker of the House, holds a press conference with David Abshire, President, Center for the Study of the Presidency; former Special Counsel to President Reagan and former Ambassador to NATO; Larry Wortzel, Chairman, U.S.-China Economic and Security Review Commission and Vice President for Foreign Policy, Heritage Foundation; and Rep. Jim Cooper, D-Tenn., House Armed Services Committee. They wil challenge the Administration and Congress to provide greater Defense Department funding of basic research; upport full funding of President Bushs American Competitiveness Initiative; and Release of the 2006 Benchmarks Report of the Task Force on the Future of American Innovation. Location: Reserve Officers Association, One Constitution Ave. NE, 5th Floor Conference Room.

MCCAIN _ 12 p.m. Sen. John McCain speaks a a luncheon on energy, environmental and economic priorities, sponsored by the Nicholas Institute for Environmental Policy Solutions at Duke University. Location: Mellon Auditorium, 13th St. and Constitution Ave. NW.

ALL-VOLUNTEER FORCE _ 1 p.m. The Miltary Officers Association of America and the National Defense

DOJ_NMG_0094963

University Foundation host a discussion, ``Can We Sustain the All-Volunteer Force in an Extended Conflict?'' Panelists include Gen. Barry McCaffrey, USA ret.; Michael Dominguez, principal undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness; and Selective Service System Director Bill Chatfield. Location: Double Tree Hotel, Crystal Ballroom, Salons A and B, 300 Army Navy Drive, Arlington, Va.

DEMOCRATS-MINIMUM WAGE _ 2 p.m. Senators Kennedy, Schumer, Harkin and Clinton will join leaders and activists from the six states that passed minimum wage initiatives to affirm their commitment to raising the federal minimum wage. Location: Room 430, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

LABOR AWARDS _ 2:30 p.m. US Secretary of Labor Elaine L. Chao hosts the Labor Hall of Fame induction ceremony. This year's inductees are Alfred E. Smith, former Governor of New York and presidential candidate; and Charles R. Walgreen Sr., founder of the drug store chain that bears his name. Location: U.S. Department of Labor, Great Hall, 200 Constitution Ave. NW.

PETRAEUS _ 5 p.m. Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, commanding general of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center, gives a lecture at the School of Advanced International Studies on ``Soldiering and the Schoolhouse.'' Location: Kenney Auditorium, 1740 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

NUCLEAR TERRORISM _ 6 p.m. Georgetown University holds a panel discussion on nuclear terrorism, with retired Gen. Lt. Gen. Robert Gard, Douglas Shaw of the Institute for International Law and Politics, others. Location: Copley Formal Lounge, on campus.

GLENN AWARD _ 7:30 p.m. The National Defense University Foundation hosts its America Patriot Award Gala, honoring John H. Glenn Jr, pioneer astronaut and former U.S. senator. Location: Ronald Reagan Building, 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, November 16, 2006 8:13 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, November 16, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061116.pdf; dojclips061116.doc

This morning's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNewsâ€™ express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Prosecutors Urge Jurors To Convict Colombian Rebel Leader (AP)....4
US Argues Harsh Treatment Shouldn't Undercut Padilla Case (CSM)....5
Lawyers Try To Stop Gitmo Med Procedure (AP)....7
German Court Finds Sept. 11 Terrorist Guilty Of Abetting Murder (BLOOM)....8
German 9/11 Trial Underscores Need For Better Global Cooperation (CSM)....8
A Better Way To Fight Terrorism (WP)....9

Homeland Response:

Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared (KTVT)....10
Feds Bust UMass Student For Sears Tower Bomb Hoax (BOSH)....12
Judge Rejects Request To Strike Don't-tell-how-to-make-a-bomb Law (SDUT)....12
Steven Hatfill Demands Fines For N.Y. Times (NYS)....13
Lawyer Disputes Feds' Claim That His Client Engaged In 'Overt Sexual Activity' On Airliner (AP)....13
Allard Lobbies For Supermax Funding (RMN)....14

War News:

General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout (USAT)....14
General Warns Against Iraq Exit Timeline (FT)....15
Facing Withdrawal Demands, Abizaid Calls For More Troops (LAT)....15
General Warns Of Risks In Iraq If G.I.'s Are Cut (NYT)....17
Abizaid Says Withdrawal Would Mean More Unrest (WP)....18
Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats (WT)....20
With Politics As Subtext, Senators Clash On Iraq (NYT)....21
New Armed Services Chairs Oppose Iraq (AP)....22
U.S. Military Leaders Oppose Timetable On Iraq (MCT)....23
Dems Call For More Urgency On Iraq (CSM)....24
The "Stay Or Leave" Debate In The US Finds A Mirror In Baghdad (NYT)....25
Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn (WP)....26
Iran Hints That US Shouldn't Withdraw From Iraq Too Soon (LAT)....28
US Should Add Troops To Prevent Disaster In Iraq (RC)....30
About 70 Freed After Mass Iraq Abduction (AP)....31
Kidnappings Stir Political Dispute In Iraq (NYT)....33
In Iraqi Colleges, Fear For An Already Shrunken Realm (WP)34
US Troops Look For An Inside Man In Iraqi Slayings (LAT)....36
Nurture Iraqi Democracy, From The Ground Up (LAT)....38
Unleash The Shiites? (LAT)....39
Police In Anbar Province Lack Protection, Pay (USAT)....40
Soldier Pleads In Iraq Rape, Murder Case (AP)....41
Taliban, Al-Qaeda Resurge In Afghanistan, CIA Says (WP)....42
Christmas Tree Growers Want To Give U.S. Troops Abroad A Little Bit Of Home (USAT/AP)....43

Corporate Scandals:

Enron's Causey Sentenced To 5 1/2 Years (AP)....44
Case Closed: Last Top Enron Exec Sentenced (USAT)....44
Former Enron Accountant Gets 51/2 Years For Fraud (WP)..45
SEC Intensifies Probe Into Dell's Accounting (AAS)....46
Dell To Delay Results As SEC Begins A Formal Probe (WSJ)47
Dell Accounting Inquiry Made Formal By S.E.C. (NYT)....48
Former HP Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty In Spying Scandal (AP)....49
Audit Clears SEC's Financial Statements (WP)....49
Ousters Can Raise Chance Of Charges (LAT)....50

Criminal Law:

Disgraced Lobbyist Jack Abramoff Reports To Prison (AP)....51
Abramoff Begins Serving Sentence At Maryland Prison (LAW)52
Another Guilty Plea In 2002 Phone-jam Case (MANUL)....53

Judge Sentences TV Advertiser To 86 Months For Selling Faulty Computers (AP) 53
Authorities Form Multinational Unit To Hunt Pedophiles (USAT) 54
Judge Rejects Challenge To Evidence In Cuban Agent Case (AP) 55
Officials Cannot Confirm Whitey Bulger 'Sighting' (BOS) 55
Feds To Be On Alert At Whitey Galpal's Mom's Burial Today (BOSH) 56
Official Admits Accepting Bribe (NSL) 56
West Long Branch Councilman Admits Taking Bribe (NSDY/AP) 57
John Dougherty's Home Searched In Federal Probe (PHI) 57
FBI Joins Johnson School Inquiry (LEXHL) 58
NY Authorities Bring Down Huge Gambling Ring, Arrest Poker Player (AP) 58
Online Bookie Ring Has Link To Miami (MH) 60
Dozens Charged With Running Gambling Ring (WP) 61
27 Arrested In City's 'Largest' Betting Bust (NSDY) 61
$3.3 BIL CASINO ROYALE (NYPOST) 62
You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed (NYDN) 64
Campaign Gifts To Governor Probed (MH) 65
Vernon Mayor, Former City Administrator Charged With Corruption (LAT) 66
In Murder Case, New Evidence But Same Cell (NYT) 66
Simpson Revisits Infamous Case (LAT) 68

Civil Law:

Unions Object To New Bonus Plan For Dana Executives (AP) 70

Civil Rights:

Suspect In LAPD Excessive Force Probe Enters Plea And Is Released (LAT) 71
Video Arrest Subject Pleads No Contest (NSDY/AP) 71
LAPD Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe (AP) 72
More Racist Graffiti Reported In Charles (WP) 72
Counting The Vote, Badly (NYT) 73

Antitrust:

U.S. Opens Criminal Probe Of Banks' Municipal Deals (Correct) (BLOOM) 74
KKR, Carlyle, 11 Others Accused Of Rigging Buyouts (Update2) (BLOOM) 75
US Airways Bids To Acquire Delta And No. 1 Rank (WP) 75
US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1 (NYT) 77
US Airways Presses Delta Over $8bn Offer (FT) 79
US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (PPG) 80
US Airways Announces Takeover Bid For Delta (LAT) 82
US Airways Proposes $8.7 Billion Delta Air Takeover (Update15) (BLOOM) 82
US Air Faces Long Road In Delta Bid (USAT) 85
US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (WT) 87
US Airways Proposes To Merge With Delta (WSJ) 88
Federal Watchdogs Likely To Approve Deal (AJC) 90
Hostile Approach Set To Face Tough Antitrust Probe (FT) 91
US Airways' $8 Billion Bid For Delta May Unleash New Consolidation (FWJD) 91
Do Fliers Gain When Airlines Consolidate? (WSJ) 93
US Airways Bid For Delta Could Spur Consolidations (FWST) 95
Let Delta Fly Right (LAT) 97
Micron Subpoenaed In Price-fixing Probe; Two Idahoans Sue (IDAHOST) 98
AT&T Merger May Face Further Scrutiny (SAEN) 98
Microsoft Still Short On Data, The EU Says (AP) 99

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Environmentalists Sue Bush Administration Over Global Warming Report (AP) 100
Court Asked To Rescind EPA Decision Allowing Field Burning (AP) 101
Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry (WP) 102
Isleta Settlement Gets Approval From Senate (AP) 103

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mob Reappears In Court (PHI) 103
U.S. Charges Detroit Man In Fentanyl Deaths (AP) 104
Feds Charge Suspect In Fentanyl Deaths (DN) 104
Notes: U.S. Rules Won't Be Party To Bode-type Behavior (USAT) 105
Bikers Sentenced For Meth-making (AP) 106
Meth Makers Get Prison (FREEP) 106
Police: Meth Crisis Minimized In Area (PHTH) 107
Livermore Seeks Permanent Ban On Marijuana Dispensaries (TH) 107
Gardena Joins Bans On Medical Marijuana Outlets (TDB) 108
Mexican Cartels Expand Meth Dealing In U.S. (ABC) 109
Meth, Ecstacy, Heroin Readily Available (WT/UPI) 110
Canada-based Drug Traffickers Peddling More Ecstasy In U.S., Says Report (CP) 110
U.S. Officials Troubled By Expansion Of Asian-Canadian Drug Gangs (GM) 111

DOJ_NMG_0094967

Fugitives Answer Call To Surrender (USAT) 112

Immigration:

29 Immigrants Arrested For Visa Fraud (USAT) 113
DHS Watchdog Warns 'Fence' Cost Will Grow (WP) 114
We Must Start Over On Immigration Reform (HILL) 115
No Mandate For Amnesty (USAT) 116

Tax:

The Economic Agenda (WP) 116

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Put Nominations Back On Table (NYT) 117
White House Resubmits Appeals Court Nominees Opposed By Democrats (AP) 118
Bush Resubmits Six U.S. Appellate Court Nominees (Update1) (BLOOM) 118
Bush Renominates Judicial Picks (WP) 119
Bush Resubmits 6 For Judgeships (WT) 120
House, Senate Pass Stopgap Funding Bill (AP-Y) 121
Past Is Not Prologue For Gates (HILL) 121
Lott Beats Alexander 25-24 For Comeback (HILL) 123
Lott Returns To Senate Leadership (WSJ) 124
Senate Republicans Tap Lott For No. 2 Leadership Job (USAT) 125
Republicans Return Lott To Leadership (AP-Y) 126
Trent Lott Rejoins Senate GOP Leadership (LAT) 127
In The End, It's Lott By A Single Ballot (RC) 128
Sen. Lott Returns To GOP Leadership With One-Vote Victory (CQ) 129
In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott (NYT) 130
Lott Rejoins Senate Leadership (WP) 132
Lott Returns To GOP Leadership Position (MCT) 133
The More Things Change ... (NYT) 134
Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents (NCP) 135
Senate GOP Focusing More On Big Picture Than Lame Duck (HILL) 135
May The Best Bulldog Win: GOP Rivals (HILL) 137
To Learn From '06, We Must Heed Lessons Of '94 (RC) 139
Conservative Democrats Seek Larger Role (AP-Y) 140
'Tuesday Dogs' May Join Forces (RC) 141
What You Heard About 'Conservative Democrats' Winning Was Wrong (RC) 142
Which Bipartisanship Will Bush Choose? (WSJ) 143
Murtha Calls Ethics Bill 'Total Crap' (RC) 144
Many Say Leadership Race Damages Democrats' Image (NYT) 145
House Race Pits Murtha Vs. Ethics (WT) 146
Dem Division And Dismay (HILL) 147
Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions (LAT) 149
Pelosi Faces Leadership Test With Vote (AP-Y) 151
Pelosi Splits Democrats With Push For Murtha (WP) 152
New Congress Vows To Clean Up Act (CSM) 153
Pelosi's First Mistake (WP) 154
Same Old Congressional Hacks (LAT) 155
Pelosi And Pork (WSJ) 156
Black Lawmakers In Line For Key Posts (WP) 157
Blacks Eye Leading 5 House Committees (WT) 158
Reid Plotting Agenda (RC) 159
Time Of Testing For Harry Reid (WP) 160
Can The Democrats Deliver? (WP) 161
Pension Deficit Narrows At PBGC (WP/AP) 163
Government Admits Improper Farm Payments (AP-Y) 163
Rumsfeld Adviser Leaving For Think Tank (AP) 164
Pentagon's Travel System Is Hardly Used (AP) 165
Detroit And Bush (WSJ) 165

Other News:

Fed Points To Soft Landing For Economy (FT) 166
Fed Keeps Policy Attention Firmly On Inflation (WSJ) 167
Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns (USAT) 168
What Slowdown? Stocks March On To Fresh Highs (WSJ) 169
In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines (WP) 169
Most Students In Big Cities Lag Badly In Basic Science (NYT) 172
Urban Students Perform Worse At Science (AP) 173
KBR Becomes Separate Stock (USAT) 175
Dems May Expand Senate Majority In '08 (HILL) 175
Family-friendly Agenda Urged (WT) 177
Stan Greenberg And James Carville (CSM) 177
Flush Of Victory Past, Democrats Revert To Finger-Pointing (NYT) 178
Carville Says Dems Should Dump Dean Over "Rumsfeldian" Incompetence (AAS) 180
GOP's Simmons Concedes Conn. House Race (AP-Y) 180
Simmons Concedes Defeat To Courtney In Connecticut 2 (CQ) 181
2 Incumbent Dems Keep House Seats In Ga. (AP-Y) 181
Two Democrats Win In Georgia (NYT) 182
Grading The Pollsters (WSJ) 182
Putting Faith Before Politics (NYT) 184
Alabama Lazarus Act (WSJ) 186
McCain Committee Lays Groundwork For '08 Bid (USAT) 187

DOJ_NMG_0094968

McCain Takes Step Toward White House Bid (AP-Y).....187
McCain Moves Toward '08 Presidential Run (LAT) 188
Ex-Bush Aide To Explore Presidential Run (AP-Y).....189
Analysis: Clinton Undecided On '08 Run (AP-Y) 190
Political Lessons (WP) 191
Bush's Asia Trip To Focus On Trade, Terrorism (LAT) 192
Asians Ask How Elections Affect Trade (USAT).....193
Bush Seeks To Reassure Allies On Trade (AP-Y).....194
Blow To Bush As Vietnam Trading Bill Rejected (FT) 195
Trade Bills Now Face Tough Odds (NYT) 196
Bad Start For Bipartisanship On Trade Issues (FT) 198
Bush, In Asia, Faces A Test Of Diplomatic Muscle (NYT)....198
Bush, Putin Discuss Iran, Korea (WT).....199
Bush's Visit To Vietnam Sparks Hope In Little Saigon (LAT) 200
Rice Backs Trying To Restart Trade Talks (AP) 201
Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle (WT).....202
Foreign Students Trickling Back To US (CSM) 203
Open Campuses (WP).....204
President Visits Briefly With Putin On Way To Asia (AP) 205
Bush And Putin To Sign WTO Deal In Hanoi (FT).....205
Democrats Blast Bush Policy On N. Korea (WP).....206
Democrats Urge N. Korea Nuclear Talks (AP) 207
Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown In NKorea Allusion (AFP).....207
North Korean Officials Proud Of Their Nuclear Test, U.S. Experts Say (MCT).....208
US Senator Seeks 10 Billion Dollars For North Korean Human Crisis (AFP).....209
White House Hunts For Way Into Iran Talks (FT).....210
As Pressure For Talks Grows, Iran And Syria Gain Leverage (WP) 211
Abba Olmert (WSJ) 212
Six Major Powers Fail To Bread Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions (AFP).....213
Iran Dismisses U.N. Report On Uranium (AP) 214
China Could Find Congress A Chillier Place (WSJ).....215
Palestinian Rocket Fire Kills Israeli Woman (WP) 216
Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched (WT)217
Hamas Claims Responsibility For Fatal Rocket Attack (CHIT) 218
'Human Rights' Council (WSJ).....219
War Between Islamists, Government Is Brewing In Somalia (MCT) 220
GAO Audit Finds Waste In Cuban Aid Program (WP).....221
Report Cites Flaws In Cuba Aid Program (AP-Y).....222
More Cubans Take Trip To USA, Using Alternate Routes (USAT) 223
Empowering, Not Muzzling, Our Ambassadors (WP) 225
Kabila Wins Election Runoff In Congo (AP).....225
Incumbent Declared Winner In Congo Vote (WP) 226
'Glamorous' Socialist Seeks French Presidency (USAT) 227
Annan Faults 'Frightening Lack Of Leadership' For Global Warming (NYT) 229
Talks By India And Pakistan Make No Gains On Train Blasts (NYT).....230
Pakistan Moves Toward Altering Rape Law (NYT) 231
Pakistan Moves To Amend Rape Laws (WP/AP).....232
Support Builds For Libyan Dissident (WP).....233
Presidential Candidate Bucks Chavez Tide (AP) 234
No Apartheid For Gays, Either (LAT) 235

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Prosecutors Urge Jurors To Convict Colombian Rebel Leader (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – The government urged jurors Wednesday to convict Colombian rebel leader Ricardo Palmera, saying he should be held responsible in a plot to keep three Americans hostage, whatever his politics.

But the defense portrayed Palmera as a man who deserves jurors' benefit of the doubt as a tangential leftist sympathizer caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government.

DOJ_NMG_0094969

"By definition, if you're a rebel, no state is ever going to recognize you. By definition, a prosecutor is always waiting for you," said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. "It tells you, 'Don't go for the labels of terrorist. Don't go for the misstatements of evidence.'"

In closing arguments, Justice Department attorney Kenneth Kohl exhorted the jury to look past the "political smoke" in the five-week trial of Palmera, who has called the aims of his FARC leftist group noble and peaceful.

"FARC is not above the law," Kohl said, as Palmera, dressed in khaki pants, a navy blazer and green tie, quietly scribbled on a notepad. "Holding people against their will for political purposes is what terrorism is."

Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan instructed the 12-member jury to begin deliberations Thursday in a case in which the lives of the three Americans – who are still being held in the thick jungles of south Colombia – may hang in the balance.

"You should not speculate on the impact your verdict might have on their situation," Hogan said, as relatives of the hostages – Marc Gonsalves, Thomas Howes and Keith Stansell – sat nearby.

Palmera, 56, is charged with hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists after a plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in Colombia in February 2003.

Palmera, who is better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States.

FARC, listed by the U.S. government as a "foreign terrorist organization," is demanding that the Colombia government release all of the group's imprisoned members, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of some 60 hostages.

The hostages include the three Americans on the plane who authorities says were defense contractors involved in a counternarcotics mission.

President Alvaro Uribe recently broke off preliminary negotiations after blaming the rebel group for a car bombing in a military installation that injured more than 20 people, insisting that the hostages would be freed by military operations.

Visiting Washington on Monday, Uribe contended that imprisoning Palmera would ultimately lead to a more stable peace.

"Condemning the terrorists pushes away immediate peace, but constructs a solid peace," he said. "Not condemning the terrorists creates an artificial peace."

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 lives a year.

In the past six years, the U.S. government has provided $4 billion in mostly military aid to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the country's enormous drug trade.

US Argues Harsh Treatment Shouldn't Undercut Padilla Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

The case of suspected Al Qaeda sympathizer Jose Padilla is raising fundamental questions about whether a US citizen's harsh treatment - and alleged torture - while in US military custody should prevent his later prosecution in the criminal-justice system.

Lawyers for Mr. Padilla charge that he was tortured while being held for three years and eight months as an enemy combatant in a military prison in Charleston, S.C. The lawyers are asking that all criminal charges against him be dropped because of the government's alleged illegal and abusive treatment.

Federal prosecutors responded for the first time this week to the accusations, telling US District Judge Marcia Cooke in a written motion that Padilla was not tortured or abused. But even if he had been tortured, they added, there is no legal support for Padilla's request that all charges against him be dismissed.

"Padilla has not cited a single precedent absolutely barring a federal criminal prosecution because of alleged due process violations committed during a prior military detention," writes Assistant US Attorney Russell Killinger.

DOJ_NMG_0094970

Padilla's case, pending in US District Court here, highlights the murky intersection between the Bush administration's open-ended interrogation of enemy combatants to collect intelligence and the subsequent transfer of an enemy combatant who is also a US citizen to face punishment in the criminal-justice system.

Padilla is best known for allegedly plotting with Al Qaeda to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" in a major US city. But when he was transferred from military custody to the civilian court system in January to face criminal charges, the dirty-bomb plot and other detailed information obtained by military interrogators was excluded from the indictment.

Instead, he is facing a more general charge that he engaged in a loosely-defined conspiracy by becoming a recruit to help wage a violent jihad. Padilla denies the charge.

Padilla's lawyers first made their torture allegations in court papers filed last month. They said military interrogators engaged in torture - including administering the mind-altering drug LSD - to try to force Padilla to reveal all he knew about Al Qaeda.

"He was assaulted, threatened with imminent death, and subjected to myriad other deprivations during his captivity at the Naval Brig," according to a legal motion filed by Acting Federal Public Defender Michael Caruso, one of Padilla's appointed lawyers. "He was drugged and subjected to cruel interrogations" using stress positions, forced hypothermia, and sleep deprivation, the brief says.

But the most painful and damaging tactic, the brief says, was extreme isolation in a windowless 9-by-7-foot cell. "Extended periods of solitary confinement are the most severe deprivation of liberty - short of the death penalty - that the government imposes," Mr. Caruso writes.

Padilla's lawyers are asking Judge Cooke to dismiss all charges against Padilla because of what they say amounts to outrageous government conduct.

Prosecutors dispute the charge. "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture - allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence," writes Mr. Killinger.

He adds, "Even if this court were to believe all of the unsupported allegations in Padilla's motion and thereby concluded that he suffered 'shocking' due-process violations during his military detention (a claim the government disputes emphatically), dismissal of the indictment would nevertheless be unwarranted as a matter of law."

Killinger says the correct remedy for Padilla would be to sue his military interrogators in federal court for civil damages, or to seek government prosecution of the alleged torturers. But Killinger says that Padilla "is not entitled to a free pass from his own criminal conduct."

At issue in the defense motion and the prosecutor's reply brief is what standard the court should apply in assessing whether the government acted so outrageously in its treatment of Padilla that the case must be dismissed.

While the facts of Padilla's harsh treatment (if accurate) favor the defense, existing legal precedents favor the government.

The 11th US Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Miami, has been reluctant in the past to dismiss cases based on allegations of outrageous government conduct. Appeals court judges in the First, Sixth, and Seventh circuits have gone even further, declaring that the outrageous government conduct defense does not exist, according to the prosecutors' brief.

Defense lawyers began their argument in their brief not with a quote from a learned legal scholar but instead from philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. "Whoever fights monsters should see to it that in the process he does not become a monster."

Padilla's lawyers acknowledge that outrageous government conduct motions are rarely justified, and thus rarely granted. But they add: "The treatment of Mr. Padilla, a natural born citizen of the United States, is a blot on this nation's character, shameful in its disrespect for the rule of law, and should never be repeated."

Prosecutors say Padilla was lawfully detained by the military as an enemy combatant and that no information obtained during his interrogations will be used as evidence against him at his trial.

Analysts who closely follow the case say the torture allegation is a potential blockbuster. "I think the judge is going to take a real serious look at whether this case should go forward or not," says David Oscar Markus, president of the Miami Chapter of the Florida Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "This judge has shown that she is not just going to roll over for what the government says. She's already dismissed some counts in the indictment and she is looking at what they have done very seriously."

DOJ_NMG_0094971

Mr. Markus says the lack of existing legal precedents supporting dismissal may not matter in the Padilla torture issue. "There is no precedent for something like this because nothing like this has ever happened before," he says.

How the issue plays out from here may depend on whether Padilla's lawyers are able to present evidence of Padilla's torture in court, Markus says. Medical records from the Navy brig where Padilla was held in South Carolina could offer independent and reliable evidence of abuse, if he was provided medical care as the government claims.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," the government's brief says. "While in the brig Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

Lawyers Try To Stop Gitmo Med Procedure (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky

AP, November 15, 2006

An attorney for a Guantanamo Bay detainee has asked a judge to block a planned medical procedure on the prisoner's heart, saying that performing it at the U.S. base puts his life at risk.

Saifullah A. Paracha, a 69-year-old multimillionaire businessman from Karachi, Pakistan, already had one heart attack while in U.S. custody and in recent days has suffered chest pains, his lawyers said. Doctors plan to perform a cardiac catheterization on Paracha this month at the isolated Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba.

Gaillard T. Hunt, one of Paracha's attorneys, asked a federal court in Washington Tuesday to block it, saying Guantanamo lacks the medical facilities for the procedure and sufficient backup in case anything goes wrong.

Hunt said it should be carried out in a hospital in the United States or Pakistan.

"There is no excuse for risking petitioner Paracha's life by subjecting him to this procedure at Guantanamo," Hunt said in an emergency petition, a copy of which was provided to The Associated Press.

Transferring Paracha to a hospital in the United States could present legal complications for the Bush administration, which has maintained that because the Guantanamo detainees were picked up overseas and are being held on foreign land, they may be detained indefinitely without charges or trial. A new law strips foreign "enemy combatants" held anywhere by the United States of their right to contest their detention in court. That law is being challenged.

Paracha's legal team has no ulterior motives, said another of his lawyers, Zachary Philip Katznelson.

"Our goal here is not anything duplicitous or underhanded to get court jurisdiction," he said in a telephone interview. "It is to get decent medical care."

The government is to reply to Hunt's petition by Friday. The case was expected to be argued in court on Monday, Hunt said.

Katznelson said he found Paracha chained to a bed at the base hospital when he visited Guantanamo on Nov. 7 and 9.

"All four limbs were shackled to the bed," and there wasn't enough slack in the chains to enable Paracha to turn over, he complained.

During a cardiac catheterization, a doctor inserts a thin plastic tube into an artery or vein in the arm or leg and pushes it into the chambers of the heart or into the coronary arteries to measure blood pressure within the heart and blood oxygen levels.

Army Lt. Col. Lora Tucker said from Guantanamo that its medical facilities "are excellent" and that additional specialists and medical equipment could be brought to the U.S. Navy base as needed.

"We are committed to preserving the health and lives of all detainees," Tucker said in an e-mail to AP. She declined to discuss Paracha because it was against policy to discuss a specific detainee's heath.

There have been three deaths among detainees at Guantanamo since it began taking in men captured in Afghanistan and other areas in January 2002 — all suicides on June 10. Some 430 men are currently held at the prison camp.

On Nov. 7, Paracha suffered chest pains at Guantanamo and a medical technician was brought in. His pulse had dropped to 46 beats per minute and his blood pressure was around 90 over 58, Katznelson said in a statement to the court.

Paracha suffered his first heart attack in 1995 and had a second one in 2003 while in U.S. military custody at Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan, Katznelson said. His family in Pakistan, concerned about his health, has urged Pakistan's government to seek his return home for treatment.

DOJ_NMG_0094972

A computer science graduate of the New York Institute of Technology, Paracha was arrested on arrival in Bangkok, Thailand, in July 2003, held in isolation for 14 months in Afghanistan and then sent to Guantanamo.

Paracha has acknowledged meeting Osama bin Laden twice, but denied making investments for al-Qaida members, translating statements for bin Laden, joining in a plot to smuggle explosives into the United States or recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

German Court Finds Sept. 11 Terrorist Guilty Of Abetting Murder (BLOOM)

By Claudia Rach

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Germany's highest criminal court found Mounir el-Motassadeq guilty of abetting the murder of more than 200 people in the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., overturning part of a lower court's decision.

The Federal Court of Justice today upheld the lower court's ruling that el-Motassadeq, a 32-year-old Moroccan, was guilty of being a member of the Hamburg terror cell that participated in the attacks.

El-Motassadeq's seven-year jail sentence will be reassessed by the Hamburg Higher Regional Court, according to today's decision.

The case number is 3 StR 139/06.

German 9/11 Trial Underscores Need For Better Global Cooperation (CSM)

By Mary Wiltenburg

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

If convicted terrorist-cell member Mounir el-Motassadeq walks free Thursday from a German courtroom, he may have US security policy to thank.

Direct and respectful before his judges, Mr. Motassadeq is less well-known than recently sentenced 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, whose courtroom theatrics drew broad attention to his trial in the US.

But the dramatic legal odyssey of the first man ever tried in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks has been the focus of bitter recrimination between German and US officials, who have denied the case's lawyers access to statements from a key witness.

As both countries attempt to strike the right balance between national security and the rule of law, observers say the case is a prime example of why it will take better global cooperation to succeed in the war on terror.

"The information-sharing problem is the key to fighting international terrorism," says law professor Joachim Wolf of Ruhr University in Bochum. "This [case] has been a disaster. But even a disaster can be a first step for developing something."

Since Motassadeq's first trial opened in 2002, the Moroccan citizen's case has taken numerous turns: In 2003, he was found guilty of abetting the murder of 3,066 people. On appeal, he was declared wrongly convicted. In a second trial, he was sentenced to seven years for membership in a terrorist organization. This February, he was released on bond pending resolution of appeals. Thursday, the German Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling that might clear Motassadeq of all charges, return him to prison, or grant him a third trial that could reinstate the accessory-to-murder charges.

The key question before the court is whether Motassadeq's second trial erred in sentencing him so lightly, given his close association with three of the 9/11 hijackers: Mohamed Atta, Marwan al Shehhi, and Ziad Jarrah.

A one-time roommate and a member of their Islamic study group in Hamburg, Motassadeq handled business affairs for the men while they trained at Al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan, then went there himself to train. When his friends left Germany to enroll in US flight schools, Motassadeq offered to look out for Mr. Jarrah's girlfriend. He paid bills from Mr. al Shehhi's bank account. He signed Mr. Atta's will.

All along, Motassadeq has maintained that one man could prove his innocence: Ramzi Binalshibh. Referred to by the 9/11 Commission Report as the fourth member of the Hamburg cell and a 9/11 plotter, Mr. Binalshibh was held in an undisclosed CIA facility from his 2002 capture until September, when he was one of 14 "high value" suspects moved to the US military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

DOJ_NMG_0094973

Since 2002, German courts have repeatedly requested access to Binalshibh. Despite numerous appeals, including two personal visits to the US by the German prosecutor, American intelligence services have refused, saying such a move would jeopardize national security.

Consequently, defense lawyer Udo Jacob argues, evidence that might have showed Motassadeq's innocence "was not considered, and I think this is a big fault in the sentence."

In Motassadeq's first trial, a Hamburg court convicted him on the basis of other evidence - evidence which "could hardly have been poorer," wrote University of Erlangen-Nürnberg law professor Christoph Safferling in a 2004 article.

But in February 2004, the same court acquitted Motassadeq's friend, Abdelghani Mzoudi, of identical charges for lack of evidence. The following month, Motassadeq's conviction was overturned.

These developments drew an outcry from the German press. Judges raged, and federal prosecutor Kay Nehm criticized US lack of cooperation as "incomprehensible." American critics countered that German courts were soft on terrorists.

"I think what is difficult for Americans to understand is how important it is to Germans to keep up the rule of law after the Nazi era," says Loammi Blaauw-Wolf, a lawyer who analyzed the decisions for the German Law Journal. "Even if it's a terrorist, or somebody suspected of such serious crimes, they are always willing to give him the benefit of the doubt and to give him a fair trial."

When Motassadeq's second trial began later that year, the US provided the court six pages of summarized statements by Binalshibh and two other men in their custody - Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Mohamedou Ould Slahi. The summary indicated that Motassadeq had no knowledge of the 9/11 plot.

Although they eventually entered the pages into evidence, German courts were hesitant to do so. There was no way to prove, judges argued, that the statements had not been extracted under torture. The US declined to elaborate on the circumstances under which they were taken.

"This was a very uncomfortable situation," says Dr. Wolf, "uncomfortable for German judges, and for German laws as a whole." Lawyers in the case also expressed reservations about the evidence.

"I don't know if it's trustworthy or not," says attorney Sven Leistikow, who represents 9/11 victims' families. "For me as a European, that's not something I can work with. It's like something from the Inquisition."

Considering the countries' joint histories, says Dr. Blaauw-Wolf, judges' concern with strict fidelity to the Geneva Conventions should come as no surprise. After all, she says, it was America's own Marshall Plan that brought the rule of law to Germany. This week, human rights groups filed suit in Berlin against high-ranking US officials, including outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, for authorizing torture at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Now, prosecutors in the Motassadeq case claim they have new evidence that could secure a fair verdict. Some observers wonder whether the US will allow Germany access to Binalshibh, now that he has requested a lawyer. US State, Justice, and Defense Department officials declined to comment on the possibility. Policy analysts have argued that disclosing such intelligence information in court runs the risk of exposing sensitive sources, or of transmitting key information to terrorists not yet apprehended.

A Better Way To Fight Terrorism (WP)

By John Hamre

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

In the warm glow of post-election bipartisanship, Congress and President Bush would do well to take on a crucial task: forging a new legal foundation for the global war on terrorism. The current policy framework is a disaster. While I know it's not true, still, the world believes that America condones torture, prison camps and "disappearance" tactics.

Let me recount an analogy. I remember a day back in 1986, when I was working for the Senate Armed Services Committee. An intelligence officer told me that the Navy had just recovered a Soviet sonobuoy and, in taking it apart for intelligence assessment, our government had discovered an American-designed computer chip -- one that we had not yet even certified for production in our own systems. The Soviet Union clearly had superior intelligence and counterintelligence capabilities.

DOJ_NMG_0094974

But these did not make the Soviets strong enough to overcome their fundamental flaw. In fact, they were doomed because their whole social construct was built on a lie. America and its allies were victorious because they embraced transcendent government values of freedom, liberty, accountability and transparency. Our ideals and their practice brought hope to millions around the world and drew our allies closer to us.

The United States will lose the global war on terrorism if we feel we must adopt tactics that undermine our civic values. For generations the world has admired America's commitment to the rule of law and government accountability. Much of the world now questions that commitment.

President Bush was right to say that the previous framework of international legal norms did not anticipate al-Qaeda-type combatants. But the administration failed to follow through to lead the world to a new legal framework. And the policies that led to Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, secret renditions and warrantless wiretaps have undermined America's towering moral authority.

The compromises of the final days before Congress recessed for the midterm election only muddied the waters. Political urgency infected an honest search for a durable policy framework.

This is an opportunity for constructive bipartisanship. The election is over. Instead of defaulting to the blue-ribbon-commission model, we should ask Congress to work on this problem. Let's ask the leadership to create a special select committee, made up of the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Intelligence and Judiciary committees, to work together for six months. They should assemble a panel of advisers consisting of politicians and jurists of excellent reputation -- people such as Sandra Day O'Connor, Sam Nunn, John Danforth and John Glenn.

We do need a new framework and a new national consensus, one that meets the challenges of this new enemy and is consistent with our tradition as the most revolutionary nation in history; one that holds the rule of law and government accountability inviolable by even the most powerful politicians.

We can prevail in the long war only if America recovers its tarnished inspirational powers and draws to its side the enthusiastic support of friends and allies.

The writer, a former deputy secretary of defense, is president of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared (KTVT)

By Robert Riggs

KTVT-TV, November 16, 2006

(CBS 11 News) FBI ACADEMY - QUANTICO, Virginia Handheld devices set off the telltale clicking sound that signals the presence of radioactive material as elite FBI units practice collecting evidence from the scene of a "dirty bomb" attack. Agents gather outside the nation's capital at the FBI's Training Academy in Quantico, Virginia to train on how to prevent or identify the perpetrators of such an attack.

Nuclear terror experts consider the dirty bomb is a weapon of choice for inflicting psychological and economic chaos in an urban setting. A dirty bomb uses conventional explosives to pulverize and disperse radioactive material into the air.

Travis Callaway, a nuclear specialist with the FBI, says it's easy for terrorists to get their hands on the key ingredients. "Getting an industrial or medical isotope is not that difficult to come by. There are literally millions of sources around the world. They are used in industry and medical purposes all the time. Most are not guarded at all or under simple lock and key."

Two dozen response teams, based at FBI offices across the country, receive 300 hours of specialized training on weapons of mass destruction. Their detection equipment can pick up rays emitted by everything from low grade radioactive materials to nuclear weapons.

The teams maintain a low profile at high profile events says John Fraga the chief of the Hazardous Materials Response Unit. "The majority of our work in prevention has been deploying to special events or events that would attract the attention of certain groups. Having us on site is certainly the better thing to have so we can assess threats and packages and things like that."

The units spend most of their time assessing the scientific plausibility of threats such as the phony threat posted on a website last month about dirty bomb attacks on NFL stadiums.

DOJ_NMG_0094975

A dirty bomb is considered a weapon of 'mass disruption' capable of inflicting devastating economic damage rather than mass casualties. The radioactive contamination could shut down a wide swath of a city's business district, and neighborhoods that were located downwind from the point of detonation, for years, if not for decades. The cleanup could cost billions of dollars and all commercial insurance policies sold in the United States appear to exclude damage from radiation according to a study by the National Defense University.

"It's not going to kill a lot of people but it can cause a lot of contamination. It can cause a lot of social and psychological disruption and economic effects," says Charles Ferguson, Council on Foreign Relations. "I think that's why a lot of terrorist groups might be attracted to the dirty bomb."

Ferguson was a nuclear engineering officer on a U.S. Navy ballistic missile submarine and recently warned, in a report titled Preventing Catastrophic Nuclear Terrorism, that the threat of nuclear attack by terrorists has never been greater.

The physicist says there is a lot of worry that the government is not prepared especially in the wake of its slow response to Hurricane Katrina.

"We are still a long way from having the ability to quickly decontaminate under the most strenuous circumstances," Ferguson says. "We need to be doing more realistic exercises to train our first responders and our political leadership to deal with that kind of event."

Ferguson recommends that the government stockpile decontamination supplies and medications to treat radiation sickness outside major urban areas.

First responders also can't precisely predict where the fallout from a dirty bomb would spread to and who would be exposed to the long term effects of low level radiation.

"The biggest issue with the aftermath of a dirty bomb is you can't see it, you can't smell it, you can't taste it, and you don't know where it is. If in downtown Dallas we detected radiation, what part of downtown Dallas do we evacuate? My guess is as soon as the word got out that there's a radiation release in Dallas everybody is going to try to get out of that city," said Ron Chesser, Texas Tech University scientist.

Chesser looks for answers in the aftermath of the world's worst nuclear power plant disaster at Chernobyl in the Ukraine. For the past 12 years, Chesser and his colleagues from the Center for Environmental Radiation Studies in Lubbock have traveled to Pripyat in the Ukraine to study the effects of radiation released from Chernobyl's reactor meltdown in 1986.

Radioactive fallout from the explosion forced 135,000 people living downwind in Pripyat to permanently abandon their homes in what was considered at that time the most modern city in the Soviet Union. Chesser points to ghostly photographs.

Pictures taken before and after disaster show a once vibrant life in parks and high rises virtually frozen in time just as frightened residents had suddenly left it twenty-years ago. A poignant sign reads, "Our Home. It will protect us." School children's homework assignments still sit on desks in vacant class rooms, history books about Lenin stand on the shelves.

The Texas Tech scientists measured 2,500 points of radiation around the city and created a three-dimensional computer model of every structure. At the click of a computer mouse, two animated plumes of red colored radioactive fallout blossom from the reactor site and spread across the region showing the path of the radioactive cloud.

Chesser is trying to produce a mathematical model that will help first responders in the U.S. see the dispersal pattern of fallout from a dirty bomb and show what areas need to be evacuated. "The flow of particles through an urban canyon is a complex process mathematically. It's very difficult to estimate because weather and winds are unpredictable, especially winds around buildings and in and amongst buildings and down avenues."

The Soviet experience indicates that a dirty bomb could trigger widespread panic. Chesser says the residents of Scandinavian countries located hundreds of miles away may have over reacted in the absence of accurate information. "In the two or three years after the Chernobyl accident there were over a hundred thousand voluntary abortions by expectant parents. They chose this path because of the fear of congenital birth defects."

U.S. public health authorities are also unprepared to tell people if they will later suffer from cancer, according to Chesser. He says it's hard to get the government to invest in studies about the effects of exposure to low dose radiation. "Unfortunately, all we can give the victims are statistics and statistics are pretty cold when you are talking to an individual about their specific health risk."

DOJ_NMG_0094976

Rather than panic and run from a dirty bomb Chesser says, "The safest thing would be to stay put inside a building, closing the windows and the ventilation system so you don't inhale or ingest the radioactive particles."

At the current pace of research and planning, reliable safety advice from the government may be a long time coming.

Feds Bust UMass Student For Sears Tower Bomb Hoax (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, November 16, 2006

A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts student sent a booze-fueled bomb hoax to the National Security Agency, claiming a man he'd randomly plucked from facebook.com was planning a suicide attack on the Sears Tower, according to an FBI affidavit.

Agents yesterday arrested Adam Hart of Georgetown, at UMass Amherst, where he now goes to school. He attended UMass-Dartmouth at the time of the incident. He pleaded not guilty to malicious conveying of false information and was released on a $10,000 unsecured bond. A woman at the Hart home declined to comment.

"I was drunk and was searching for a variety of novelty names, (sluts, athletes, ect.. (sic))," Hart wrote in a letter of apology to the National Security Agency. "At one point I searched for Osamah. When the name Osamah Abdallah came up I sent him a message."

That message sparked an exchange with Abdallah, a Loyola University student, that ended when Hart woke up after another long night of drinking and e-mailed the NSA, the affidavit states.

"I had gone out to drink again but this time it was in excess," Hart wrote in his apology letter. 'I was still a little angry from his message and was trying to be funny in front of my roommate . . . At this point I wrote the email to the NSA."

That e-mail, sent April 22, sparked a massive effort to gird the nation's tallest building against a possible suicide bomb attack. Meanwhile, agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Forces hunted down Abdallah and yanked him from a Loyola classroom. He showed agents his facebook.com profile and showed them his response to Hart's e-mail, which he described as sad, since such a hateful person shared the name "Adam" with a biblical prophet, the affidavit states.

Judge Rejects Request To Strike Don't-tell-how-to-make-a-bomb Law (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A local federal judge has rejected a radical activist's request to invalidate a law making it illegal to tell people how to make a firebomb with the intention that they go out and commit a violent crime.

Rodney Coronado, 40, of Tucson, argued that the law infringed upon the First Amendment protections of free speech.

Judge Jeffrey A. Miller Wednesday sided with prosecutors, who said the law was tailored to apply to specific criminal activity which the government has a responsibility to control.

The law, enacted after the 1995 bombing of a federal building in Oklahoma City, makes it a crime to "teach or demonstrate" how to make an explosive, destructive device or weapon of mass destruction intending that the information be used to commit a federal crime of violence.

On Aug. 1, 2003, Coronado gave a speech in Hillcrest in which, in response to a question from the audience, he demonstrated how he made a gasoline-fueled device he used to burn down a Michigan State University laboratory in 1992.

Hours earlier, an arson fire destroyed a huge housing complex under construction in University City causing $50 million in damage. A group for which Coronado has acted as spokesman, the Earth Liberation Front, or ELF, took credit.

Coronado has not been charged in connection with that arson, but he was charged with breaking the law on telling people how to make a destructive device.

His lawyer, Gerald Singleton, argued that he was within his First Amendment rights to talk about the Michigan arson, for which he served a prison term.

Miller disagreed.

"Here, the deterrent effect of (the statute) on legitimate expression is insubstantial and remote," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0094977

He also ruled that other objections to the law will be decided after witnesses testify at a trial, which has not yet been scheduled.

Prosecutor John Parmley was not available for comment Wednesday.

Onell Soto: (619) 293-1280; onell.soto@uniontrib.com

Steven Hatfill Demands Fines For N.Y. Times (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 16, 2006

A former Army scientist suing the New York Times for libel has asked a federal judge to fine the newspaper $25,000 a day for refusing to disclose its confidential sources and to increase the fine amount by $25,000 each month in an attempt to encourage the paper to comply.

The scientist, Steven Hatfill, contends that a series of Times columns fingered him as responsible for the anthrax mailings in 2001 that terrorized the nation and killed at least five people. While the FBI searched Mr. Hatfill's home and the Justice Department eventually named him as a "person of interest" in the anthrax case, neither the scientist nor anyone else was ever charged in connection with the crimes.

Last month, a federal magistrate in Alexandria, Va., where Mr. Hatfill's suit was filed, ordered the Times to identify the sources for the five columns in dispute. A federal judge upheld the order, but the newspaper indicated the author of the columns, Nicholas Kristof, would persist in refusing to name his sources.

"There has been a certain 'heads I win, tails you lose' quality to the Times's litigation of this issue so far," an attorney for Mr. Hatfill, Thomas Connolly, wrote in a motion urging the fines. "In order to ensure that the officers, directors, and shareholders of the Times are fully involved in determining whether it wishes to ignore the judicial power of the United States, this court should impose a significant monetary sanction for each day of non-compliance."

Mr. Connolly painted the Times's refusal to comply as brazen and willful. "Courts, not newspapers, decide what evidence must be presented in court when the administration of justice so requires," the lawyer wrote.

In a filing yesterday, counsel for the Times called the proposed fines "extreme, over-reaching and unwarranted."

Attorneys for the Times insist that the newspaper is simply preserving its right to appeal the order to disclose its sources.

The Times also noted that 10 of the 12 sources Mr. Kristof relied on are known to Mr. Hatfill, either because they were not granted confidentiality or agreed to waive it. As a result, the names of only two sources are being withheld. Mr. Kristof has said both were FBI employees.

The Times's lawyers also said Mr. Hatfill deliberately delayed giving his deposition in the case and that his attorneys' bid to block further discovery by the Times is part of "a ruse designed to insulate plaintiff from giving any testimony under oath at all."

A court hearing on the proposed sanctions is set for tomorrow.

Lawyer Disputes Feds' Claim That His Client Engaged In 'Overt Sexual Activity' On Airliner (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - RALEIGH, North Carolina-A man arrested for allegedly engaging in "overt sexual activity" with his girlfriend on an airliner was lying with his head on her lap because he was not feeling well, his attorney said.

That gesture was misinterpreted by a flight attendant, who humiliated and harassed the couple, said attorney Deb Newton, who represents Carl Persing.

Persing and Dawn Sewell, both of Lakewood, California, face federal charges of interfering with flight crew members, allegedly by disobeying a flight attendant's request that they stop their public displays of affection.

They were arrested on Sept. 15 when they arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport on a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles.

"The one witness I've talked to and the defendant dispute almost everything in the government's affidavit as to what happened on that airplane," Newton said.

DOJ_NMG_0094978

She said Persing suffers from a chronic disease requiring medication that makes him drowsy, dizzy and irritable. She would not identify the disease to protect her client's privacy.

Newton said she will ask that the charges be dismissed.

Sewell's lawyer did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Allard Lobbies For Supermax Funding (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 15, 2006

U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., met today with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to seek support in adding $12 million to the Commerce, Justice and State Appropriations bill to fund a perimeter fence at Supermax in Florence.

Allard's office said that during the meeting, Gonzalez pledged to work with Allard to address the funding issue for the fence.

The prison holds a number of the nation's most notorious terrorists such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef.

A Justice Department inspector general's report in September criticized the prison for a number of shortcomings, including a lack of security and failure to monitor the mail.

"Today's meeting was extremely productive," said Allard. "Attorney General Gonzales assured me that the mail deficiencies raised in the inspector general's report are being addressed, and he agreed to discuss the need for a perimeter fence with the Bureau of Prisons director and follow up with me on the potential avenues to funding the fence."

Allard conducted a tour of the facility on Oct. 30 and met with local law enforcement, prison guards and community officials to hear their concerns regarding prison operations.

He then met last Thursday with Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley G. Lappin to explain the issues raised in the meeting.

"I have taken the concerns raised to me during my visit to Supermax and the meeting with Florence citizens back to Washington and have brought them directly to the attention of the director of the Bureau of Prisons and to the attorney general," said Allard.

"Supermax houses some of the most dangerous prisoners in the country and we need to ensure we are doing everything needed to protect the prison personnel and the surrounding communities."

WAR NEWS:

General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The top U.S. commander in the Middle East urged Congress to resist withdrawing American troops from Iraq any time soon, a stance that drew sharp disagreement from top Republicans and Democrats.

A week after the midterm election in which voters said changing Iraq policy was a top priority, Gen. John Abizaid told House and Senate committees that military commanders are analyzing possible policy options for President Bush.

"We have every option on the table, all the way from increasing our U.S. combat forces down to withdrawing our U.S. forces," Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. Iraq has no more than six months to quell sectarian violence before it rages out of control, he said.

Still, Abizaid said he would not recommend cutting or adding troops. That position drew criticism from two prominent members of the panel contemplating presidential bids in 2008.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think the status quo and the rate of progress is acceptable, when the American people do not," said Arizona Republican John McCain.

Abizaid objected, saying he wanted quicker progress in Iraq. He said a major focus of that effort is working with the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We must stick with them until such time as they show us they can't do it," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0094979

New York Democrat Hillary Clinton, another possible presidential contender, said that point had passed.

"I see very little indication that there has been a resolution within the Iraqi government that the violence must stop," she said.

Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will take over as committee chairman in January, continued to press his plan to tell Iraqi leaders that American troops will begin to be withdrawn in four to six months. Levin said that's the best way to "stop the march down the path to full-blown civil war."

Abizaid said withdrawing troops would undercut Iraq's government and cause more violence. Adding a large number of U.S. troops also is a bad idea, Abizaid said. "I believe more American forces would prevent the Iraqis from doing more," Abizaid said.

David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq adviser, told lawmakers the Bush administration was willing to talk to officials in neighboring Iran. Although Satterfield said both Iran and Syria were "negative actors" in Iraq by supporting armed groups, he only ruled out talks with Syria.

The Bush administration has rejected previous calls for talks with Tehran, saying Iran must first stop its uranium-enrichment programs.

General Warns Against Iraq Exit Timeline (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, on Wednesday warned that a phased withdrawal of US troops within six months, which some Democrats want, would increase sectarian violence in Iraq.

Gen Abizaid also drew the ire of John McCain, the Arizona senator and Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential race, by saying he did not believe more troops would help the US stop the bloodshed in the war-torn country.

"I believe more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, taking more responsibility for their future," Gen Abizaid said at a contentious Senate armed services hearing.

Democrats, and many Republicans, are stepping up pressure on the Bush administration to change course in Iraq in the wake of last week's congressional elections, which were largely seen as a referendum on US policy on Iraq.

"I am…disappointed that basically you're advocating that status quo here today which I think the American people in the last election said that is not an acceptable condition for the American people," Mr McCain told Gen Abizaid.

Gen Abizaid was testifying before the committee for the first time since President George W. Bush announced last week that he was replacing Donald Rumsfeld, defence secretary, with Robert Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

In August, Gen Abizaid told the same committee that Iraq could descend into civil war if the violence in Baghdad was not curtailed. But on Wedneday he said he believed the situation in Iraq had improved since then.

The four-star general said that while the level of violence in Iraq "remain dangerously high" he remains "optimistic" that the US can stabilise Iraq.

Many Democrats, including Carl Levin, who will become chairman of the Senate armed services committee in January, argue that the US needs to pressure the Iraqis by announcing a timetable to start withdrawing troops within four to six months.

But Gen Abizaid stressed that setting timelines for withdrawals would impede the US effort in Iraq. "We need flexibility to manage our forces...Caps and specific timetables limit that flexibility," he said.

Facing Withdrawal Demands, Abizaid Calls For More Troops (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East said Wednesday that he had requested an increase in the number of U.S. military advisers in Iraq and had sent another 2,000-Marine unit into the country's restive western region.

In two back-to-back hearings on Capitol Hill, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command, resisted calls by Democrats for troop withdrawals, saying it would lead to further sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0094980

He defended plans for keeping troop levels at or slightly above the current 141,000 and said he remained optimistic that Iraq could become stable.

Abizaid was met with deep skepticism in the Senate, where even Republicans who have supported the war questioned his judgment on troop levels and his optimistic assessment of Iraqi security forces.

The criticism signaled a more active role by members of Congress in challenging the Bush administration on the war's conduct.

With Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's pending departure and the Democratic takeover of Congress, top generals are likely to face greater criticism.

"I must say that I come to this hearing with a great deal of skepticism, because, prior to this hearing, there's been a great deal of obfuscation by the witnesses in front of this committee as to what the truth is," said Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla.

The heightened tension, and Abizaid's defense of troop levels, came amid signs that the Pentagon and White House are considering a significant shift in Iraq policy.

In addition to a report from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and a separate review by the Pentagon's Joint Staff, the administration said Wednesday that President Bush had ordered an internal review by the National Security Council that would bring together the thinking of various government agencies on how to move forward in Iraq.

"(Bush) thought it was high time that these reviews be brought together and put in an integrated form, so he can get a look at it and begin getting in his own mind what the way forward needs to be in Iraq," Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, told reporters traveling to Asia with Bush on Air Force One.

Against a barrage of questions from some lawmakers calling for phased withdrawals and others advocating an increase in troops, Abizaid defended the status quo, warning against timetables and insisting current troop levels were adequate to quell violence and help prepare Iraqi forces.

"Our troop posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Abizaid said.

The assessment was supported by Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, who argued in testimony later Wednesday that the presence of U.S. forces was the bulwark against the breakdown of central authority in Iraq.

Maples told the Senate panel that sectarian violence was on the rise and was undermining public support for the government and the nascent Iraqi military.

"I think we still have the opportunity for success, but it will be a very difficult process to get us to where we want to be, both from a security standpoint and from a political standpoint, in Iraq," Maples said.

Abizaid said that although sectarian violence remained at unacceptably high levels, it had declined since August, when he told the same Senate committee that Iraq was at risk of sliding into civil war.

Abizaid's steadfastness on troop levels drew ire from lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, particularly Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a probable 2008 presidential contender who has become the most vocal advocate for an increase in U.S. troops in Iraq.

Seizing on Abizaid's acknowledgment that western Anbar province was not under coalition control and that troops who might have been used to secure the Sunni insurgent stronghold had been diverted to Baghdad, McCain said Abizaid was failing to prevent a return of insurgent control.

"Wouldn't it make sense to ... get both Baghdad and al-Anbar province under control before we have another battle of Fallujah and lose many more lives?" McCain said. "I don't understand that tactic, General."

Abizaid conceded that sending 20,000 additional troops into Iraq might temporarily quell violence, but he said it also would upset American efforts to get the Iraqi government to take more responsibility for the country's internal security.

Abizaid added that, even if it were in Iraq's best interest to increase the presence of U.S. forces, it would be difficult for the Pentagon to find additional combat troops without increasing the size of the active-duty military.

Nonetheless, Abizaid acknowledged that he planned to increase troop levels in the near term. Abizaid ordered the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which has been on ships in the Persian Gulf for months as a backup reserve force, into Iraq.

A Defense official said the Marines already had landed in Kuwait ahead of their deployment to Anbar, which has continued to see some of the fiercest fighting between American forces and insurgents.

DOJ_NMG_0094981

In addition, Abizaid said he would request that the number of military advisers in Iraq be "substantially increased," largely by adding to the size of the nearly 300 embedded teams, now composed of 11 soldiers each. He said the number was still being worked out by his staff.

The general said he believed the United States had four to six months to get violence in Iraq under control before it reached a level at which it might be impossible to contain. Army Gen. George W. Casey, commander of coalition forces in Iraq, said last month that he believed Iraqi forces would be able to take over security operations in 12 to 18 months. Abizaid said he was working to speed up that timetable.

General Warns Of Risks In Iraq If G.I.'s Are Cut (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — The top American military commander for the Middle East said Wednesday that to begin a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next six months would lead to an increase in sectarian killings and hamper efforts to persuade the Iraqi government to make the difficult decisions needed to secure the country.

The commander, Gen. John P. Abizaid, made it clear that he did not endorse the phased troop withdrawals being proposed by Democratic lawmakers. Instead, he said the number of troops in Iraq might be increased by a small amount as part of new plans by American commanders to improve the training of the Iraqi Army.

General Abizaid did not rule out a larger troop increase, but he said the American military was stretched too thin to make such a step possible over the long term. And he said such an expansion might dissuade the Iraqis from making more of an effort to provide for their own security.

"We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect," he said. "But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps."

General Abizaid also publicly said for the first time that the American position in Iraq had been undermined by the Bush administration's decision not to deploy a larger force to stabilize the country in 2003. That decision was made after Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, the Army chief of staff at the time, told Congress that several hundred thousand troops would be needed. His testimony was derided by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and the general was ostracized at the Pentagon before his retirement a few months later.

"General Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations," General Abizaid said. "I think you can look back and say that more American troops would have been advisable in the early stages of May, June, July."

The testimony, given to the Senate and House Armed Services Committees, was the first by the American commander since August, and it followed several months of setbacks in Iraq that helped to fuel the Democratic victories in last week's election. Skepticism among lawmakers from both parties was palpable, and the concerns of the lawmakers were reinforced by intelligence officials who testified later in the day and who painted a more pessimistic portrait of the violence in Iraq than General Abizaid did.

Among the Iraq policy reviews now under way is an effort by the Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, and a separate administration study ordered by President Bush.

Under the immediate initiative that General Abizaid described, the number of American military advisers working with Iraqi forces will be increased, with advisers to be assigned even to small Iraqi units with fewer than 200 soldiers.

"We need to put more American capacity into Iraqi units to make them more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem," General Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It is possible that we might have to go up in troop levels in order to increase the number of forces that go into the Iraqi security forces, but I believe that's only temporary."

The next steps in Iraq were very much on the mind of lawmakers on Wednesday. Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, cited the concerns of Marine Corps officers in Anbar Province in complaining that General Abizaid had not dispatched enough forces to defeat the insurgency there. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said the Iraqi government was not taking the steps needed to win the trust of the population and improve security.

DOJ_NMG_0094982

In their testimony on Wednesday, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said they agreed with General Abizaid that American forces were one of the few elements keeping a lid on violence in Iraq and that withdrawing troops would only increase sectarian violence.

But General Maples said that the violence continued to increase in "scope, complexity and lethality" and that it was "creating an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism, which is empowering militias and vigilante groups."

In all of Iraq, attacks against allied troops last month averaged 180 per day, up from 170 per day in September and 70 per day in January, General Maples said in written testimony. Daily attacks on Iraqi civilians averaged roughly 40 per day last month, four times higher than the average in January. General Maples also noted that recent operations in Baghdad had achieved only a moderate success, because after American officials had turned neighborhoods over to the Iraqis, "attacks returned to and even surpassed preoperational levels."

Reinforcing this view, General Hayden said the C.I.A. station in Baghdad assessed that Iraq was deteriorating to a chaotic state, with the political center disintegrating and rival factions increasingly warring with each other. "Their view of the battlefield is that it is descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues over smaller and smaller pieces of territory," he said.

The two intelligence officials said Wednesday that there were only an estimated 1,300 foreign fighters in the country and that the number of Sunni Arab insurgents actively planning and carrying out attacks on American forces was probably more than 10,000.

Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island, asked General Abizaid how much time the United States had to bring down the violence in Baghdad before events there were beyond the control of the Iraqi government. General Abizaid said the answer was four to six months.

Securing Baghdad, the general said, was the main effort. But there are other difficult missions ahead, he said. One is supporting an Iraqi-led effort to disarm the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia nominally loyal to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Another is securing Anbar Province, the seat of the Sunni Arab insurgency. General Abizaid said that to try to hold the line there, he had decided to dispatch a 2,200-strong Marine Expeditionary Unit. "Al Anbar Province is not under control," General Abizaid said.

Many experts have advocated talking directly to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, an approach the Iraq Study Group is expected to endorse. General Hayden said that Iran's ambitions inside Iraq seemed to be expanding and that Iran had been conducting a foreign policy of "dangerous triumphalism."

David M. Satterfield, the State Department's coordinator for Iraq, told the Senate committee that the United States was prepared "in principle" to discuss the situation in Iraq with Iran, but the timing was uncertain.

"We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq," Mr. Satterfield said. "The timing of such a direct dialogue is one that we still have under review."

Abizaid Says Withdrawal Would Mean More Unrest (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The top U.S. commander for Iraq told Congress yesterday that a phased withdrawal of American troops would unleash more sectarian strife, and instead he advocated a "major change" in strategy that would beef up U.S. military teams training Iraqi forces.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, chief of the U.S. Central Command, said bolstering the training effort could require a further increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, already higher than expected at more than 140,000, and said no cuts are planned.

Facing searing questions from Democrats and Republicans alike, some of whom voiced disappointment in Abizaid and questioned his credibility, the general acknowledged mistakes in the war effort. But he voiced optimism that Iraq's military can stabilize the country, given enough U.S. backing and political support from Iraq's government.

DOJ_NMG_0094983

"We haven't misled people. We have learned some hard lessons," he said in one tense exchange before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The first major Iraq hearings since the Nov. 7 midterm elections revealed blunt impatience among Democrats as well as open frustration from Republicans, and produced the rare spectacle of presidential hopefuls from both parties taking aim at the general.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) took exception with Abizaid's talk of all the steps that the Iraqi government needs to take. "Hope is not a method," she told him. "We've had testimony now for four years about what 'must be done' -- and it doesn't get done."

Abizaid shot back: "I would also say that despair is not a method."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), another presidential contender, voiced disappointment that Abizaid seemed to be clinging to the "status quo" -- an assertion the general rejected.

In an unusual admission, Abizaid said there should have been more U.S. troops, as well as Iraqi and foreign forces, to stabilize the country immediately after the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. "General [Eric] Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations," he said.

Abizaid also said the policy of "de-Baathification" of Iraq society introduced in 2003 by then-U.S. Proconsul L. Paul Bremer was too severe.

Under hard questioning from McCain, Abizaid spoke frankly about the stress on U.S. forces, which he said constrains any major troop increase. "We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect. But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps," he said. He later told a House panel that exceeding current troop levels would place "a tremendous strain" on the Army.

McCain, who favors a significant boost in U.S. forces, quizzed Abizaid on why more troops have not been sent to the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, where U.S. casualties are among the highest in Iraq and Marine commanders say they lack sufficient forces.

"General Abizaid, is al-Anbar province under control?" McCain asked.

"Al-Anbar province is not under control, Senator," Abizaid replied. He said he recently released a Marine expeditionary unit of more than 2,000 troops from the Middle East to reinforce troops in Anbar. Still, he said that Baghdad and not Anbar will remain the main military effort, and that Iraqi forces will have to do more.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think that the status quo and the rate of progress we're making is acceptable. I think most Americans do not," McCain concluded. Abizaid disagreed, saying his new emphasis on training is "a major change."

Other Republicans showed a new skepticism about U.S. policy in Iraq. "It's taking us a lot longer than we thought," said Saxby Chambliss (Ga.). Even John W. Warner, the courtly Virginian who chairs the committee, opened by noting that on Nov. 26, U.S. troops will have been fighting in Iraq longer than they fought in World War II.

On the broader debate over Iraq strategy, Abizaid said partitioning the country, as some analysts have suggested, is "not viable." "I can't imagine in particular how a Sunni state could survive," he said, predicting it would devolve into an al-Qaeda terrorist haven. A Shiite state would fall under domination by Iran, he said.

Amid widespread criticism by lawmakers of the Iraqi government's leadership, Abizaid stressed he has confidence in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and had urged him in a meeting this week to disarm Shiite militias "soon." By that, Abizaid testified, he meant in four to six months.

The Iraqi army will take the lead in pacifying militias, he said, emphasizing that is one reason the U.S. military should redouble efforts to train Iraqi forces. That option is said to be favored by several members of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which is expected to make recommendations next month.

DOJ_NMG_0094984

Teams of U.S. military trainers embedded with Iraqi units "need to be substantially expanded" so they can reach down to the company level, Abizaid said. He indicated he will try to find troops for that expansion from the existing U.S. force in Iraq but said he is not sure whether that is possible.

Abizaid said adding U.S. troops to Iraq would discourage Iraqis from taking the lead in their own security -- something he predicted they may be ready to do in as little as 12 months. He acknowledged the current U.S. force level in Iraq of 15 brigades is already three to five brigades -- or 10,000 to 20,000 troops -- higher than what he projected it would be before sectarian fighting erupted in Iraq in the spring.

Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

The top U.S. commander for Iraq rejected yesterday proposals from Senate Democrats to immediately pull troops from Iraq or do it on a specific timetable starting in March.

"Our troops' posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Gen. John Abizaid, the head of U.S. Central Command, told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "and then we need to assess whether or not we can bring major combat units out of there."

His response was, in effect, a dismissal of a proposal from incoming Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, for a phased withdrawal to begin in four months, and from Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for an immediate pullout.

Gen. Abizaid said current troop levels, and an improving Iraqi security force of more than 300,000, are sufficient to eventually win.

"I believe that we can move forward," he said.

But Democrats, and at least one Republican, expressed skepticism.

"It's not encouraging to those of us who heard time after time that things are, quote, 'progressing well,' that we're making progress, et cetera, because we're hearing from many other sources that that's not the case," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who won re-election as an independent, displayed how difficult it will be for Mr. Levin to get a majority of senators to agree to specific withdrawal dates.

"I agree with both of you that a congressional mandate to begin a withdrawal from Iraq in a time certain would be a disaster for the Iraqis and, more directly, for the U.S.," he said.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, CIA director, later provided a sober picture of Iraq.

"Even if the central government gains broader support from Iraq's communities, implementing the reforms needed to improve life for all Iraqis will be extremely difficult," he said. "Iraq's endemic violence is eating away at the state's ability to govern. The security forces are plagued by sectarianism and severe maintenance and logistics problems."

The hearing also found the Bush administration signaling a postelection change in policy toward Iran, which the U.S. says is fueling the Shi'ite insurgency and deaths squads in Iraq. Coupled with Sunni terrorists, the groups have spun Baghdad into waves of violent sectarian killings that threaten to throw the country into a civil war. October was one of the deadliest months for U.S. troops, and more than 2,800 have been killed in the war.

David Satterfield, the top adviser on Iraq to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said the United States is ready to talk directly with Iran about achieving peace in Iraq. Mr. Satterfield did not open the door to the other problem neighbor, Syria.

Yesterday's hearing came at another pivotal time for the 3½-year-old war. Absent at the witness table was outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who resigned under pressure on an Election Day that saw Democrats retake Congress largely on frustration with the Iraq war. Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates is to undergo confirmation hearings before the committee next month.

DOJ_NMG_0094985

Democrats take control of Congress in January and are expected to debate legislation that would speed a troop exodus. Republicans and the White House, so far, oppose such measures. All Washington eyes are on the Iraq Study Group, a congressionally created panel of former government officials. It is set next month to lay out a list of options for winning in Iraq.

Two widely speculated ideas are a timetable for troop withdrawal and direct talks with Syria and Iran, both U.S.-designated terror states. Gen. Abizaid seemed to rule out the first option; Mr. Satterfield accepted part of the second.

Gen. Abizaid confirmed an Associated Press report that when he met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, in Baghdad this week, he pressed him to begin ordering his forces to disarm the Mahdi's Army, from which cells have spun off into death squads.

The Mahdi's Army is led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Mr. al-Maliki. Gen. Abizaid said Mr. al-Maliki has begun disarming the militia, and U.S. forces have raided suspected death squads in Sadr City, Sheik al-Sadr's stronghold.

The general said Iraq must curtail violence in six months or risk losing any chance of a political settlement. He acknowledged that there are not enough U.S. forces in Iraq to control the entire Anbar province, a sprawling Sunni region west of Baghdad that has become a base for al Qaeda terrorists.

This remark brought a sharp rebuke from Mr. McCain. Although many Democrats want troops called home, and Republicans generally back the current 140,000, Mr. McCain advocates sending more forces.

"Wouldn't it make sense to say it might be well to get both Baghdad and al Anbar province under control before we have another battle of Fallujah and lose many more lives?" Mr. McCain said.

Gen. Abizaid answered, "It's easy for the Iraqis to rely upon us to do this work. I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, from taking more responsibility for their own future. They will win the insurgency, they will solve the sectarian violence problem, and they'll do it with our help."

Gen. Abizaid has recommended a temporary increase of U.S. trainers embedded with Iraqi units.

With Politics As Subtext, Senators Clash On Iraq (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — For much of the first postelection hearing on the war in Iraq on Wednesday, the Republican side of the table was largely empty. But the room was still crowded — with competing agendas.

There were three contenders for president, including the Democratic and the Republican titans for 2008 and the one from Indiana who is hoping to cast himself as the Democrats' compromise candidate.

There was the self-described "Independent Democrat — capital I, capital D," who is at risk of bolting and taking his party's new narrow majority with him. (Was that red tie a hint?) And there were the two parties, trying to bolster their positions on the war after an election that each side seemed to interpret in wildly different ways.

In contrast to the Republicans, who arrived late and left early (if they arrived at all), all but one of the Democrats arrived early and stayed late, filling up their side of the Armed Services Committee table quickly, eager to assert their new strength. As the hearing began, Senator Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, flashed a thumbs-up to the incoming Democratic chairman, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan.

But no sooner had Mr. Levin outlined his case for a phased pullout of troops beginning in four to six months than the new Independent Democratic hero of the hawkish wing, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, began acting the role of cross-examiner, leading Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American military commander in the Middle East, to say that such a withdrawal would increase violence and instability.

"I take it by your answer that you profoundly disagree?" Mr. Lieberman asked. With the Democrats, he meant. "We have a window of opportunity and, really, responsibility now, after the election," he said, "to find a bipartisan consensus for being supportive of the efforts of our troops and our diplomats there to achieve success."

To this, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the leading Democratic contender for the 2008 race, knocked back the remains in her coffee cup.

DOJ_NMG_0094986

Her leading Republican rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona, pressed his argument that more troops were needed in Iraq. When General Abizaid disagreed, Mr. McCain called attention to the remarks of retired military officers who characterized Congressional proposals for phased withdrawal as "terribly naïve." Mr. McCain's protégé, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, backed him up; when the general insisted that more troops were not the solution, Mr. Graham cut him off, saying, "Do we need less?" forcing General Abizaid to say that no, that was not the solution, either.

Mrs. Clinton pressed the Democrats' case that a change in military strategy was necessary to prod the Iraqis into taking responsibility for their own country. "Hope is not a strategy," she told the generals. "Hortatory talk about what the Iraqi government must do is getting old. I have heard over and over again, 'The government must do this, the Iraqi Army must do that.' Nobody disagrees with that. The brutal fact is, it's not happening."

She showed she could play bipartisan with the best of them, noting that the new Iraq had failed to meet the benchmarks demanded by Mr. Nelson and Senator Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, a Republican.

"Can you offer us more than the hope that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi Army will step up to the task?" she asked.

Mr. McCain, who would have been the committee chairman had the Republicans maintained control of the Senate, arrived almost an hour late, heralded by the accelerated click of cameras.

As Mr. Nelson questioned General Abizaid, the Arizona senator stood up to confer with Senator Susan M. Collins, a moderate Republican from Maine. At this, Mr. Lieberman got up and walked to the Republican side to join them in a brief, chuckling huddle, then ambled back to his party's side with a glance at his colleagues as if to say, "You watching?"

In his questions, Mr. Lieberman noted that he was "picking up on" points Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham had made.

Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, the other Democratic presidential hopeful, who advocates moderation between the party's liberal and hawkish wings, tried to emphasize that the Republicans had lost a national referendum on Iraq.

"We just had an election in our country in which the American people expressed less than total confidence in the effectiveness of our own government," Mr. Bayh said, introducing the idea that the Iraqi government did not deserve much confidence, either.

"I mean, they say the right things," he said, "but when the going gets tough and they have to make the hard decisions, they sort of retreat into their corner and they're just not able to find that common ground."

But while Democrats argued that the election had been a signal from American people that the military solution was not working, Mr. McCain said it was a message that they were unhappy with the status quo — and that only more troops could shake the stagnation.

"Many of us believe that this may not be a long-term commitment," he said, "but at least a commitment to bring Baghdad under control, and that is not happening today."

General Abizaid gave something to both sides, arguing for making the American teams helping to train the Iraqi military "more robust." But he said Iraqis looked unkindly on a major increase in American troops. "They believe it undermines their gaining greater and greater authority and responsibility," he said.

The Republican side was anchored by the departing chairman and the protector of Senate decorum, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia. He congratulated Mr. Levin, noting that they came to the Senate together 28 years ago. When Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, the only committee member seeking re-election to lose, arrived on the Republican side, Mr. Warner walked over to shake his hand.

New Armed Services Chairs Oppose Iraq (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 15, 2006

The two Democrats who will lead the Armed Services committees next year indicated Wednesday they will not relent in opposing President Bush's Iraq policies and may turn up the heat.

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin and Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, in the first hearings on Iraq since Democrats regained power in last week's elections, said the Bush administration had bungled the war and the U.S. soon should begin to pull out some troops.

DOJ_NMG_0094987

Levin, 72, and Skelton, 74, have been the leading voices among Democrats on the war. Known as staunch supporters of the military and its budget, the lawmakers have a tough road ahead.

Their fellow Democrats are divided on exactly how to stabilize Iraq. Democratic leaders agree only that pulling out an undetermined number of troops soon would help to put political pressure on the Iraqis to assume more responsibility.

Also, Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, warned on Wednesday against setting a withdrawal timetable. Abizaid told the House and Senate committees that the troop levels should stay roughly the same as now, with more emphasis needed on training Iraqi forces.

But Levin told reporters he was encouraged the general said all options should remain on the table.

"The only way for Iraqi leaders to squarely face that reality is for President Bush to tell them that the United States will begin a phased redeployment of our forces within four to six months," Levin said. The senator, recognizable by the reading glasses he always wears on the tip of his nose, is known for his dogged style of questioning witnesses.

At the House hearing, Skelton said he was not feeling optimistic about Iraq.

"The administration must look carefully at our objectives in Iraq: whether they are achievable, by what means and whether they are worth the cost in money, lives and military readiness," he said.

Skelton, who focuses his efforts on improving combat readiness of troops, backs a plan that would set a formula to send home troops. For every three Iraqi units deemed proficient, one U.S. unit should come home, he said.

U.S. Military Leaders Oppose Timetable On Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef, Drew Brown

McClatchy, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. military leaders in Iraq and in Washington on Wednesday rejected the calls for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, underscoring the difficulty of reaching any consensus on a new Iraq policy.

In an exclusive interview in Baghdad, Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, told McClatchy Newspapers that the situation in Iraq remains too unstable to withdraw troops and that setting a date for U.S. troops to start leaving would "just allow folks to wait us out."

In Washington, Army Gen. John Abizaid, chief of U.S. Central Command, went further, telling the Senate Armed Services Committee that more U.S. troops could be needed to stabilize the country.

"We have every option on the table, and we will present them to the chain of command," Abizaid said.

Asked by Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., if that meant sending more troops to Iraq, Abizaid said, "To include that."

The comments highlighted the conflict that's likely to divide Congress and the military over Iraq policy as newly empowered Democrats push the Bush administration to start bringing some troops home.

Levin, who'll chair the Senate Armed Services Committee when the new Congress convenes in January, said President Bush should tell Iraqi leaders that U.S. forces will begin gradually withdrawing in four to six months.

"We should put the responsibility for Iraq's future squarely where it belongs - on the Iraqis," Levin said. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves."

In the wake of the Democrats' election victory last week and the resignation the next day of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, expectations for a change in Iraq strategy have grown. On Monday, Bush met with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and other members of the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member panel that's studying options for Iraq policy and is expected to make a recommendation in early December.

But it's unclear whether the group will recommend substantial changes or whether Bush will accept its recommendations. The military officers' comments suggest they see little choice but to pursue present policy.

In his interview, Casey said the United States must draw down troops only when Iraqi forces can stand on their own. U.S. forces have been working for three years to build Iraqi army and police units that are capable of fighting insurgents, but the results have been mixed.

"We have always thought that we would gradually reduce our forces. So I am not against reducing troops," Casey said. "It's just got to be balanced with the Iraqi security forces and the situation on the ground. That's always been the strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0094988

Casey also repeated what U.S. commanders have been saying for some time - that the U.S. has enough troops in Iraq and that increasing troops wouldn't improve the situation. "As I have said from the beginning, I will ask for what I need to get the job done, and I have," he said. "Right now, we have what we need."

Casey said U.S. military strategy in Iraq was working, even though it may be too slow for some. He said that the Baghdad security plan, which was initiated in August, has reduced violence between Shiites and Sunnis, though he acknowledged that the number of deaths in October - 1,600, according to Baghdad's morgue - was "high."

"But those are not as high as what we saw in the summer," he said.

The situation in Iraq remains too volatile for the United States to set a timetable to start withdrawing troops, Casey said.

"I don't think that's a good idea at all," he said. "That just allows folks to wait us out."

In Washington, little new information came out of the Senate hearing.

David Satterfield, a senior adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the State Department's coordinator for Iraq, said the administration could be ready to discuss the situation in Iraq with neighboring Iran, something Baker has hinted in television interviews that the study group might recommend. The administration hasn't decided under what conditions it might be willing to do so.

"We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq," Satterfield said. "The timing of such direct dialogue is one that we still have under review."

The Bush administration accuses Iran of supporting radical Shiite militias in Iraq and charges that Syria turns a blind eye to Sunni insurgents sneaking across its borders. Bush has said he'll talk to Iran if it abandons its nuclear program, which it has refused to do.

As for troop levels, while Abizaid said it was possible that the U.S. would consider increasing the number of soldiers in Iraq, his basic position was unchanged.

Asked by Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., if more U.S. troops were needed in Iraq, Abizaid said he believed that troop levels "need to stay where they are."

Later, he told Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that sending 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq might "achieve a temporary effect," but that he didn't believe the Army and the Marine Corps could "sustain the commitment."

Abizaid also told McCain that he'd met with Casey and every division commander in Iraq and asked them if more U.S. forces would "add considerably to our ability to achieve success in Iraq."

"And they all said no," Abizaid said. "And the reason is because we want the Iraqis to do more."

Dems Call For More Urgency On Iraq (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

The leadership of the new Senate Democratic majority expressed concern Wednesday that President Bush does not understand the urgency of the situation in Iraq, and does not appear to be planning for change beyond replacing Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense.

"We are bound and determined to change course in Iraq," Sen. Harry Reid (D) of Nevada, who will be Senate majority leader in the new Congress, told a Monitor breakfast. "We have a plan, we have enunciated that plan, we have done it through legislation and a lot of talk, and we'll continue to do that."

Senator Reid was accompanied by his deputies in the Democratic leadership, Richard Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York, and Patty Murray of Washington. Senator Durbin spoke of a meeting he and Reid had attended with the president last Friday, in which he said he thought Mr. Bush was "sensitive to the fact that the political dynamic in this town has changed."

But, Durbin added, "I did not hear in the president's response on Iraq that he was preparing for change beyond the replacement of Secretary Rumsfeld. I hope that that changes in the weeks ahead with the Iraq Study commission and the president's own investigation, because ... Iraq is deterioriating by the day."

DOJ_NMG_0094989

All four senators expressed hope for bipartisanship when the Democrats take control of the House and Senate in January. Reid was complimentary of the Republicans' new leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, calling him "a creature of the Senate" who has been there a long time and understands it.

As for working with the White House, Senator Schumer offered some advice for the president: "Frankly, I hope George Bush works with us in a bipartisan way, but that means he's going to have to break from [Vice President] Dick Cheney, who does not believe in bipartisanship, who believes he is right and the rest of the country is going wrong and he has a mission to take it back."

Later, the senators added that they were not pushing for impeachment, of either Bush or Cheney.

"One of the things that we were able to cut off pretty quickly is the 'impeach Bush' program," said Reid, referring to some Democratic activists who have that goal. "That was because of two words: Dick Cheney," he joked.

Schumer blamed the administration for not listening to multiple points of view, saying that when someone does, "they kneecap him."

"They call him names, they attack their integrity or their loyalty to America," Schumer said. "And it seems to me, that's what Dick Cheney has done over and over again, in terms of not listening to other people, and the president seems to listen to Dick Cheney. So my hope is he'll listen to multiple voices, because there's a lot out there and I think it's one of the reasons they had such trouble in 2006."

The "Stay Or Leave" Debate In The US Finds A Mirror In Baghdad (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 — While Americans in a faraway land debate their fate, Iraqis have already decided on the cure. The only problem is that there is more than one set of Iraqis. Shiites want their country back. Sunni Arabs want a strongman. They cannot agree.

“We don’t want to see them in the streets,” a wiry man named Tariq said of American troops as he measured cloth in a tailor shop.

Saad Abdul Razzaq, a Sunni whose brother was killed by Shiite militiamen a week ago, was of the strongman school: “Democracy is not working. Only power can control Iraqis.”

As the United States grapples with difficult decisions over the war, Iraqis are also debating. But just when they need to band together, they have never been further apart. Their government has ground to a halt, paralyzed by disagreements between Sunni and Shiite parties. Militias are at the root of the security problem, but as long as the state remains helpless, many consider them its only solution.

The landscape is that of a country sliding into war, and Sunnis and Shiites, like Republicans and Democrats, desperately look for ways out.

Shiites agree with many Democrats: American soldiers should withdraw to their bases. Sunnis say total control by the Shiite-dominated government could mean massacres.

“It’s a disaster if the American forces stay in Iraq, but it’s also a disaster if they go,” said an elderly man named Ayad, who was discussing politics with friends in central Baghdad.

Abbas Fadhel, a college professor sitting in a social club in central Baghdad, spoke of the widening division and dim prospects for the future. “The seriousness of this is that the sectarianism has penetrated to the educated people,” he said. “They deny it, but when push comes to shove, you can see that they have become so.”

The mass kidnapping at a government ministry on Tuesday by gunmen in Iraqi military uniforms was symbolic of the breakdown. “It was really something humiliating,” said Husham al-Madfai, an architect who was sitting in his garden drinking beer Wednesday afternoon. “They went into a ministry and kidnapped tens of people. That means the government does not exist.”

But the kidnapping was interpreted in different ways. Sunnis laid much of the blame with the government. Reflecting a broad shift that has taken place among Shiites, Sunnis had more sympathy for what they saw as the government’s plight. Militias, they said, were like parasites that the government would not be able to get rid of until it gained more control over security tasks now handled by Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0094990

"It's like organized crime," said Tariq, gesturing animatedly with a thimble on one finger. "If the government had sovereignty, it could combat all these things that are going on."

Violence that many see as having been carried out by Sunnis has hardened attitudes. Muhammad Faisal, a Shiite whose brother and seven friends were shot to death in southern Baghdad on Sept. 23 while they were putting up a poster of a Shiite cleric, said the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was like "a surgeon without his instruments."

Meanwhile, militias are seen as a necessary protection against aggression by the other side.

As Shiites have risen to power and filled the ranks of the security forces, Sunnis, who used to condemn the American forces, now often see them as a primary safeguard against Shiite violence. They do not trust the government, a concern that was underscored by Tuesday's kidnapping.

The sheer magnitude of the violence since Mr. Maliki took office in the spring has swept away what trust they had. In all, five members of Mr. Abdul Razzaq's extended family have died in violence since 2003.

He would like to see a military coup, to be headed by a strongman, possibly Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister and secular Shiite with a past tied to the Baathists, the ruling party under Saddam Hussein.

"He worked with Saddam," Mr. Abdul Razzaq said. "He knows his way."

Mr. Madfai, the architect, disagreed. A coup would not work. The new government would be besieged. "All those militias will turn to fight against them," he said, speaking by telephone.

He paused as two helicopters thundered overhead. The beer was running out, he said, a problem he blamed on the Americans. All the alcohol sellers in his area, Mansour, have been killed, and most shops are now closed.

"Who's responsible for that? Rumsfeld," he said. "He should send us some beer."

Alcohol, a target of some of the Islamic militias, was not in short supply at the social club, where Shiek Mazin al-Khalaf, an Iraqi Sunni who speaks British-accented English, was enjoying a vodka. Iraqis are destined to fight, he said, because after years of abuse, they are capable only of abusing.

"Iraqis have been in prison since 1958," the year the monarchy was overthrown, he said. "The prisoners got out, they smelled the air, saw cars and cellphones. But they are criminals."

A Shiite sitting on the other side of the table took issue with the description. "Victims, not criminals," he hissed, after Mr. Khalaf left the table.

A Shiite sheik from Amara, Abd al-Karim al-Muhammadawi, offered an extreme prescriptive. He said the only solution would be to ban the major political parties, declare martial law and begin again.

The alternative, he said, is for the American military to leave Iraq completely and let the Iraqis begin a full-on civil war. "This is better than the Iraqi condition now," he said.

Faaz, a student in Sadr City, the largest Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad, agreed. "I'd prefer to have what they had in Lebanon — a declared civil war," he said. "There is a lot of killing, but no one confesses what he is really doing."

Sabah, a Shiite whose husband, a Sunni, was killed by Shiites in early September, said a full-scale pullout would be a disaster. "If the American forces leave Iraq, we will walk on bodies," she said, sitting in her tiny living room in Karada, in central Baghdad. "The war would be face to face."

For Tariq, all this talk of sects was irritating. It is bad manners in Iraqi society to ask somebody's sect. His response, when asked on Wednesday, was simply, "Muslim."

But the clunky yellow-stone building across the street, the ministry where the employees were kidnapped Tuesday, seemed a looming reminder that in Iraq, more and more often, sects count.

He was relieved to know that one of the kidnapped employees, a senior official and a wearer of his suits, had been released. The man, he said, was a Shiite.

Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

DOJ_NMG_0094991

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- While American commanders have suggested that civil war is possible in Iraq, many leaders, experts and ordinary people in Baghdad and around the Middle East say it is already underway, and that the real worry ahead is that the conflict will destroy the flimsy Iraqi state and draw in surrounding countries.

Whether the U.S. military departs Iraq sooner or later, the United States will be hard-pressed to leave behind a country that does not threaten U.S. interests and regional peace, according to U.S. and Arab analysts and political observers.

"We're not talking about just a full-scale civil war. This would be a failed-state situation with fighting among various groups," growing into regional conflict, Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director for the International Crisis Group, said by telephone from Amman, Jordan.

"The war will be over Iraq, over its dead body," Hiltermann said.

"All indications point to a current state of civil war and the disintegration of the Iraqi state," Nawaf Obaid, an adjunct fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and an adviser to the Saudi government, said last week at a conference in Washington on U.S.-Arab relations.

As Iraq's neighbors grapple with the various ideas put forward for solving the country's problems, they uniformly shudder at one proposal: dividing Iraq into separate regions for Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, and then speeding the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"To envision that you can divide Iraq into three parts is to envision ethnic cleansing on a massive scale, sectarian killing on a massive scale," Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, said Oct. 30 at a conference in Washington. "Since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited."

"When the ethnic-religious break occurs in one country, it will not fail to occur elsewhere, too," Syrian President Bashar al-Assad told Germany's Der Spiegel newsweekly recently. "It would be as it was at the end of the Soviet Union, only much worse. Large wars, small wars -- no one will be able to get a grip on the consequences."

In an analysis published last month by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Obaid said sectarian conflicts could make Iraq a battleground for the region.

Obaid described widespread interference by Iranian security forces within Iraq. He urged Saudi Arabia, which is building a 560-mile wall on its border with Iraq, to warn Iran "that if these activities are not checked," Saudi Arabia "will be forced to consider a similar overt and covert program of its own."

In Damascus, a Syrian analyst close to the Assad government warned that other countries would intervene if Iraq descended into full-scale civil war. "Iran will get involved, Turkey will get involved, Saudi Arabia, Syria," said the analyst, who spoke on condition he not be identified further.

"Regional war is very much a possibility," said Hiltermann, the analyst for the International Crisis Group. Iraq's neighbors "are hysterical about Iranian strategic advances in the region," he said.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad last month ranked Syria and Iran with al-Qaeda in Iraq, one of the country's principal Sunni Arab insurgent groups, in terms of destabilizing influences in Iraq. Despite that assessment, the United States has not held substantive talks with Syria regarding Iraq since 2004 or with Iran since the war began in 2003.

Diplomats and analysts increasingly are urging the Bush administration to reach out to both countries as part of a regional approach to quelling Iraq's troubles. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III, leader of a panel preparing a set of policy recommendations for the Bush administration, already has endorsed the idea of seeking the help of Iran and Syria.

"The thing is, because Iran and Syria both have spoiling power in Iraq, if you could neutralize them," it would ease some of the many pressures within Iraq, Hiltermann said. But he said the two countries may demand a mighty trade-off: for Syria, U.S. help with its biggest stated aim, winning back the Golan Heights from Israel; for Iran, U.S. compromise over its nuclear program.

Hiltermann acknowledged the difficulty. "I'm saying it's required," he said. "I'm not saying it's possible."

In Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City late last month, aides to one of the country's leading Shiite clerics held a rally to urge followers to bide their time until the American forces leave the country. The rally was called by followers of Moqtada al-Sadr, a strongly anti-occupation figure whose bloc is a leading partner in the current Shiite-led government and who is one likely claimant to power should the Americans withdraw.

DOJ_NMG_0094992

"Will America win?" a speaker in a brown turban demanded before the more than 1,000 protesters, as a brewing storm whirled dirt and trash and pelted ralliers with drops of cold rain. Loudspeakers shot his question back across the square.

The men thrust their fists in the air, shouting their answer out to a grim, gray sky: "No, no! America will not win!"

Between 2 percent and 5 percent of Iraq's 27 million people have been killed, wounded or uprooted since the Americans invaded in 2003, calculates Anthony H. Cordesman of the Center for International and Strategic Studies.

"This is civil war," he said.

Since midsummer, Shiite militias, Sunni insurgent groups, ad-hoc Sunni self-defense groups and tribes have accelerated campaigns of sectarian cleansing that are forcing countless thousands of Shiites and Sunnis in Baghdad to seek safety among their own kind.

Whole towns north and south of Baghdad are locked in the same sectarian struggle, among them the central Shiite city of Balad, still under siege by gunmen from surrounding Sunni towns after a bloody spate of sectarian massacres last month.

Even outside the epicenter of sectarian strife in the central region of the country, Shiite factions battle each other in the south, Sunni tribes and factions clash in the west. Across Iraq, the criminal gangs that emerged with the collapse of law and order rule patches of turf as mini-warlords.

Since the war began, 1.6 million Iraqis have sought refuge in neighboring countries; at least 231,530 people have been displaced inside Iraq since February, when Shiite-Sunni violence exploded with the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the northern city of Samarra, according to figures from the United Nations and the U.N.-affiliated International Organization for Migration.

There used to be a time when Sunnis and Shiites "were living like family. We were married to each other, we all had Sunni friends, we all had Shiite friends. It was all like a balloon that exploded," a gaunt, weeping Sunni woman said in her bare apartment.

Until this year, the 41-year-old widow and former teacher -- who would identify herself only as Um Mohammed, fearing retaliation -- lived in Husseiniyah, a Shiite district of Baghdad. But after Shiite militias forced all the Sunnis out, she fled to a too-costly, too-small place in the overwhelmingly Sunni neighborhood of Sadiyah, on the western side of the Tigris River.

The Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, two militias loyal to the Shiite religious parties now governing Iraq, had taken over her old neighborhood by this spring, she said. Mahdi Army officials commandeered the two rental homes she relied on to support herself and her children. They forced the Sunni tenants out and installed Shiite families, who paid her rent through the Mahdi Army office, at a greatly reduced price set by the militia, the widow said.

Letters placed at the doors of Sunni families -- sometimes with bloody bullets tucked inside the envelopes -- warned Sunnis to leave. Shiite boys as young as 10 took to wearing the black clothes of the militias, and they promised her 10-year-old son, Ahmed, they would burn him alive in his house at night as he slept.

Um Mohammed reluctantly took her only other child still at home, a 15-year-old daughter, out of school and married her off to an older man in Sadiyah in a bid to provide her protection among fellow Sunnis. When Um Mohammed received a third letter threatening death, she and Ahmed finally moved to Sadiyah. Longtime Shiite neighbors sadly watched her leave but were too afraid of the militias to help her move, she said.

"I want to return to my home. But we are safer here," she said.

Across the Tigris River from Um Mohammed, another widow, Zayneb Khatan, a Shiite, sat in her equally plain new home. After gunmen shot and killed her husband in front of their home in the Sunni neighborhood of Cairo as he went to buy bread, Khatan fled with her 2-year-old daughter and the clothes on their backs.

"Some Sunnis are good," she said as she sat on a secondhand divan. "But I cannot say I will ever live among them again."

Iran Hints That US Shouldn't Withdraw From Iraq Too Soon (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

LONDON — Iran has consistently opposed the presence of U.S. forces in Iraq, but new prospects of a stepped-up American withdrawal are prompting growing unease in the Islamic Republic, where many fear the repercussions of a dangerously unstable neighbor.

DOJ_NMG_0094993

Officially, Iran's policy remains flatly opposed to American troops in Iraq and characterizes them as a key contributor to the escalating violence. Iran's government says it wants the U.S. to withdraw at the earliest possible opportunity.

But the U.S. elections this month that swept in a Democratic majority to Congress and subsequent talk of a phased pullout have touched off a discussion in Tehran about the outright anarchy that could result.

On Tuesday night, Tehran's English-language news channel featured commentary from political scientist Pirouz Mojtahedzadeh, who called for the U.S. to remain in Iraq until it has established a strong, stable central government capable of providing adequate security.

"The Americans can't simply withdraw from Iraq, leaving the mess as it is," Mojtahedzadeh said in a telephone interview from the Iranian capital afterward. "Who's going to look for the safety of the Iraqis there? The Iranians can't do it. The Turks can't do it.... This is not a question of political rivalry between Iran and the West. It has to do with the fact that the society has to have a government structure in place."

Analysts familiar with official thinking say there is growing support for views like Mojtahedzadeh's within Iran's professional foreign policy establishment, if not within the hard-line circles closest to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and a feeling that a drawn-out timetable for withdrawal would be preferable to a quick pullout.

"They've not said it directly and openly as an official policy line, that they'd like the U.S. to stay, but I think there's a sense among the Iranians that they understand that the U.S. cannot just leave immediately," said Hadi Semati, an Iranian political analyst who is a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution.

"If you're talking about the officials and the foreign policy establishment, I think they're more these days cognizant and aware of the possible dangers and repercussions of civil war and the collapse of what is left of Iraqi governance on Iran. The fact [is] that if the bloodshed gets out of hand, they might at some point feel compelled to intervene to support their Shiite co-religionists against extremists and death squads and mass killings," Semati said.

"At the same time, they don't want to be seen as the one that supports a U.S. occupation force. That's why they're conflicted," he said.

'Source of instability'

An official Iranian source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Iran's position was unchanged and continued to urge a quick U.S. withdrawal.

"We oppose the Western forces continuing the occupation there. As long as they are there, we think the violence in this situation will continue, and it does not help whatsoever the stability in the region," he said.

Another official source echoed that view. "Why would the U.S. think that their rapid withdrawal would be rejected by Iran? Do they think their presence is a help? Iran thinks it is not," he said.

"Some in the U.S. argue that Iran wants the U.S. to stay because it is a good target for Iran, and will every day face new problems there. But I think their presence also is a source of instability for the region, and Iran is rather a supporter of the Iraqi government and people and doesn't want to witness their daily pain."

Still, Mojtahedzadeh, who also operates a think tank in London, said the fact that he was invited to argue against a rapid U.S. withdrawal on Iranian television suggested some level of official sanction of the view.

"I think the official position is in agreement with this," he said. "It works very subtly, in ways that are not quite obvious.

"But someone like me being on the record on Iranian radio and TV saying it's not wise to push the U.S. out of Iraq because the aggressor, according to international laws, has the duty of putting things back in place, this tells you everything," he said.

Iranian analysts said senior officials would never vary from Iran's established line opposing U.S. intervention. And, they said, no one in Iran is in favor of a long-term U.S. presence in Iraq. There appears to be unanimity in the government that the upper Persian Gulf is Iran's domain and that there certainly should be no U.S. bases there.

But on the issue of the timing of a withdrawal, there are various constituencies to whom Iran must speak, said Ali Ansari, a professor of Iranian studies in Britain and author of "Confronting Iran: The Failure of American Foreign Policy and the Next Great Crisis in the Middle East."

"To the Arab Middle East, Iran says yes, the Americans are part of the problem, get out. But then there are the Iranians who say, 'When we say get out, we don't mean get out and leave it in a mess,' " Ansari said.

DOJ_NMG_0094994

He said that although the official line of Ahmadinejad remains unchanged, "there's a strong class of bureaucratic thinkers, strategic thinkers in the Foreign Ministry, who think that actually it serves our interests better [if U.S. troops remain a bit longer]. Because let's face it, if the Americans leave, all this inside fighting in Iraq might turn on the Iranians. As long as the Americans are still there, they are acting as a lighting rod for that."

'A paradox'

The range of opinion also extends to hard-liners, analysts said, who have opposed the occupation but relish seeing the U.S. bogged down and embarrassed in Iraq, and distracted from going after Iran's nuclear program.

"There are some in the hard-liners who say while the Americans are there, they're within reach [of Iranian missiles] if we need to retaliate," Ansari said.

The schizophrenic thinking on the issue was clearly reflected in the recent visit of former reformist President Mohammad Khatami to the U.S., where he advised against a speedy exit from Iraq.

"We are at a paradox," he told an audience at the University of Virginia. "The occupation must end so there can be peace. But also, you can't leave the present Iraqi government at the mercy of the terrorists. If you ask me should the Americans leave tomorrow, I'd say, 'No, don't do it.' "

Kaveh Afrasiabi, author of "After Khomeini: New Directions in Iran's Foreign Policy," said a rapid U.S. pullout would jeopardize the two "pillars" of Iranian policy on Iraq: Iraq's "national unity" and territorial integrity, goals that are shared with the U.S. That has prompted some to recognize the need for "a more nuanced foreign policy balancing act."

Yet that stance is far from a full about-face, he said. And some Iranian officials say privately that some in the U.S. appear to be using threats of a speedy pullout as a way of inducing Iran to make concessions in other areas, namely its controversial nuclear program.

In the end, Semati said, Iran would be most happy if a joint solution to the Iraq conflict was engineered by the U.S. and Iran in tandem, leading to a withdrawal of U.S. troops on the basis of "a shared success."

"They would like to see the U.S. succeed in stabilizing Iraq, but they would like to share in that success," he said. "They're the major player inside Iraq, they have lent their support to the Iraqi [democratic] transition, and they think the Americans have paid very little attention to their contribution," he said.

US Should Add Troops To Prevent Disaster In Iraq (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

To salvage stability from what looks like inevitable chaos in Iraq, the United States needs a new strategy that produces security, political reconciliation and hope.

That should involve sending more U.S. troops — at least on a temporary basis — while pressuring the Iraqi government for reform and mounting a massive jobs project to reduce unemployment in the country.

It would be politically impossible for the Bush administration to increase U.S. troop levels after Democrats won the recent elections, but conceivably it could be done if the idea is blessed by the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.).

Even though only 16 percent of Americans favor sending more U.S. troops, according to election exit polls, they're desperately needed to secure Baghdad, to train Iraqi forces and undercut the population's increasing dependency on sectarian militias.

The offer to send more troops ought to be contingent on the Iraqi government's willingness to take steps, at long last, toward national reconciliation and its willingness to bring the militias under control.

To undergird the case, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki should be told that if he doesn't take necessary steps — and soon — U.S. withdrawal will be inevitable, with disastrous consequences for him and his country.

The only major U.S. politician who is calling for more U.S. troops is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), but he's made a powerful case for years that the Bush administration was refusing to supply enough forces to secure the country.

DOJ_NMG_0094995

As McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, "We're paying the price for the failure of our policy in the past and the question, then, before the American people is, are we ready to quit? And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos for the region, which will spread."

Clearly, some Americans, mainly liberal Democrats, are ready to quit and have been ready for a long time, some even before hostilities began. The exit polls showed that 30 percent of Americans want to withdraw all U.S. troops, and that this group voted Democratic by a margin of 83 percent to 15 percent.

Among the raft of books analyzing the Bush administration's mistakes in Iraq, Thomas Ricks' "Fiasco" makes a compelling case that the anti-Iraq War side had it right at the beginning: Not only did Saddam Hussein not have weapons of mass destruction, but the Clinton administration's much-criticized 1998 bombing raids nearly toppled his regime and made it entirely possible to contain Iraqi aggression.

And Ricks' extensive interviews with (mainly retired) military commanders makes it sickeningly plain, for any supporter of the war like me, how carelessly former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and his "neo-conservative" top civilian aides planned the war's aftermath.

In Ricks' telling, Rumsfeld and Co. were determined not to listen to any advice from any war doubters — notably, former CENTCOM commander Gen. Anthony Zinni and Secretary of State Colin Powell — and discarded extensive post-invasion plans drawn up by Zinni and the State Department.

Rumsfeld also fired or intimidated commanders who called for higher troop levels, seemingly determined to disprove the "Powell Doctrine," that U.S. operations should be undertaken only with massive force.

The result was that, while allied forces won a quick a military victory, they could not establish security for the population and massive looting, destruction and insurgency quickly followed.

The Rumsfeld decision to disband the Iraqi army — or not call its lower echelons back into being after it dissolved — also left hundreds of thousands of armed men unemployed and ready for mobilization by insurgent groups.

Despite widespread calls for Rumsfeld's ouster, Bush stuck with him until last week — and might well have kept him aboard indefinitely, had Democrats not captured both chambers of Congress.

As any number of Republicans have privately complained, firing Rumsfeld much earlier — say, in September — would have signaled that Bush really meant to change strategies and might have tempered GOP losses in the elections.

Regardless of past errors, however, Bush, along with newly empowered Democrats, have to figure out a strategy that does not result in total chaos in Iraq, regional conflict among Iraq's neighbors, creation of a terrorist state and an utter strategic defeat for the United States.

Even though the Baker-Hamilton commission hasn't reported its recommendations yet, Democrats are calling for troop withdrawals, some leading to a full U.S. departure on a fixed deadline while others are on a phased basis beginning in four to six months with no fixed deadlines.

An increase in the U.S. troop presence — by, say, 50,000 personnel for Baghdad duty in 2007 — will be possible only if it comes with strong backing from the bipartisan commission. Such an idea has been rumored as among the steps being considered by the panel.

But no stability is possible in Iraq without a political settlement that ensures minority Sunnis adequate oil revenues and political representation. Democrats such as Sen. Carl Levin (Mich.) want to force Iraqi action by moving toward troop withdrawals.

Brookings Institution scholar Michael O'Hanlon says that Bush could well leverage the Democratic victory, and the prospect of withdrawals, to prod al-Maliki to take needed action, playing "good cop" to the Democrats' "bad cop."

O'Hanlon also told me he had recommended to the Baker-Hamilton commission that the U.S. mount a large-scale jobs program to reduce Iraqi unemployment from its astronomical levels of 30 percent to 50 percent.

One good result of the 2006 elections is that both parties are now responsible for Iraq policy. Bush and the Democrats should work together to achieve something that can be called success — or even victory.

About 70 Freed After Mass Iraq Abduction (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0094996

By Thomas Wagner

AP, November 15, 2006

Kidnappers released about 70 people snatched in a mass abduction by suspected Shiite militiamen who answer to a key backer of the prime minister — a sign the militants went too far and Iraq's leader may be yielding to intense U.S. pressure to crack down on sectarian violence.

But Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki clearly has more work to do. Iraqi police, hospital and morgue officials reported 105 new violent deaths Wednesday; 54 of the victims were tortured and shot, their bodies dumped in Baghdad.

The quick release of many of the captives — less than 24 hours after the abductions — was surprising in a country where hundreds of Iraqis have been kidnapped, murdered and dumped in streets or rivers each month. In two recent mass kidnappings, both of about 50 people, the victims were never heard of again.

It was unclear how many Iraqis remained captive from Tuesday's assault. Government ministries have given wildly varying figures on the number of people seized, with reports ranging from a high of about 150 to a low of 40 to 50.

"We have information about the kidnappers and where the rest of the hostages are being held. Work is going well to release them," Higher Education Minister Abed Theyab told Al-Arabiya television.

The mass abduction took place in broad daylight when gunmen disguised in the blue camouflage uniforms of police commandos raided the Higher Education Ministry in Karradah, a primarily Shiite area of downtown Baghdad, handcuffed their victims and took them away in about 20 pickup trucks.

The assault was widely believed to have been the work of the Mahdi Army, the heavily armed militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and it raised questions about al-Maliki's commitment to wipe out the Shiite militias of his prime political backers: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and al-Sadr's Sadrist Movement.

The mass abduction was seen as retaliation for the recent kidnapping of 50 Shiites south of Baghdad.

But al-Maliki's public criticism of the kidnappers, and the fact that his Shiite-dominated government quickly won the release of many captives, appeared to be a sign that the militants had gone too far and the prime minister was ready to comply with U.S. demands to corral the militias and their death squads.

Many of the fighters are believed to operate within the country's police and security forces, both of which are run and dominated by Shiites.

On Monday, Gen. John Abizaid, chief of the U.S. Central Command, became the third Washington heavyweight in two weeks to tell al-Maliki that the armed groups had to be disbanded and disarmed and the United States wanted proof.

Frustration has been growing inside the Bush administration over al-Maliki's perceived disregard for the country's Sunni Arab minority, which dominated the country until the fall of Saddam Hussein.

The United States has struggled since it invaded in 2003 to build a democratic and multi-sectarian and multiethnic government. Al-Maliki has been increasingly seen as a reluctant partner, if not a hindrance.

Until about nine months ago, the Shiite majority had resisted major acts of revenge against some Sunni insurgent groups and al-Qaida in Iraq and its allies that were behind the killing of U.S. troops and thousands of Shiites in bomb and mortar attacks.

But after the Feb. 22 bombing of a major Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad, enraged Shiites began fighting back — primarily members of the Mahdi Army who stormed out of Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum bent on revenge. Al-Maliki is heavily dependent on al-Sadr, the militia's benefactor, for his political survival.

When al-Maliki became prime minister in May at the head of a nominal national unity government, he put forward a 24-point reconciliation plan that was optimistically seen as a bid to draw disaffected Sunnis into the political fold.

But as the months passed, extreme violence blamed on the Mahdi Army and to a lesser degree on the Badr Brigade, another Shiite militia, spiraled out of control. The brutal sectarian killings brought Iraq to the edge of civil war.

The unleashing of the militias and their death squads only compounded anger among moderate Sunnis over the prime minister's seeming inaction on concrete moves toward national reconciliation.

But al-Maliki's handling of Tuesday's mass kidnapping suggested that he has realized he can no longer ignore U.S. demands regarding the militias, now that Democrats have taken control of the U.S. Congress and with President Bush reconsidering the goals and mission of U.S. forces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0094997

Al-Maliki first appeared to minimize the importance of kidnappings Tuesday, saying on television: "What is happening is not terrorism, but the result of disagreements and conflict between militias belonging to this side or that."

But on Wednesday he said, "Most of the hostages were freed, but that is not enough for us. We will chase those who did this ugly criminal act."

Authorities arrested six top police officers who served in the Shiite region where the kidnapping occurred and the Mahdi Army is increasingly powerful.

Meeting with professors and students at Baghdad University to show of support for the country's educational institutions, the prime minister said: "We regret what happened yesterday. The government's reaction was strong."

Higher Education Ministry spokesman Basil al-Khatib said 40 employees of the Higher Education Ministry, which handles academic grants and exchanges, were released Tuesday and 32 more were freed Wednesday.

Al-Khatib said Theyab, a Sunni, had suspended his participation in the government until all the kidnap victims were released.

Among the 105 who were killed or found dead in Iraq on Wednesday, 11 died in the deadliest single attack — a car bomb that also wounded at least 32 near a gasoline station in central Baghdad's Bab Shargi area, police said.

The day's fatalities included journalists Fadia Mohammed al-Taie in Mosul and Luma al-Karkhi in Baqouba.

At least 91 journalists have been killed in Iraq since hostilities began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count based on statistics kept by the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Also, 36 other media employees, including drivers, interpreters and guards, have been killed — all of them Iraqi except for one Lebanese.

The U.S. military also announced the combat deaths of three U.S. Army soldiers and three U.S. Marines, raising the number of American war dead to 2,858. So far this month, 40 American service members have been killed or died in Iraq.

The six all died Tuesday, four fighting in the insurgent stronghold of Anbar Province in western Iraq and two whose convoy was hit by a roadside bomb in Baghdad.

Kidnappings Stir Political Dispute In Iraq (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 — A dispute erupted Wednesday between Iraqi officials over the fate of dozens of captives abducted from a government building, undermining an effort by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to project an image of authority during the crisis.

A spokesman for Abed Dhiab al-Ajeeli, the minister of higher education, said nearly 100 of about 150 captives were still being held a day after the kidnapping, at the ministry's compound. But the government's chief spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, contended that only 39 people had been kidnapped and that all but 2 had been released. Both men angrily dismissed the other's comments as false.

Late Wednesday, Mr. Dhiab, one of the few Sunni Arabs in Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated cabinet, announced that he was stepping down from his post until all the captives had been rescued. In a written statement, apparently directed at the Maliki administration, he said that any effort to make the kidnapping "a political issue" would be "unacceptable behavior."

The disagreements emerged as Mr. Maliki and his aides sought to convey a sense of governmental cohesion and resolve in response to the abductions. Mr. Dabbagh attributed the releases to an aggressive series of overnight raids and persistent pressure on the kidnappers by Iraqi security forces. Mr. Maliki told an audience at the University of Baghdad that he would bring the kidnappers to justice.

Mr. Maliki has been accused by American officials and some Iraqi leaders of failing to act decisively to curb surging violence, eliminate rampant corruption and improve public services. In particular, he has been criticized for his inability, or unwillingness, to dismantle Shiite militias linked to the governing Shiite parties yet responsible for staging sectarian attacks in cooperation with Iraqi security forces or with access to government uniforms and vehicles.

Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders have tried to deflect attention away from the militias, insisting that the greatest threat to public security still remains the insurgency, led by Sunni Arabs, which is responsible for the vast majority of casualties inflicted on American and Iraqi government forces. At the same time, the prime minister has pressed American officials to give him more authority over the country's security.

DOJ_NMG_0094998

But the mass kidnapping on Tuesday, conducted inside a government building during office hours, underscored the profound weaknesses of Iraq's security forces and put further strain on Mr. Maliki's relationships with the Americans and his Sunni Arab critics.

The kidnapping, by gunmen wearing Iraqi police commando uniforms and driving more than 20 vehicles with Interior Ministry markings, was similar in style to several other mass abductions this year. The captives, who included Shiites, Sunni Arabs, Kurds and Christians, were driven to a predominantly Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, officials said, probably passing through numerous police checkpoints unimpeded.

Hours after the abduction, the Interior Ministry, which oversees the nation's police forces, arrested several police commanders in charge of the area where the ministry site is. And late Tuesday, Mr. Maliki, in an appearance on state-run television, said he had ordered an intensive search for the kidnapping victims.

But the identity of the kidnappers remained unclear on Wednesday, as did their motive.

Mr. Dabbagh said the kidnapping had been conducted by a "gang of criminals that belongs to a certain militia," and was intended to foment sectarian tensions, but he did not identify the militia. He said he could not explain why the kidnappers had attacked the Ministry of Higher Education. The attackers were "trying to break the stability between the Shiites and Sunnis," he said in a telephone interview.

The ministry has long been viewed as a Sunni Arab bastion. During Saddam Hussein's rule, it was known mockingly among non-Sunnis as "the Ministry of Al Ani and Al Rawi," after two towns in the overwhelmingly Sunni Arab province of Anbar, said Dr. Abdullah Kendoush, a longtime physicist in the Ministry of Science and Technology who recently left Iraq to take a temporary post at the University of Florida in Gainesville.

In the argument over numbers, Basil al-Khateeb, the spokesman for the Ministry of Higher Education, said late Wednesday that "about 150 people" had been kidnapped and 52 of them had been released. He said the ministry had arrived at its tallies by debriefing witnesses and victims who were freed.

Mr. Dabbagh said that in all, 16 ministry employees, 18 guards and five visitors had been kidnapped from the building and that 37 had been released by late Wednesday under pressure from Iraqi security forces conducting operations in eastern Baghdad. He described Mr. Khateeb's comments by saying, "That is not an official statement of the government."

The American military command put the number of kidnapping victims at about 55.

Balal Hassan, a Sunni Arab who said his brother Walid worked for the ministry and was one of those kidnapped, said he and his relatives had been desperately trying to find out information about the kidnappings but had received no help from government officials. "So far they have done nothing," he said in a telephone interview. "Hopefully they will do something significant."

The United States military on Wednesday announced the deaths of six Americans. Three marines and one soldier were killed on Tuesday during combat operations in Anbar Province, the military said, and two soldiers were killed by a bomb in northwestern Baghdad.

A car bomb exploded on Wednesday at a gas station near the Interior Ministry, killing eight people and wounding 32, according to a ministry official. A suicide bomber joined a crowd of mourners at a funeral in Dora, in southern Baghdad, and detonated his explosives, killing three people and wounding 12.

In Iraqi Colleges, Fear For An Already Shrunken Realm (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 -- Over the past six months, Professor Amir Hassan's world has been shrinking. Two colleagues were assassinated, one with his family. Another was kidnapped. Two received death threats, forcing one to flee to Jordan. And since September, six other senior members of his political science department at Baghdad University have left Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0094999

Now, Hassan, a slim, carefully groomed man with a snowy mustache and owlish glasses, expects his world to condense even more. On Wednesday, in words filled with deep foreboding, he said the mass abduction of scores of people from a government educational agency a day earlier would persuade more academics to flee, further weakening a crucial, if fragile, pillar of Iraq.

"We are living in the killing stage," Hassan said, seated behind a neat desk in a spare, dimly lit office. "We know that our chance of dying is now greater than our chance of staying alive."

The emotions unleashed by one of the biggest mass kidnappings since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion reverberated across Iraq on Wednesday, splitting the cabinet along sectarian lines and spawning a heated dispute over how many men were abducted. But the most profound effect of what many Iraqis view as a national calamity was felt in university halls and campuses across Iraq. Here, the abductions highlighted the plight of academics and an educational system besieged by sectarian tensions, lawlessness and government ineffectiveness.

"What happened in Baghdad yesterday was a catastrophe that could destroy the entire educational process," said Fikret Mahmoud Omar, an instructor at a technical college in the northern city of Kirkuk. "It shows that the process in Iraq is on the verge of collapse and confirms that terrorists and militias are the ones who are in control of events."

By late Wednesday night, it was still unclear how many Iraqis remained captive after Tuesday's brazen daylight raid on a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad's upscale Karrada neighborhood. About 80 gunmen, dressed in blue police commando uniforms and driving police vehicles with no license plates, handcuffed, blindfolded and carried off male employees and visitors. They locked women up in rooms before driving away in their official-looking convoy.

Less than 24 hours later, captives were being freed, an unusual development in a nation where kidnap victims are often held for months or killed. A Ministry of Higher Education spokesman, Bilal al-Khatib, said about 70 of as many as 150 kidnap victims had been released. But Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said about 40 had been set free and only a few remained captive. Higher Education Minister Abed Thiyab, a prominent Sunni Muslim, declared he would suspend his "membership in the Maliki government until all hostages are released."

Even as politicians bickered, they voiced a common belief that the assault could have serious repercussions in educational institutions across the country. Already, Khatib said, at least 160 professors have been killed since the U.S.-led invasion and more than 1,500 have fled the country, part of the growing exodus of middle-class professionals. Hassan, the professor, said he believes the kidnappers targeted the agency Tuesday because it granted scholarships to Iraqi professors and students applying to study abroad.

"This was the means to have contact with other countries. So if they cut this, they cut life," said Hassan, who said he himself had no plans to flee Iraq.

On Wednesday, Maliki visited Baghdad University, one of Iraq's most prestigious academic institutions, to show his commitment to bolstering security and stopping sectarian strife.

Addressing students and professors, he described the kidnappers as "worse than extremists" and said the attack was a product of militia rivalries. Although no group has asserted responsibility, many people say they believe Shiite Muslim militias -- especially the Mahdi Army, linked to cleric and political kingmaker Moqtada al-Sadr -- were behind the abductions. Shiite groups have staged previous mass kidnappings and are widely believed to have infiltrated Iraq's security forces.

"We will chase those who did this ugly criminal act," Maliki promised.

But his audience was more interested about his plans for Iraq's universities. Several students and professors stood up to ask him questions about how he would shield them from the chaos infecting Iraq. Maliki said he would ban pictures, leaflets, placards or other politically inspired materials from campuses "because the universities shall remain outside partisan politics or sectarian affiliation." He also promised that the government would "allocate funds to support students" and that professors and students would be protected.

"I hope you will continue your studies vigorously and not bow in front of those who want to paralyze our universities," Maliki told the gathering. "We regret what happened yesterday, but the government's reaction was strong."

In Kirkuk, Essam Muhedeen Arzad, a student at the College of Education, said Maliki's words calmed him. "I feel very sad for what has happened, particularly since we are in Iraq, which is the land of civilization and learning," Arzad said. "We need to capture those who are responsible for this act and bring them to justice to show the world that we are a nation of civilized people and will not accept such terrorist acts."

DOJ_NMG_0095000

But for other college students, the abductions were a tipping point. For months, Faiha Abdul Jabar, in her second year studying science at Diyala University, said she was thinking of quitting her studies and staying home. A few hours after the assault, she was convinced.

"As a girl, I have a lot of fears from what happened yesterday," Abdul Jabar said. "Those armed men were able to storm into a governmental office and kidnap all the employees, and no one was able to save them or protect them. So what will happen to us if armed men stormed our college and kidnapped us?"

"The government is responsible for what is happening, and the government is responsible for making me lose this year," she added.

Zaman Adam Ali, who is studying English at Diyala University, also quit her studies on Tuesday, along with her two sisters, Eman and Hanan. "The government is responsible for destroying our future," Ali said.

Like almost every upheaval nowadays in Iraq, the kidnappings are being viewed through a prism of sectarianism. Muhammad Jamal, a law student at Tikrit University, sees the political disputes as an attempt by Shiite officials, hardened by sectarian divisions, to "lessen the importance" of the assaults. "This action is proof that we have a sectarian government," he said.

In a parking lot at Baghdad University on Wednesday, Lena Sadhi and Fatima Salim were standing next to a white car. Two hours earlier, they and other students had staged a protest. They heard that the Ministry of Higher Education was considering shutting down universities in the capital in the wake of the abductions, citing poor security. But they were hungry for education.

"The government doesn't want to continue our studies. That's why we protested," said Salim, who wore an aquamarine head scarf. "Why can people in the north and in the south be able to finish their studies and we can't?"

But Salim was also angry at the kidnappers. "They want our life to collapse," she said. "The only life we have is the university."

US Troops Look For An Inside Man In Iraqi Slayings (LAT)

By Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

Baghdad — The U.S. soldier looked around a crowded Iraqi home and watched as an old man in a green dishdasha robe scooted across to an interpreter and whispered in his ear.

"The guy says if you don't take action, they're going" to do it themselves, the interpreter told Capt. Rob Murdough. The threat of vigilante revenge caused Murdough's face to flush.

"That's not justice," he said sharply, and turned to a young man sitting on a couch with half a dozen elders.

Murdough normally led a mortar platoon, but in a city awash in killings he had become a detective trying to solve a mass kidnapping and slaying that may have been ordered by Iraqi police officials. After two frustrating days, Murdough thought he was finally near a break in the case: The young man he had come to see might be able to lead him to a suspect.

At least 22 Iraqi men had been kidnapped from a meatpacking plant, and six who were Sunni Arab Muslims had been shot dead. Investigators were trying to find an inside man — a Shiite Muslim employee at the plant — who they thought had helped the killers.

The employee, named Hussein, was believed to have contacts with the Al Mahdi army, the Shiite militia loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

If Murdough could get the young man to lead him to Hussein's house, the Army would arrest the suspect. But the young man had good reason to be leery. There was a sniper in Hussein's neighborhood, which was filled with Al Mahdi militiamen, he said. When a stranger walks in, they call each other by cellphone, he told the American soldier.

Murdough urged the young man to ride in a U.S. armored vehicle, promising he would remain hidden. After a time, he agreed and drew a crude map to Hussein's street, warning that the Al Mahdi army members there didn't want "anything to do with American soldiers."

DOJ_NMG_0095001

Inside, the young man crouched on one of the vehicle's low benches, next to the interpreter and a soldier. His eyes grew wide as he examined the jumble around him: high-tech communications gear, weapons, an ice chest, a garbage bag. As the vehicle moved down the street, a soldier gave him a helmet and combat shirt and an olive blindfold. He tied it over his nose like a movie outlaw. Only his eyes showed.

The armored vehicle made a few turns and stopped. The soldiers got out and moved down a street of low walls and iron gates, taking a few minutes to chat with each man they encountered, just as they would on a routine patrol.

"Hi, we're here to help," Murdough said time and again. "Do you have any information about bad guys?"

Murdough noticed several men and boys gathered at one of the houses. He told Pfc. Julia Thompson, the team's only woman, to quietly take a photo. Thompson then took the camera back to the armored vehicle. The young man inside studied the image on the camera screen. One of the men was Hussein's father, he said, another his brother.

Murdough and his men moved on, casually stopping at several houses and sidewalk shops. Then they strolled back to the group. "Could we take a picture of your family?" he asked.

The men looked surprised, but agreed. While they posed, Murdough asked casually about the family. One of the men introduced two sons and said a third was at work. "What's his name?" Murdough asked.

"Hussein," the man said.

Murdough had located the suspect's home. Now he hoped that he had concealed his purpose enough to avoid scaring Hussein off. In a few days, he would return and try to make an arrest.

By now, Murdough and his commanding officer, Lt. Col. John Norris, were making progress in the investigation. They had evidence that pointed to police involvement in the slayings: In the empty lot where six of the kidnapping victims had been found shot to death, U.S. soldiers discovered shell casings that bore the characteristic square indentation made by a Glock handgun, a sidearm rare in Iraq except among the American-armed security forces.

Norris already had ordered one Iraqi police unit off the streets and back to its barracks for retraining. But he knew the unit would one day return to patrol, and he was concerned about its leadership.

On the fourth day after the kidnappings, Norris went to police headquarters to have what he thought would be a "face to face" with the Iraqi battalion's new commander.

Instead, after Norris cooled his heels in a dreary reception room, a large Iraqi man in a brown suit strode in followed by a videographer and a photographer. The man sat regally in the commander's chair and announced himself as Brig. Gen. Najim. Norris was surprised. Najim had been in command of three Iraqi police battalions, but Norris thought he had been dismissed.

Najim spoke to the American in a strident voice, keeping his eyes focused on the camera. Speaking through Norris' interpreter, the general insisted that Iraqi media had made up the story of police involvement in the kidnappings. The Iraqi police had conducted their own investigation, he declared.

"Everyone knows now we had nothing to do with that."

Norris disagreed. "They were Iraqi national police in Iraqi national police vehicles who conducted the kidnapping," he said.

"Only one vehicle," the general said.

"They carried Motorolas" — the type of portable radio used by Iraqi police — Norris said. "It was an organized Iraqi national police force."

Growing agitated, Norris recounted a killing he had witnessed the day before the kidnappings about 200 yards from an Iraqi national police checkpoint.

"An Iraqi citizen was murdered on this street in cold blood," he said. "A vehicle stopped. Two individuals stepped out, shot him in the head several times. They got in the car and drove away."

Norris grabbed three soda cans to illustrate what he had seen.

"Iraqi national police headquarters," he declared, plunking down the first can on a coffee table. "Iraqi national police checkpoint," he said, putting the second down nearby. "Local national murdered in cold blood," he said, banging the third can on the table in front of the second.

DOJ_NMG_0095002

"I have an Iraqi national police vehicle drive by while I'm standing there. I personally ask him to help. He said, 'It's not my job,' " Norris said. "Does this sound like the performance we want of the Iraqi national police? Is this somebody deserving of the respect of the Iraqi people?"

Najim seemed unimpressed. "What kind of vehicle was it?" he asked, sidestepping Norris' question.

As if on cue, an Iraqi officer entered the room, interrupting to announce that the battalion had been assembled.

"Do you want to see my men?" the general asked.

About 200 men came sloppily to attention as Najim and his American visitors walked out to the drill yard behind the building. "At ease," Najim said, displaying his authority. The men squatted on the concrete.

"Don't pay attention to the media," he said, as Norris looked on, astonished at the Iraqi's audacity. "They always say the wrong thing. Keep up the good work. You are all patriots."

As he moved to leave, police officers approached and kissed his cheek.

Third of four parts. Next: A little victory.

Nurture Iraqi Democracy, From The Ground Up (LAT)

By Michael Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

THE DEMOCRATICALLY elected government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has proved a grave disappointment. Security has worsened since Maliki has been in power. Ignoring the pleas of U.S. officials, he has been unwilling to crack down on the militias and death squads that fuel sectarian violence — and the mass kidnapping from a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad on Tuesday by gunmen in police uniforms shows the consequences.

Last month, Maliki's government refused to cooperate with U.S. troops searching for a kidnapped comrade. A week later, Maliki ordered U.S. forces to lift a blockade of Sadr City, where the missing soldier was believed to be held.

Corruption remains corrosive. Maliki's administration has hemorrhaged hundreds of millions of dollars. Oil revenues and foreign aid disappear. Maliki and his allies treat ministries as mechanisms for patronage. They dispense jobs to political loyalists, not able technocrats. Officials in the Shiite-dominated Health Ministry, for example, have replaced experienced doctors with uneducated militiamen.

But does this mean that the U.S. ambition to bring democracy to Iraq was a mistake? As a supporter of the war, and later an advisor to the U.S. occupation authority, I don't think so. Despite our disappointment with Maliki, the strategic rationale for promoting democracy in the Middle East — and in Iraq in particular — remains sound. But it needs to be a long-term strategy, as demonstrated by our success in Korea, where more than 35,000 American servicemen sacrificed their lives. Half a century later, the juxtaposition of totalitarian, destitute and nuclear North Korea with thriving and peaceful South Korea shows the value of a long-term strategy to build democracy.

With chaos growing, impatience in Washington should not come as a surprise. In March, Congress charged a bipartisan commission chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) to look at Iraq with "fresh eyes," but it's already clear that its final recommendations will not make a priority of preserving democracy. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has said he has no confidence in Maliki and has called for Iraq's division. Others seek to scrap the constitution or impose a strongman. Rumors circulate in Baghdad that the CIA plans a coup.

But to give up on democracy would affirm our adversaries' conspiracy theories, betray the Iraqi people and undercut U.S. diplomacy for decades. Rather, Washington should leave the elected government in place but stop funding it. If Maliki wants to treat ministries as fiefdoms, let him do it without our money. American taxpayers are under no obligation to subsidize an ineffective government that is hostile to U.S. interests.

Some who advocate shock therapy to reform the Maliki government, such as Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), argue that the way to force it to take responsibility is through a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. But only the best-armed groups would benefit. Ending subsidies to the central government, though, would promote better government, more efficient tax collection and greater transparency over oil revenues (without, most likely, actually bringing down the Maliki government). Accountability, not elections, is the bedrock of democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0095003

I'm not suggesting that aid to Iraq should be cut off entirely. Rather, it should be redirected away from the central government through the U.S. military to Iraq's municipalities, especially those that are run by democratically elected city and town councils. Democracy is best built from the bottom up.

Shortly after Saddam Hussein's ouster, I spent a few days with the 173rd Airborne Brigade around Kirkuk, an ethnic and sectarian flashpoint. The U.S. troops offered aid, but the councils determined how it would be spent. For example, Kurds might be a plurality, but they could not dictate. In order to win consensus, they had to compromise with Turkomen and Arabs. Technocrats and those willing to compromise rose as Iraqis pushed the populists aside.

Can this local emphasis work given the ongoing sectarian violence? Yes. Many Iraqis support ethnic militias because they provide services and security the central government is unable to supply. The greatest impediments to reconstruction now are corruption and security. But every day, U.S. servicemen go on patrol across Iraq. They visit every city, town and village. They know what is possible and can keep tabs on the money they are handing out. While billions spent by Green Zone diplomats have evaporated into the ether, U.S. troops can provide accountability.

Injecting money directly to local projects works. Indeed, it is how Muqtada Sadr and the militias have won hearts, if not minds, and at a far lower cost. Rather than ignore our enemies, we should copy their model of success. The stakes for Iraq and U.S. national security are simply too high to throw in the towel.

Unleash The Shiites? (LAT)

By Laura Rozen

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

AS SECTARIAN violence rises in Iraq and the White House comes under increasing pressure to revamp its strategy there, a debate is emerging inside the Bush administration: Should the U.S. abandon its efforts to act as a neutral referee in the ongoing civil war and, instead, throw its lot in with the Shiites?

A U.S. tilt toward the Shiites is a risky strategy, one that could further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and that could backfire by driving its Sunni population into common cause with foreign jihadists and Al Qaeda cells. But elements of the administration, including some members of the intelligence community, believe that such a tilt could lead to stability more quickly than the current policy of trying to police the ongoing sectarian conflict evenhandedly, with little success and at great cost.

This past Veterans Day weekend, according to my sources, almost the entire Bush national security team gathered for an unpublicized two-day meeting. The topic: Iraq. The purpose of the meeting was to come up with a consensus position on a new path forward. Among those attending were President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security advisor Stephen Hadley, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

Numerous policy options were put forward at the meeting, which revolved around a strategy paper prepared by Hadley and drawn from his recent trip to Baghdad. One was the Shiite option. Participants were asked to consider whether the U.S. could really afford to keep fighting both the Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias — or whether it should instead focus its efforts on combating the Sunni insurgency exclusively, and even help empower the Shiites against the Sunnis.

To do so would be a reversal of Washington's strategy over the last two years of trying to coax the Sunnis into the political process, an effort led by U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad. It also would discount some U.S. military commanders' concerns that the Al Mahdi army, a Shiite militia loyal to the radical cleric Muqtada Sadr, poses as great a threat to American interests as that presented by the Sunni insurgency centered in western Iraq's Al Anbar province.

So what's the logic behind the idea of "unleashing the Shiites"? It's the path of least resistance, according to its supporters, and it could help accelerate one side actually winning Iraq's sectarian conflict, thereby shortening the conflict, while reducing some of the critical security concerns driving Shiites to mobilize their own militias in the first place.

"As an alternative Plan B, it has the virtue of possibly being more militarily effective," said Thomas Donnelly, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

DOJ_NMG_0095004

"When you are trying to police [a civil war], all you can do is contain it," said Monica Toft, a professor specializing in ethnic conflict at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "Whereas if you're backing one side, there are not as many variables to control."

But such a strategy brings with it significant dangers. Washington might pick the wrong leaders on the side it chooses to back. Should it, for instance, continue to back Iraq's Shiite prime minister, Nouri Maliki, or tilt in favor of his Shiite rival, Abdelaziz Hakim, and his party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq? Either choice could lead to more intra-Shiite infighting and violence.

Or the strategy could drive Iraq's Sunni tribes to align themselves more closely with Al Qaeda. And it seems certain to further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and erstwhile U.S. allies such as Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Jordan — while strengthening Iran's hand in Iraq.

Among the risks of an unleash-the-Shiites strategy is that if it were adopted, the White House would be unlikely to publicly acknowledge that such a choice had been made. Like so much else that has contributed to the U.S. difficulties in Iraq, it would be a decision taken in the dark, outside the realm of public debate.

Police In Anbar Province Lack Protection, Pay (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, November 16, 2006

HADITHA, Iraq — Shaaban al-Obeidi, a police chief in a small town in western Iraq, is regularly the target of assassination attempts.

On one recent attack, he was shot in the chest and left for dead.

But al-Obeidi refuses to give up his job as police chief of Baghdadi, a Euphrates River valley town about 100 miles northwest of Baghdad.

“We will sacrifice our lives for our country,” al-Obeidi says.

Anbar province, a Sunni stronghold west of the capital, is lightly held by about 33,000 U.S. troops spread across 53,000 square miles.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of forces in western Iraq, has said he doesn't command enough forces to defeat the insurgency. Instead, American forces are training Iraqi soldiers and police officers to do it.

Recruiting police officers and protecting them is difficult. Locals are reluctant to join the police because insurgents are waging an effective intimidation campaign and there aren't enough American forces to protect every recruit.

“Nobody from this area wants to join the police until they feel safe,” says Marine Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commander of U.S. troops in the region. “We've seen a lot of positive signs. The police will give us information about insurgents. We just need to keep them alive.”

During a recent tour of towns in Anbar, the challenges were evident: police officers complained of being outgunned by insurgents and often going unpaid.

Gen. John Abizaid, the U.S. commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, acknowledged during congressional testimony Wednesday that paying police officers in the province has been a problem. Anbar is a mostly Sunni province. The central government is dominated by Shiites. Abizaid also acknowledged Anbar was not under control. “I believe that you can't have a main effort everywhere and that the preponderance of the military activity needs to go into the Baghdad area,” Abizaid said.

Insurgents wage an aggressive fight in Anbar. About 40% of the U.S. deaths this year in Iraq occurred in this region, which stretches from Baghdad to the border of Syria. The Pentagon announced Wednesday that insurgents had killed three Marines and one soldier in Anbar on Tuesday.

Insurgents work hard to scare locals from joining the police or helping the local government. In Rawah, a small town on a bend of the Euphrates River, insurgents killed a police officer in June and rolled his head through a marketplace, said Eloy Saenz, 55, a U.S. civilian adviser to the Rawah police. At the time, there were 28 police officers in the town. Now there are seven.

The force could use about 150 cops, says Saenz, a retired police sergeant from Houston who is stationed with Marines in Rawah. “People are afraid to be police here,” he says. “They fear they'll be killed.”

DOJ_NMG_0095005

U.S. forces have put more troops in strategically important towns. In Qaim, about a mile from the Syrian border, a police force has been established and a municipal government is in place. U.S. forces have loosened the grip of insurgents and reduced violence in the town.

Marine Lt. Col. Scott Shuster says driving down Market Street, the town's main thoroughfare, used to be “a firefight the whole way.”

Now, local vendors line the sidewalks. On one side, red-and-green wheelbarrows and generators are set out in front of a hardware store. On the other side, women sell radishes and bags of onions.

Still, outsiders are viewed warily. Pedestrians glare at a convoy of American Humvees. No one smiles or waves at the passing vehicles.

In his crowded office, Qaim Mayor Fahran Fahran complains that he receives no support from the national government. He needs fuel, equipment and salaries for his police force. The economy also needs a boost, he says.

On a recent visit, Neller says he'll provide equipment and is working on the pay issues with the government in Baghdad. He says Qaim needs about 2,000 police officers and has about 1,400. He promises to help recruit more.

Marines elsewhere in the province also point to progress. Patrolling a six-lane highway near Fallujah whose lanes are blackened from roadside bomb blasts, Cpl. Scott Peterson says he sees Iraqi soldiers assuming more responsibility and becoming more capable.

“From our perspective, it is getting better,” Peterson, 22, of Mobile, Ala., says over the clatter of an armored amphibious assault vehicle as it rumbles down the highway. “They're taking over.”

Soldier Pleads In Iraq Rape, Murder Case (AP)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, November 15, 2006

One of four U.S. soldiers accused of raping a 14-year-old Iraqi girl last spring and killing her and her family pleaded guilty Wednesday, and agreed to testify against the others.

Spc. James P. Barker agreed to the plea deal to avoid the death penalty, said his civilian attorney, David Sheldon.

The military judge presiding over the case, Lt. Col. Richard Anderson, asked Barker why he participated in the attack in Mahmoudiya, a village about 20 miles south of Baghdad. It was among the worst in a series of alleged attacks on civilians and other abuses by military personnel in Iraq.

"I hated Iraqis, your honor," Barker answered. "They can smile at you, then shoot you in your face without even thinking about it."

Anderson accepted the plea agreement, which calls for Barker to serve at least life in prison. The judge will decide in a hearing Thursday whether Barker should be allowed to seek parole.

Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, and Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman, 22, members of the 101st Airborne Division with Barker, also are charged in the case. Cortez deferred entering a plea during his arraignment Wednesday morning. Spielman will be arraigned in December. The fourth soldier, Pfc. Bryan L. Howard, 19, also deferred entering a plea at his arraignment in October.

A fifth person, former Army private Steve Green, 21, pleaded not guilty last week to civilian charges including murder and sexual assault.

Green was discharged from the Army for a "personality disorder" before the allegations became known, and prosecutors have yet to say if they will pursue the death penalty against him.

The group is accused of raping the girl and burning her body to conceal their crimes, then killing the girl's father, mother and 6-year-old sister.

After entering his plea Wednesday, Barker gave the court a vivid account of the events.

Barker said he and the others were drinking and playing cards while they manned a traffic checkpoint. Green brought up the idea of raping the girl and killing her family, he said.

"He brought it up to me and asked me what I thought about it. At a couple of points, I told him he was crazy," Barker said.

Barker said he and Green then approached the others with the idea, but there never was a verbal agreement to do it.

DOJ_NMG_0095006

"Things just got set in motion, we just started changing (clothes), myself, Cortez and Green," Barker said. "By the time we started changing clothes, it was more or less a nonverbal agreement that we were going to go along with what we were discussing."

Barker said he, Green and Cortez raped the girl, and Green killed the girl, her parents and her sister.

Barker did not name Spielman and Howard as participants in the rape and slayings, though he said they were at the house when the assault occurred and had come knowing what the others intended to do.

Under military law, soldiers who are present when a crime is committed can be charged with that crime even if they did not play an active role.

Cortez, who could face the death penalty if convicted, and Howard watched from the audience as Barker described the assault. They were accompanied by their defense attorneys and declined to comment.

Taliban, Al-Qaeda Resurge In Afghanistan, CIA Says (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Al-Qaeda's influence and numbers are rapidly growing in Afghanistan, with fighters operating from new havens and mimicking techniques learned on the Iraqi battlefield for use against U.S. and allied troops, the directors of the CIA and defense intelligence told Congress yesterday.

Five years after the United States drove al-Qaeda and the Taliban from Afghanistan, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the CIA, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that both groups are back, waging a "bloody insurgency" in the south and east of the country. U.S. support for the Kabul government of Hamid Karzai will be needed for "at least a decade" to ensure that the country does not fall again, he said.

At yesterday's Senate hearings, devoted mostly to Iraq, Hayden and Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, painted a stark portrait of a struggling Afghanistan and a successful al-Qaeda capable of operating on two battlefields.

"The direct tissue between Iraq and Afghanistan is al-Qaeda," said Hayden, who visited both countries recently. "The lessons learned in Iraq are being applied to Afghanistan."

Senators noted the increased use of roadside bombs and the relatively new phenomenon of suicide attacks, which had not been seen in Afghanistan before the Iraq war.

Hayden told the Senate panel that the Taliban, aided by al-Qaeda, "has built momentum this year" in Afghanistan and that "the level of violence associated with the insurgency has increased significantly." He also noted that Karzai's government "is nowhere to be seen" in many rural areas where a lack of security is affecting millions of Afghans for whom the quality of life has not advanced since the U.S. military arrived in October 2001.

Maples said the insurgency "had strengthened its capabilities and influence" with its base among Pashtun communities in the south, as violence this year has almost doubled since 2005. U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan began dropping earlier this year as NATO arrived to take over the bulk of the fighting. Meanwhile, U.S. Special Forces continue to search for al-Qaeda bases in Afghan-Pakistani border areas.

The CIA director said that region has become a new "physical safe haven" that al-Qaeda uses as a "jump-off point for its guerrilla forays into Afghanistan."

Bush administration officials have repeatedly said that the battle against al-Qaeda has led to the death or capture of more than half of Osama bin Laden's top people.

Hayden said yesterday that "the group's cadre of seasoned, committed leaders" remains fairly cohesive and focused on strategic objectives, "despite having lost a number of veterans over the years." Bin Laden himself, and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, continue to play a crucial role while hiding out somewhere along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

Hayden said the organization had lost a series of leaders since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But the losses have been "mitigated by what is, frankly, a pretty deep bench of low-ranking personnel capable of stepping up to assume leadership positions." Hayden said the lower ranks are dominated by men in their early 40s with two decades of experience fighting.

DOJ_NMG_0095007

The two intelligence chiefs said that al-Qaeda, through propaganda and attacks, has been increasingly successful in defining Afghanistan and Iraq as critical battlegrounds against the West.

"We have radical groups like al-Qaeda and its affiliates sponsoring terrorists, insurgents in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere that seem to be able to preempt governments and eclipse the moderate actors in the region. There remains in Iraq today a broad and vicious al-Qaeda offensive targeting us and innocent Iraqis," the CIA director said.

In Iraq, Maples said, al-Qaeda accounts for a fraction of the daily attacks. "Yet the high-profile nature of these operations have a disproportionate impact on the population and on perceptions of stability," he said. The death earlier this year of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, did not stop what Hayden described as an "al-Qaeda campaign of almost satanic terror" in that country.

In Iraq, Maples said, al-Qaeda has managed to "capitalize on the current cycle of sectarian violence, by creating the perception that its attacks are designed to aid and defend the country's Sunni minority."

Both men said a U.S. military failure in Iraq would effectively turn the country into al-Qaeda's next haven, providing the group with the kind of security it had in Afghanistan for years before 2001.

Christmas Tree Growers Want To Give U.S. Troops Abroad A Little Bit Of Home (USAT/AP)

By William Kates

USA Today, November 16, 2006

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — With U.S. troops facing another holiday season in foreign war zones, Christmas tree growers across the nation are donating thousands of trees to them and their families stateside.

“It's a special time of year. This is a small way to help lessen the pain of separation and say thank you for the sacrifices we are asking them to make,” said Richard Moore, a tree farmer who coordinates the collection for the Christmas Tree Farmers Association of New York. “Any American would want to help out.”

The “Trees for Troops” effort is part of a campaign by the National Christmas Tree Association's Christmas Spirit Foundation to collect more than 11,000 trees in 27 states, said Lee Ann Friga, a spokeswoman for the Missouri-based foundation.

Last year, the foundation delivered more than 4,300 Christmas trees to soldiers' families at five Army posts, Friga said. It sent 175 trees overseas.

This year, the trees will be distributed among 20 military installations representing all four branches of the service, Friga said.

Four hundred trees will be sent to units stationed in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait and Qatar, she said.

“The interest just exploded. This year, we had to include more growers and more pickup locations,” Friga said.

In New York, growers can donate trees at any one of 10 drop-off locations across the upstate region, said Moore, a vice president of the national organization.

From those locations, the trees will be transported to tree farms in Ballston Spa and Scottsville, where FedEx has volunteered to pick them up and deliver them to the U.S. Army's Fort Drum near Watertown, and to other military installations, he said.

Last year, New York tree growers donated 145 trees.

“This year, we are trying to get more growers to contribute. We would rather have 150 growers give two or three trees each, rather than have one farm give 75 or 80 trees,” said Moore, who is giving five trees. “The more, the merrier. We want to share the joy of giving.”

The New York association has 450 members.

Moore said there are probably more than 1,000 other small tree farms in the state. Non-farmers can contribute trees by signing up on the national organization's website, Friga said.

The drop-off locations will collect trees through Nov. 28. All types of Christmas trees will be accepted, but Moore said they should not exceed 7 feet in height for shipping purposes. Pine trees and fir trees are recommended because they have the best needle retention, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095008

"Last year, my church sent a small Christmas tree to a soldier in Iraq who was from our congregation," he said. "He decorated it, put it on the back of his M1 (tank) and sent us back a photo. He came home this summer and told us how touched he had been by what we had done.

"Imagine touching thousands of people like that."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Causey Sentenced To 5 1/2 Years (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Richard Causey, the last of the top Enron Corp. executives to learn his punishment, was sentenced Wednesday to five-and-a-half years in prison for his role in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

Causey, the company's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty in December to securities fraud two weeks before he was to be tried along with Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy, fraud and other charges related to the company's collapse.

Causey, 46, had agreed to serve seven years in prison. Prosecutors indicated they could have recommended it be reduced to five if they were pleased with his cooperation.

The maximum penalty for securities fraud is 10 years in prison and a fine of $1 million or twice the amount illegally gained.

Causey also agreed to fork over $1.25 million to the government and forfeited a claim to about $250,000 in deferred compensation as part of his plea deal. Unlike others at Enron, Causey didn't skim millions of dollars for himself from shady deals.

Prosecutors dropped their plan to seize Causey's home, a $950,000 two-story, red brick house in a Houston suburb.

Causey, the government's 16th cooperating witness who entered a guilty plea, had faced more than 30 counts of conspiracy, fraud, insider trading, lying to auditors and money laundering.

In his guilty plea, Causey admitted that he and other senior Enron managers made various false public findings and statements.

He did not testify in the Lay-Skilling trial earlier this year, though he was on the defense witness list.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud. Lay's convictions were wiped out with his July death from heart disease. Skilling was sentenced last month to more than 24 years in prison.

Andrew Fastow, Enron's ex-chief financial officer whose schemes helped doom the company, was sentenced in September to six years and is serving his term in a federal prison in Louisiana.

On Friday, Mark Koenig, Enron's former investor relations director, and Michael Kopper, an Enron managing director and Fastow's once-trusted top aide, were set to be sentenced.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Case Closed: Last Top Enron Exec Sentenced (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 16, 2006

A federal judge in Houston sentenced Richard Causey, former chief accounting officer of Enron, to 5½ years in prison Wednesday, bringing an end to the government's prosecution of top managers at what was once the nation's seventh-largest company.

Causey's sentence includes $1.25 million in forfeiture and a fine of $25,000. He could have received up to seven years under the plea deal he entered last year.

DOJ_NMG_0095009

Earlier this year, a jury in Houston convicted Enron's two former CEOs, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, of lying to the public about the company's financial health. For his role in the fraud, Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison. Lay's conviction was vacated because he died in July before he had the chance to appeal the verdict.

Causey was originally scheduled to go to trial as a co-defendant with the two men.

Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, the other member of the company's inner sanctum of management, pleaded guilty in early 2004, agreeing to serve a 10-year sentence for crimes he committed at the company. But because of his cooperation, which culminated in one week of trial testimony on behalf of the government against Lay and Skilling, a federal judge in September reduced his sentence to six years.

Christopher Bebel, a Houston attorney who has followed the Enron proceedings, says it wouldn't have made any sense for U.S. District Judge Sim Lake to give Causey a stiffer sentence than Fastow.

"Judges strive for consistency," Bebel says. "Causey was less culpable than Fastow."

Enron collapsed into bankruptcy five years ago after acknowledging that Fastow, the CFO, had entered into numerous business deals with the company that helped prop up Enron's earnings. Fastow later admitted that he embezzled close to $30 million from the company. Enron's market capitalization, which at one point exceeded $60 billion, was wiped out in the ensuing sell-off of stock.

In January 2002, the Department of Justice formed the Enron Task Force. Since then, prosecutors induced 16 former executives to plead guilty to related crimes, while several others were convicted at trial. Two former Enron executives have been acquitted of all charges, and three Merrill Lynch bankers, convicted in 2004, had their convictions overturned on appeal.

Two other former Enron executives who pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government, Michael Kopper and Mark Koenig, are scheduled to be sentenced in Houston on Friday. But with Causey's sentencing, the last of the big Enron cases has been disposed of.

"This closes out an era," says Philip Hilder, a Houston attorney who represented internal Enron whistleblower Sherron Watkins. "Everything else will be a footnote."

Former Enron Accountant Gets 51/2 Years For Fraud (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The former chief accountant for Enron Corp. received a 5 1/2 -year prison sentence yesterday, becoming the last member of the energy trader's upper echelon to face judgment for a fraud that cost thousands of employees their jobs and left investors billions of dollars poorer.

Richard A. Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to a single count of securities fraud in December, weeks before he was to face trial on conspiracy and fraud charges in a case that government lawyers have called the most complex white-collar prosecution in history. Causey, who must also serve two years of probation, remained free yesterday while prison officials determined whether to send him to the facility he requested, in Bastrop, Tex.

Causey's sentence follows prison terms recently handed to two other key Enron figures. Former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling was sentenced last month to 24 years and four months, while onetime finance chief Andrew S. Fastow was sentenced in September to six years. Company founder Kenneth L. Lay died of heart disease in July, less than two months after a jury convicted him and Skilling of misleading shareholders and employees about Enron's mounting financial problems before its December 2001 bankruptcy.

Corporate insiders portrayed Causey, a former accountant at Arthur Andersen LLP known for his genial personality and his love of golf, as a man cowed by Enron's aggressive, rules-bending culture. But prosecutors on the Justice Department's since-disbanded Enron Task Force contended that fraud could not have flourished without Causey's actions and his failure to blow the whistle on others.

His get-along attitude helped Causey steadily climb the corporate ladder, and he became Enron's top accountant in 1998, three years before the company's demise. Causey and his wife, Elizabeth, last year forfeited $1.25 million in a bank account, and he gave up the rights to about $250,000 more in deferred pay from Enron.

Under the terms of his plea agreement, Causey could have faced as many as seven years in prison, one more than Fastow, who was considered an architect of the Enron scheme and who used business partnerships to siphon as much as $60 million for himself and his friends. In September, a judge shaved four years off his possible sentence.

Prosecutor Kathryn H. Ruemmler requested a reduction of three to six months for Causey. Ultimately, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III gave Causey an 18-month credit for, among other things, helping to streamline the government's case.

Reid H. Weingarten, Causey's lawyer who is based in the District, said in an e-mail that it was "hard to be happy when a thoroughly decent man you like a lot gets 66 months, but we are relieved given how much worse it could have been."

On Friday, two more members of Enron's middle-management team are scheduled to be sentenced as the nearly five-year-old scandal draws to a close. Former investor relations official Mark E. Koenig and former finance executive Michael J. Kopper, the first man to admit criminal wrongdoing at Enron four years ago, will be sentenced by separate federal judges in Houston.

SEC Intensifies Probe Into Dell's Accounting (AAS)

By Dan Zehr, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, November 16, 2006

Company postpones quarterly report at last minute

Federal securities regulators have launched a formal investigation into Dell Inc.'s financial record-keeping, upgrading an informal inquiry they started a year ago.

Dell disclosed the development Wednesday evening. At the same time, it said it would postpone its third-quarter financial report, which had been scheduled for today, until the end of the month.

Dell said the move was related to ongoing reviews of its accounting, not the upgrading of the Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

"It really is just a high degree of prudence that's being placed on all our financial reporting right now," said spokesman Jess Blackburn. "There's just a high degree of care being given to reviewing that material and being certain of what we want to report before we report it."

The SEC does not comment on investigations, and there have been few clues about what the probe involves. Dell previously has said the reviews focus on "issues related to accruals, reserves and other balance-sheet items."

A formal investigation indicates the agency has reason to believe there are problems with Dell's books and gives the agency the authority to subpoena testimony and documents.

"It's an important difference," said Jim Asperger, a partner with O'Melveny & Myers LLP, a Los Angeles-based law firm. "What that means is there could be third-party witnesses, former employees or some other persons or entities they want to compel to testify.

"It doesn't necessarily mean they're not satisfied with Dell's compliance in the investigation."

Blackburn said the company will continue to cooperate fully with the SEC, as well as U.S. Justice Department investigators who also are reviewing the company's record-keeping.

The formal investigation and postponed earnings come just as Dell appeared to have shrugged off the most serious effects of a yearlong stretch of setbacks.

It has seen its sales slow and profits fall. And it recently has lost ground to rivals, especially to Hewlett-Packard Co., which recently replaced Dell as the world's biggest computer maker.

Its shares hit a four-year low of $20.75 in July, but have been recovering as of late, closing Wednesday at $25.75. The shares fell almost 3 percent in after-hours trading following the SEC news.

In the past week, several analysts had brightened their outlook for Dell. While the company's computer shipments slowed, they said, it had sold more expensive machines and probably would report a stronger-than-expected profit.

They now will have to wait until later this month to find out how the turnaround at Dell is progressing.

DOJ_NMG_0095011

"It's not ideal to have to issue a delay . . . but they want to make sure they're not coming out and saying things they'll have to change later," said Sam Bhavnani, an technology analyst with Current Analysis in San Diego. "You definitely don't want to read too much into it. As a company, Dell has operated above board historically, so it's a wait and see type of thing."

Investors will also have to continue to wait for Dell's official second-quarter report to the SEC. Under the rules of the Nasdaq market on which Dell shares trade, its stock could be pulled from listing if it doesn't file the report in a timely manner.

Analysts have said the likelihood of Dell being delisted is remote, and Blackburn said the company has "no immediate concern of being delisted." Dell will file the official report when once its board's audit committee finishes its review of the company's books, he said.

Dell first revealed concerns about its financial reporting in August, when it said it had been the subject of an information investigation by the SEC. In response to that inquiry, Dell said it had found some accounting problems stretched back before the investigation started and asked the audit committee to begin an independent probe.

By September, the reviews had raised the interest of the Justice Department. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York asked for documents going back to 2002.

Dell initially downplayed the problems and said they likely would have little significant impact on its earnings. However, after the Justice Department launched its inquiry, Dell's audit committee said it had made no determination on how significant the impact of the investigations might be.

At the time, Bear, Stearns & Co. Inc. Andy Neff said, "Now that you have the U.S. attorney involved, this is becoming a concern."

Since the Justice Department opened its investigation, several prominent national law firms have announced class-action lawsuits on behalf of Dell shareholders. To date, none of those complaints has been granted class-action status.

Dell To Delay Results As SEC Begins A Formal Probe (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Dell Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission had stepped up an informal probe into its accounting to a full-fledged investigation and that its fiscal-third-quarter earnings report will be delayed because of the "complexity" surrounding the inquiry.

The Round Rock, Texas, company disclosed it was being investigated by the SEC in August in what at the time was described as an informal probe. In advancing to what Dell now calls a "formal order of investigation," the SEC is given power to subpoena company officials and documents.

Neither Dell nor the SEC has disclosed the exact nature of the issues being investigated. In September, Dell issued a statement noting that the probe could involve potential issues "relating to accruals, reserves and other balance- sheet items." Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims.

Dell declined to make executives available to comment. An SEC spokesman didn't return a call for comment. The announcement of the earnings-report delay and the SEC investigation came late yesterday, sending Dell's stock down 2.8% to $25.04 in after-hours trading from a 4 p.m. price of $25.75.

The intensifying investigation is the latest in a series of setbacks for Dell. Over the past year, the onetime highflier has suffered slower growth and falling profits amid a struggle to compete against resurgent rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. Dell recently lost its position as the world's largest personal-computer seller, according to market researchers IDC and Gartner. It also announced a battery recall involving millions of laptops in August because the batteries were a potential fire hazard. Dell's stock has fallen 14% so far this year.

The SEC investigation, when initially disclosed, was characterized by Dell as unlikely to materially affect its earnings. At that time, Dell's board also launched its own inquiry into the company's accounting at the request of management. But in September, the company said it would delay the filing of its second-quarter report with the SEC. Dell also disclosed it had been subpoenaed by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York for documents going back as far as 2002. The second-quarter report still hasn't been filed with the SEC.

In a statement yesterday, Dell said it would report earnings by the end of the month and that future earnings would be announced one week later than previously scheduled. The company had been expected to announce its fiscal-third-quarter results today. Analysts had projected that the company would report improved profit for the quarter, thanks to more disciplined pricing.

Charlie Wolf, an analyst with Needham & Co., said yesterday's news reflects confusion among Dell's senior management and casts further doubt on the future of Kevin Rollins, Dell's chief executive, who rose to the top spot in 2004. "It's like no one is running the ship," Mr. Wolf said. "Ever since Kevin became CEO, it's been a downward trajectory in this company."

Earlier this week, Dell's founder, Michael Dell, was quoted in a BusinessWeek.com article saying that he was searching for an executive to run Dell's services business in a bid to restore sales and profit growth to the company. Mr. Dell also reiterated his support for Mr. Rollins in that article.

Write to Christopher Lawton at christopher.lawton@wsj.com1

Dell Accounting Inquiry Made Formal By S.E.C. (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

Dell said yesterday that the Securities and Exchange Commission had started a formal investigation into its accounting practices, but provided no other details of the inquiry that began in August.

As a result, the computer company said it was delaying the release of its third-quarter financial results until the end of the month. It had planned to announce them today after the markets closed. The company said the delay was not because of the new status of the investigation, but rather because of the difficulty of answering government queries, conducting its own inquiry and quickly compiling complex financial information.

A spokesman for the company, Robert Pearson, said the company was “fully cooperating” with the S.E.C. But the company has refused to provide details to its investors about what has attracted the government’s attention. Mr. Pearson said it had nothing to do with options backdating, an accounting problem that has ensnared many high-growth companies in recent months. “We have to let it play out,” he said.

The announcement surprised analysts, as had previous announcements about the accounting investigations. Dell had announced preliminary results for its second quarter in August, but has not yet filed the required 10-Q quarterly report of those earnings with the S.E.C. The company also canceled an analysts’ meeting in September at the last moment, citing the S.E.C.’s investigation.

The company said that it would announce its third-quarter results in a news release at the end of the month and its top executives would not hold the customary conference call with analysts and journalists.

Despite the uncertainty of the investigation, many analysts had started to change their opinion of the company’s stock this month. Laura Conigliaro of Goldman Sachs lifted her recommendation in early November to neutral, from sell. Ben Reitzes, a UBS analyst, recently raised his rating on Dell to neutral from reduce on the ground that the company appears to have made steps to improve its margins.

The shares closed yesterday at $25.75, up 35.9 percent from its 52-week low of $18.95. Shares fell 2.7 percent in after-hours trading after the announcement.

A. M. Sacconaghi Jr., an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company who rates the company as outperforming the stock market, said in a research report published Monday that net income dropped 27.8 percent in the third quarter compared with last year. He also predicted that the company would show slower revenue growth of 1 percent compared with 5 percent in the second quarter.

On the plus side, the company may be seeing an improvement in profit margins because of less aggressive pricing of its PCs, he said. Gross margins, which had dropped in the second quarter to 15.7 percent, from 18.6 a year earlier, might have rebounded to 16.3 percent in the latest quarter, Mr. Sacconaghi said.

DOJ_NMG_0095013

Mr. Sacconaghi also said that “further stock appreciation is likely to require patience as Dell takes action to stabilize its business, which may take several quarters.”

Dell continues to have problem selling computers in the United States, particularly to consumers. As a result, Dell has lost its berth as the world’s largest PC vendor to its rival, Hewlett-Packard, according to market analysts at IDC and Gartner.

Dell continues to lose share in the one segment of the PC market, notebook computers, that is growing significantly, said Tony Berkman, executive director of Majestic Research, which conducts equity research of technology companies. He said North American unit sales of notebooks declined in Dell’s third quarter by 4.9 percent. Much of that decline was the result of weakness in the company’s Inspiron line aimed at consumers.

The average selling price of the Inspiron notebooks was falling faster than the rest of the category, 19.2 percent in the last 12 months to $720, said Mr. Berkman. He did say that the company was seeing strength in its printer line, with unit sales up 28 percent year-over-year and unit sales of high-margin printer cartridges rose 43 percent.

Unlike many of the Wall Street securities analysts, he is not an optimist. “I believe in momentum,” said Mr. Berkman. “I just don’t know what that catalyst is for Dell.”

Former HP Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty In Spying Scandal (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn pleaded not guilty Wednesday to four felony identity theft and fraud charges for allegedly instigating the company's ill-fated spying probe into boardroom leaks.

Dunn appeared briefly for her arraignment in Santa Clara County Superior Court and was released on her own recognizance after her lawyer entered the plea for her.

She and her attorney, Raj Chatterjee, declined to comment as they left court.

Dunn, 53, is one of five people charged in the computer and printer maker's clandestine efforts to unmask board members who discussed company business with reporters. Investigators used a shady ruse known as "pretexting" to obtain the confidential phone logs of directors, reporters and others to trace the source of the leaks.

Testifying before a congressional in September, Dunn said she was repeatedly reassured by HP's lawyers about the legality of its detectives' subterfuge.

She resigned from HP's board after the scandal broke in early September. The two-time cancer survivor recently began chemotherapy for ovarian cancer.

Kevin Hunsaker, HP's former ethics chief who allegedly directed the probe, pleaded not guilty last week and was released.

Three private investigators - Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner - have also entered not guilty pleas and were released.

Lawyers for all the defendants are scheduled to appear in court again Friday to discuss the schedule for future hearings.

The defendants each face four counts: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 (â,¬7,817) and three years in prison.

Audit Clears SEC's Financial Statements (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Auditors gave the financial statements of the Securities and Exchange Commission a clean bill of health, a sign that the market watchdog has taken steps to fix problems that prompted a lawmaker last year to chide the agency for what he called "hypocrisy."

The Government Accountability Office, which reviewed the SEC's books for the fiscal year ended in September, said in documents issued yesterday that the SEC had come close to fully resolving past weaknesses in its financial controls.

The GAO had cited problems with how the SEC tracks penalties it levies, with its information systems controls and with its financial reporting process. Now, auditors say, those issues are far less serious than they were.

DOJ_NMG_0095014

This is the third year the SEC has allowed outside audit of its books and financial controls, which are designed to help prevent fraud and mistakes.

The problems were exposed in March 2005, the same time securities regulators were imposing stiff new rules that forced managers at publicly traded companies to assess their own controls. The rules have proven expensive and controversial and are the focus of an aggressive and well-funded business lobbying campaign. This week, leaders at the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, have been working to resolve differences in their approach to modifying the rules.

Word of the clean audit comes as SEC is facing new challenges. Under the direction of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the GAO is studying the agency's enforcement operations, including how it tracks cases and makes referrals to criminal authorities. The agency filed 9 percent fewer enforcement cases in fiscal 2006 than it did in 2005, according to statistics released earlier this month. The GAO report is to be completed in June.

Ousters Can Raise Chance Of Charges (LAT)

By Tom Petruno, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The firings of KB Home CEO Bruce Karatz and others in the corporate stock-option scandal make them possible targets for prosecutors.

By ousting KB Home chief Bruce Karatz over inflated stock option awards, the Los Angeles company's board instantly made the executive a high-profile potential target for federal prosecutors, legal experts say.

More than 50 corporate officers nationwide have resigned or been fired in the continuing scandal over alleged option manipulation, but most of those have been at relatively small companies.

As the head of a business with $10 billion in annual sales, Karatz automatically would present a higher priority to government investigators than executives who ran much smaller firms, several attorneys said.

"Especially if it's someone senior, I think those go to the top of the list" for prosecutors, said John Olson, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington.

Authorities have not accused Karatz of wrongdoing, and spokesmen for both the U.S. attorney's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission declined to comment Wednesday on Karatz or KB Home. The company in August disclosed that the SEC was conducting an informal investigation of its option practices.

On Sunday, the company's board announced that Karatz had resigned following an internal investigation that determined he was responsible for setting "incorrect" stock option grant dates from 1998 to 2005. The effect was to boost the value of those grants for Karatz and other KB Home executives.

"It's a huge thing for a board to kick out a CEO," said Thomas Curran, an attorney at Ganfer & Shore and a former assistant district attorney in New York.

The directors said that Karatz and Gary A. Ray, who had been the company's human resources chief, chose the option grant dates.

Ray also was fired Sunday, and the company said that Richard B. Hirst, its chief legal officer, had resigned.

Karatz, 61, had served as chief executive of KB Home since 1986.

"Bruce Karatz believed he was acting properly, with the knowledge and approval of legal counsel," his attorney, Daniel Bookin, said Wednesday.

The mispricing of option grants is at the heart of company and government investigations now covering more than 150 firms nationwide.

Options are rights to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period. Securities regulations generally require that the purchase price of an option be the stock's market price on the day the option is granted by the company's board.

The probes are focusing on so-called backdating, whereby some executives looked back weeks or months and reset grant dates to coincide with their stock's lowest price in a particular period. Doing so could give the executives instant paper gains on their options. It could also understate a company's compensation costs and overstate earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0095015

Thus far, the SEC and Justice Department have filed civil and criminal cases against executives of two companies.

At a number of companies, however, board investigations have concluded that options were mispriced because of sloppy bookkeeping rather than intentional misconduct, and that there was no reason to fire executives even if previous earnings had to be restated.

Legal experts say companies naturally would prefer not to dismiss executives because doing so can imply wrongdoing by the company and invite lawsuits from angry shareholders.

"What company puts a gun in their mouth unless they really didn't have a choice?" Curran asked.

Directors' decision to fire executives, many attorneys say, is primarily motivated by a desire to show federal authorities that the firm is serious about fixing what went wrong. The hope is that the company can avoid a government lawsuit if it forcefully addresses alleged abuses.

"The reason that companies typically terminate executives is to take a step to avoid prosecution of the company itself," said Matthew Jacobs, a criminal defense lawyer at McDermott Will & Emery in Palo Alto.

But by conducting a detailed probe that exposes possible wrongdoing by executives, companies may also increase the likelihood of government charges against the dismissed officers, lawyers say.

In recent years, the SEC and the Justice Department have made it clear that they expect companies to aggressively investigate alleged executive wrongdoing — and to share that material with prosecutors. That can give government investigators a head start if they choose to pursue cases against individuals.

"It's a great advantage to a company to have a thorough investigation, and it's also a great benefit to regulators," said James Doty, a partner at Baker Botts in Washington.

Still, the act of mispricing option grants alone doesn't give the government a slam-dunk case of securities fraud, legal experts caution. One major hurdle is showing that an executive had an intent to deceive the company's directors and shareholders, and knew that the mispricing broke the law.

"It's one thing for a company to cut the cord to an executive and restate earnings, but it's not a straight line between that and the ability to indict and convict," Jacobs said.

tom.petruno@latimes.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Disgraced Lobbyist Jack Abramoff Reports To Prison (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - CUMBERLAND, Maryland-Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted of federal charges after using expensive gifts, campaign donations and exotic trips to win access to the powerful in Washington, went to prison Wednesday.

Abramoff was the key figure in a government corruption scandal that contributed to the Republican Party's nationwide defeat in last week's midterm election.

Abramoff arrived at about 6:30 a.m. EST (1130 GMT) at a relatively secluded prison facility in western Maryland to begin serving a nearly six-year prison sentence for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida.

Abramoff was delivered out of sight of waiting reporters and camera crews and his arrival was announced in a two-paragraph statement by a prison representative.

The part of the camp where Abramoff will be kept is a 334-bed minimum security facility located near an industrial park along the north branch of the Potomac River.

The camp is all male. It consists of a number of two-story dormitories that are light red cinderblock structures. Each dormitory contains a number of six-bed cubicles, and Abramoff was being assigned to one of those. The prison is nearly surrounded by Appalachian Mountain ridges rising along either bank of the Potomac on the Maryland and West Virginia sides of the river.

DOJ_NMG_0095016

Stephen Finger, executive assistant at the prison, said all inmates work while there. Incoming inmates such as Abramoff typically are assigned to menial jobs such as food service work. Finer said that inmates can work their way up from low-level jobs paying 12 cents an hour to better positions paying up to 40 cents an hour.

Abramoff also is awaiting sentencing for corrupting government officials and their staff members. He made a name for himself on Capitol Hill by lavishing politicians with football tickets or whisking them away on faraway golf junkets, and thus became the face of government corruption.

If it were up to the Justice Department, however, Abramoff would not be heading to prison - at least not yet. He could hold the key to a sweeping corruption case involving Congress, members of the Bush administration and their aides, and prosecutors said putting their star witness behind bars would impede the investigation.

But a Miami federal judge refused to delay the sentence, meaning Abramoff's cooperation will have to continue from prison, where he will be inmate No. 27593-112. Abramoff's lawyers had no comment.

Abramoff was originally assigned to a federal prison in Pennsylvania about four hours away from Washington. Prosecutors wanted him assigned, instead, to the prison here, which is about two hours away.

Abramoff enjoyed access and influence across Capitol Hill, from his close ties to congressmen to his hundreds of contacts with White House officials. He kept his powerful friends flush with campaign cash, gifts and trips such as a $92,000 chartered jet to Scotland for a golf outing with Representative Bob Ney, Bush administration official David Safavian and congressional aides.

Ney, an Ohio Republican who recently resigned, became the first congressman convicted in the case when he admitted last month that he took official actions on behalf of Abramoff's lobbying clients in exchange for his gifts and campaign donations.

The investigation had already ensnared Ney's former chief of staff as well as two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. The investigation cost DeLay his leadership seat before he ultimately resigned, and it contributed to the Election Day defeat of Republican Senator Conrad Burns of Montana.

Safavian was sentenced in October to 18 months in prison for lying to investigators about his ties to Abramoff. He is asking a federal judge to postpone his sentence until he can appeal his conviction.

Burns, who received about $150,000 in Abramoff-related donations and whose aides traveled on the lobbyist's jet to the 2001 Super Bowl, has denied any wrongdoing. Though two of DeLay's aides have pleaded guilty, the former majority leader maintains his innocence and has not been charged.

Also under scrutiny are Representative John Doolittle, a California Republican, who accepted campaign money from Abramoff and used the lobbyist's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it, and former Deputy Interior Secretary Steven Griles, who senators and a former colleague said gave preferential treatment to Abramoff and his Indian tribe clients.

Abramoff Begins Serving Sentence At Maryland Prison (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 16, 2006

Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to prison Wednesday in Cumberland, Md., to begin serving a sentence of almost six years for defrauding banks of $23 million when buying a Florida casino cruise line in 2000.

Abramoff also faces jail time after pleading guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. Justice Department lawyers have put off Abramoff's sentencing related to those charges, citing his cooperation with the department's ongoing corruption probe. He is expected to be sentenced in that case next year.

Although Abramoff was originally supposed to report to prison in Pennsylvania, the Justice Department intervened in late October, suggesting the Federal Correctional Institute in Cumberland as its preferred choice. Located in western Maryland, the medium-security facility is within driving distance of Washington, allowing federal prosecutors easy access to Abramoff.

Abramoff was sentenced in March by U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in the Southern District of Florida after pleading guilty to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit wire fraud, and mail fraud. He was also sentenced to three years of supervised release.

Abramoff's lawyers, from Chadbourne & Parke, declined to comment Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0095017

Abramoff, formerly a top lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig's D.C. office, is at the center of a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials, including former Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded guilty to criminal fraud charges in September.

Four of the six have pleaded guilty to bribery charges: Abramoff business partner Michael Scanlon, a former staffer to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas; Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Ney; Abramoff's Florida business associate Adam Kidan; and former Alexander Strategy lobbyist Tony Rudy. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison last month.

Abramoff, former Greenberg Traurig lobbyists Jon Van Horne and Neil Volz, and former head of the Christian Coalition Ralph Reed Jr. still face a suit in Texas brought by the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas in July for allegedly defrauding the tribe, which had hired Abramoff to assist in keeping its gaming operation open.

Another Guilty Plea In 2002 Phone-jam Case (MANUL)

By John Distaso, Senior Political Reporter

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, November 15, 2006

Concord – A third conspirator has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges in connection with a Republican operation that jammed Democratic get-out-the-vote telephone lines on election day, 2002.

Shaun Hansen, whose former telemarketing firm placed the hundreds of line-jamming calls after being hired by a Republican operative, admits violating federal statutes outlawing telephone harassment and conspiracy to commit telephone harassment.

He faces maximum penalties of $250,000 and five years in prison for the harassment charge and a fine of $250,000 for the conspiracy charge. But under an agreement filed in U.S. District Court in Concord this week, federal prosecutors agreed not to oppose Hansen's request for sentence reduction "based upon the defendant's apparent prompt recognition and affirmative acceptance of personal responsibility for the offense."

The Justice Department also agreed not to prosecute Hansen on any additional charges.Hansen owned the former Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises, a telemarketing firm that was paid $2,500 by GOP consultant Allen Raymond to place hundreds of hang-up calls to five Democratic Party offices and the Manchester firefighters union headquarters to jam their get-out-the-vote and rides-to-the-polls telephone lines. The operation proceeded for about 90 minutes on the morning of election day, 2002, before being called off by the former GOP state chairman.According to previous court documents and testimony, Raymond was hired by former state Republican executive director Charles McGee for $15,600 to find a firm to make the calls. McGee and Raymond also spoke with former Republican National Committee official James Tobin about the operation, according to court documents and testimony.

McGee and Raymond pleaded guilty to harassment and conspiracy charges and served seven and three months in prison, respectively. Tobin was convicted by a jury a year ago on federal conspiracy charges and is free pending appeal.

Hansen's plea agreement was filed less than three weeks before he was to stand trial on Dec. 5.

A civil suit filed by the state Democratic Party against the state Republican Party, the Republican National Committee and other GOP entities and officials is pending in state Superior Court. Democrats are trying to discover whether national GOP figures had any involvement in the phone-jamming operation, while Republicans say the suit is a political stunt meant to embarrass the party.

State Democratic Chair Kathy Sullivan yesterday called Hansen's plea "a sad reminder of the type of politics rejected by the voters last Tuesday," when Democrats registered major victories on Capitol Hill and in New Hampshire.

Judge Sentences TV Advertiser To 86 Months For Selling Faulty Computers (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - PHILADELPHIA-A TV pitchman who defrauded customers, banks and vendors out of $39 million by selling them faulty computers was sentenced to more than seven years in prison by a judge who called his conduct "unforgivable."

DOJ_NMG_0095018

George Capell, 51, continued to scheme until the end, tapping a secret bank account even after his bankruptcy and guilty plea to indulge a taste for strip clubs, fancy cars and a Florida condominium, authorities said.

"This to me is unforgivable," U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody said Tuesday in handing down an 86-month sentence, near the top of the sentencing guidelines.

Capell's lawyer, Scott DiClaudio, blamed the losses on "a failed business model."

After seeing Capell's TV infomercials, some customers spent upward of $2,000 apiece on computer systems that arrived, if at all, with broken or missing parts. Many of the customers were disabled or unemployed, and needed the computers to find jobs, the judge said.

Others lived in rural areas far from an electronics store, and were forced to buy computers sight unseen, said bankruptcy court trustee Lawrence Lichtenstein.

The bilked customers, from more than a dozen states, have received restitution of 25 cents on the dollar, Lichtenstein said. He hopes to eke out another 10 cents on the dollar for them through the sale of Capell's condominium and half the proceeds of Capell's $1 million home.

Capell's wife Lynn is entitled to the other half of the house proceeds. She was in court Tuesday with the couple's three children, ages 20 through 23.

"I'm truly sorry for those people that were hurt in this case. I thought I could make it work, but I was wrong," Capell told the judge.

Capell pleaded guilty to 41 fraud and money laundering counts in April. His company, which did business as the Video Computer Store, ran a call center and warehouse from 1999 to 2001.

Capell was ordered to pay nearly $32 million in restitution, but Lichtenstein doubts victims will see anything close to that amount, even after Capell leaves prison. The trustee has recovered just over $1 million so far.

Capell's chief financial officer, Patrick Buttery, pleaded guilty to similar crimes and is scheduled to be sentenced on Jan. 30.

Authorities Form Multinational Unit To Hunt Pedophiles (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. agents are joining authorities in Canada, Britain and Australia to form a global police unit that will help monitor the Internet for child molesters who seek victims online.

Law enforcement representatives from each country met here Wednesday to discuss the program, one of the latest in a series of initiatives aimed at countering the rising number of ways in which pedophiles and pornographers use the Internet to harm children.

Under the program, known as the Virtual Global Taskforce (VGT), agents from each nation will take turns monitoring a London-based website (www.virtualglobaltaskforce.com) that responds to reports from youths and others about suspected predators, says VGT Chairman Jim Gamble, chief executive officer of the United Kingdom's Child Exploitation and Online Protection Center.

Investigators can immediately trace a suspect's location through his Internet connection and contact a local police agency to further investigate the case or make an arrest, Gamble says. As authorities have done in anti-child-pornography programs, VGT investigators also will go undercover in chat rooms and on websites where pedophiles are likely to be, he says.

The VGT is one of dozens of ways police and child protection groups try to catch predators and stem the trade in pornographic photos of children. The groups work with Internet service providers and credit card companies to identify websites used to trade such photos. Congress has boosted funding for investigations and prosecutions aimed at child porn.

VGT has operated in Britain and Australia since January 2005. U.S. authorities have been involved in planning the site since the concept arose in 2002 but have not been full participants. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) will staff the U.S. part of the operation beginning in January from the agency's cybercrime center in Virginia, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers says.

Youths and others can report suspicious conversations or contacts to the VGT's website. Several popular chat sites feature the VGT's icon, so people can link immediately to the site to file a report, Gamble says. The website fielded 2,000 reports in the first six months of 2006, he says, more than 75% of which came from children.

The first online offender caught through the global policing program was sentenced June 22 to nine years in prison in England. Lee Costi, 21, of Haslemere, Surrey, pleaded guilty to sexual activity with a child, making indecent images of children, possessing more than 40 such images and several other charges.

According to the Nottinghamshire police in England, Costi was arrested after a teenage girl whom Costi had approached in a chat room had reported the information to the VGT website. Clive Michel, spokesman for the U.K.'s Online Protection Center, says investigators tracked down Costi and the case led authorities to identify at least one other pedophile in Eastern Europe.

In another case, U.S. authorities received information about a man in England who said in a chat room that he planned to molest children, ICE spokeswoman Jamie Zuieback says. U.S. authorities shared the information with VGT investigators. U.S. and British investigators quickly traced the man's location, and British police arrested him at his house, where they found child pornography, she says.

"VGT is the multinational, online police station," Gamble says.

"We really need to ignore the territorial boundaries because the Internet doesn't have territorial boundaries."

Judge Rejects Challenge To Evidence In Cuban Agent Case (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

MIAMI - A federal judge refused Wednesday to throw out a lengthy statement given to the FBI by a college professor charged along with his wife with acting as illegal agents of Cuba's communist government.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber, whose recommendation must be approved by another judge, ruled that Florida International University psychology professor Carlos Alvarez gave the statements voluntarily, was free to leave the FBI interviews any time and was never promised immunity from prosecution.

The statements Alvarez gave to the FBI in summer 2005 are the cornerstone of the federal case against he and his wife, Elsa, also an FIU employee. They were arrested in January on charges of failing to register with the U.S. as agents of Cuban President Fidel Castro's government and have pleaded not guilty.

Transcripts of the statements show that Alvarez admitted to decades of involvement with Cuba. Prosecutors say they spied for Cuban President Fidel Castro's government, mainly on activities of Cuban exiles and prominent people in Miami and on U.S. political developments and public opinion.

Alvarez testified during hearings in August that he viewed himself as a "collaborator" with the Havana government but not as foreign intelligence agent. Prosecutors also have evidence from telephone wiretaps and at least one listening device placed in the Alvarez's Miami home.

Alvarez's lawyer will have a chance to contest the ruling before U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore, who is overseeing the case, issues a final decision.

Officials Cannot Confirm Whitey Bulger 'Sighting' (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 16, 2006

The tip sounded like a scene out of a movie: Fugitive gangster James "Whitey" Bulger was believed to have been spotted at a San Diego theater last month, checking out Jack Nicholson's portrayal of him in the new gangster film, "The Departed."

A deputy sheriff's belief that he trailed the Bulger look-alike from the theater on Oct. 6 before losing him on a trolley sent the FBI and San Diego police scrambling to review surveillance tapes from the theater and surrounding area, according to law enforcement officials.

But yesterday, the US attorney's office in Boston, which is overseeing the hunt for Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, said the sighting remains uncorroborated.

"Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego," Robert Krekorian, executive assistant US attorney, said in a prepared statement.

DOJ_NMG_0095020

"At this time, no one has concluded that the individual in question is, in fact, James Bulger."

Krekorian added that, as with every lead in the manhunt, all "logical and appropriate investigative steps" are being taken to follow up on the sighting.

Bulger, a longtime FBI informant, fled before his 1995 racketeering indictment and has since been charged with 19 murders.

The last confirmed sighting of the South Boston crime boss was in London in September 2002, according to the FBI.

There was another reported sighting in California, which the FBI said it never resolved.

In January 2000, Bulger and his girlfriend, Catherine Greig , were allegedly seen at a hair salon in Fountain Valley, Calif., less than 100 miles from San Diego.

Feds To Be On Alert At Whitey Galpal's Mom's Burial Today (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 16, 2006

The South Boston mother of James "Whitey" Bulger's girlfriend, Catherine Greig, will be laid to rest today, presumably never to know if her fugitive daughter is dead or alive.

Jenit L. Greig, 78, died Monday. A memorial service will be held this morning at the O'Brien Funeral Home in South Boston. Sources said federal authorities, who have been hunting for Bulger and Greig nearly 12 years, will be watching.

Meanwhile, Whitey watchers are debating the authenticity of an alleged San Diego sighting of America's most-wanted fugitive mob boss last month.

"Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego," executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Krekorian in Boston said yesterday in a prepared statement.

"At this time, no one has concluded that the individual is in fact James Bulger."

An off-duty cop claimed he saw Bulger leave a showing of "The Departed" at the UA Horton Plaza 14 movie theaters in downtown San Diego, then board a trolley. Bulger was reportedly alone.

Theater manager Robert Livingston said the cineplex is less than 15 miles from the Mexico border. He said FBI agents in San Diego subpoenaed the theaters' security tapes.

"The Departed" stars Jack Nicholson as a psychotic South Boston Irish crime boss, believed to be based on Bulger, 77, a suspect in at least 19 murders.

Friends said Jenit Greig, whose now 55-year-old daughter Bulger took on the lam, was "a very nice, very quiet" woman.

Her sister, Iva Harrington, 81, declined to comment. Catherine Greig's twin sister, Margaret McCusker, did not return a call.

Peter Gelzinis, Howie Carr and Michele McPhee contributed to this report.

Official Admits Accepting Bribe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), November 16, 2006

A former West Long Branch councilman yesterday admitted taking a $1,500 bribe in an FBI sting, the latest conviction in a long-running investigation of municipal corruption in Monmouth County.

Joseph DeLisa, 50, pleaded guilty to a single count of extortion during a hearing before U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark.

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc Larkins, DeLisa acknowledged taking the bribe in November 2003 from a cooperating FBI witness posing as a demolition contractor. He said he had been introduced to the contractor by then mayor Paul Zambrano.

In return for the money, DeLisa promised his support on no-bid township contracts.

Both men were among nearly 20 elected officials and businessmen in Monmouth County charged or convicted of public corruption since early 2005. DeLisa, a councilman since 1998, immediately resigned. Zambrano was the first to enter a plea more than a year ago; he admitted taking $15,000, but has not yet been sentenced.

DeLisa's plea was similar, but it left unresolved one of the most notable allegations in his case: that he also accepted payoffs from developers Jack Westlake and Jack Morris when Morris wanted to build a drugstore in the town.

Those accusations emerged in a new indictment last spring, when federal agents were intensifying their investigation into former state Senate President John Lynch, a close friend and business partner to both Westlake and Morris.

Lynch and Westlake have since pleaded guilty to unrelated tax and fraud counts. Morris has never been charged.

Larkins and Assistant U.S. Attorney Rachel Honig declined to comment yesterday on the alleged drugstore plan bribe.

DeLisa left the courtroom without commenting. His attorney, John McDonald, noted that the ex-councilman's plea didn't include any reference to the project or developers. He declined to say more, except that DeLisa isn't cooperating and hoped to put the case behind him.

West Long Branch Councilman Admits Taking Bribe (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Former West Long Branch Councilman Joseph DeLisa admitted Wednesday that he took a $1,500 cash bribe in an Atlantic City hotel room from someone he believed to be a corrupt contractor seeking business with the borough.

DeLisa, 50, pleaded guilty to extortion, and could receive as much as 20 years in prison when sentenced in March.

A councilman from January 1998 through February 2005, DeLisa admitted that on Nov. 19, 2003, he met the man he believed to be a demolition contractor and accepted the cash from him.

DeLisa told U.S. District Judge William J. Martini that former West Long Branch Mayor Paul Zambrano introduced him to the contractor, who was actually an FBI cooperating witness.

DeLisa said he and Zambrano agreed that DeLisa would assist the contractor in obtaining demolition and other public contracts from the borough. Zambrano pleaded guilty to the same charge in August 2005, and is awaiting sentencing.

John Dougherty's Home Searched In Federal Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 16, 2006

Federal agents executed a search warrant at the home of labor union leader John J. Dougherty last week as part of their tax-fraud investigation into a local electrical contractor, sources said.

The sources, who declined to be identified because the matter remains under investigation, said agents entered the South Philadelphia home of Dougherty, a possible 2007 mayoral candidate, early Friday morning.

Philadelphia FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said she could neither confirm nor deny the raid.

Dougherty's spokesman, Frank Keel, did not return repeated calls for comment.

Friday's search represents the most recent turn in the sprawling investigation of the contractor, Donald "Gus" Dougherty, who is a close friend of but no relation to John Dougherty.

The probe became public Jan. 28, when FBI, IRS and Labor Department agents raided Gus Dougherty's large home on Pierce Street.

As the investigation proceeded, it also shined a light on the well-connected contractor's dealings with several prominent city political figures - notably John Dougherty, who leads the local electricians' union. Until earlier this year, he also was the treasurer of the city's Democratic Party.

Sources said agents have asked whether electricians' union leaders knew about an alleged scheme by Gus Dougherty to avoid paying federal taxes and union health and pension payments by paying union electricians in cash.

They also said investigators have scrutinized financial transactions between the contractor and the union leader, including renovations at John Dougherty's home and the sale of a Jersey Shore condo by Gus Dougherty to John Dougherty.

Last spring, subpoenas also were issued to the city Redevelopment Authority and to the Pennsport Civic Association - both of which are led by John Dougherty. The Pennsport subpoena was reported by the Philadelphia Daily News.

John Dougherty has repeatedly said he did nothing wrong, insisting in a May interview that he "paid through the nose" for the home renovations because he told Gus Dougherty "to do it by the book."

"There has been no new development with regard to any matter involving my client," Gus Dougherty's attorney, Nicholas J. Nastasi Sr., said yesterday.

Over the years, Gus Dougherty's projects have included the 2000 Republican National Convention, Center City hotels, and the implosion of Veterans Stadium. He also did electrical work for a number of leading local Democrats, including U.S. Rep. Bob Brady and State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

Though allies had distributed bumper stickers and T-shirts touting his mayoral candidacy, John Dougherty has maintained a lower profile over the last few months. Aides say he was busy working behind the scenes on state political issues.

FBI Joins Johnson School Inquiry (LEXHL)

By Lee Mueller, EASTERN KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 16, 2006

Ex-official's son paid while in jail

PAINTSVILLE - The FBI has joined a Johnson County grand jury investigation into allegations that a former school district finance director allegedly had her son on the system's payroll while he was in jail.

Peggy L. VanHoose, 56, of Tudor Key allegedly paid her son, Michael D. VanHoose, thousands of dollars between 2000 and 2005, although he spent 92 weeks of that time in the Big Sandy Regional Detention Center, according to jail records and a recent audit conducted for the school district.

Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney David Blankenship said yesterday that an FBI agent had contacted Johnson County prosecutors about the case.

An FBI agent in Pikeville identified by Blankenship could not be reached.

Meanwhile, a Johnson County grand jury is scheduled to meet Thursday to question witnesses, including new schools Superintendent Steve Trimble, a school board member and VanHoose's former payroll officer, Shelby Jean Coleman.

VanHoose, who was being paid $96,000 a year, had worked 33 years for the district. Board officials said they began an internal investigation shortly after Superintendent Orville Hamilton died of cancer in October 2005.

Trimble, who became superintendent of Johnson County schools on Jan. 1, was not in his office yesterday morning and did not return two phone calls.

A recent audit by a Paintsville firm, Wells & Company PSC, did not identify VanHoose's son by name, but reported that an employee -- with no record of being hired -- had been paid from Jan. 1, 2000, to Dec. 31, 2005, although Big Sandy Regional Detention Center records show he was in jail for 92 weeks during that time.

The Paintsville Herald reported recently that school district finance records show Michael VanHoose was paid $64,723.72 between Nov. 28, 2002, and Dec. 31, 2005. For the first 141/2 months of that period, he was incarcerated on drug charges, jail records show.

The district's records showed he received a pay raise while in jail in July 2003, the newspaper said. His two-week paychecks eventually rose from $675.68 to $961.42 by December 2005.

The audit report said no time sheets were submitted, but payroll checks were given to another employee and later cashed.

Peggy VanHoose was paid about $7,000 a month from July 2002 to August 2005, but her pay slowly decreased to $1,751 by March of this year, the paper said.

Coleman, 47, a tenured classified employee who had worked almost 20 years in VanHoose's office, was fired in May. She is challenging her dismissal, but a due-process hearing scheduled for this week was postponed after she was subpoenaed by the grand jury, said Michael Schmitt, a Paintsville attorney who represents the school district.

"We just want to see if the grand jury's going to wrap up its business soon or whether it's going to go on," said Coleman's attorney, Mary Ruble of Lexington. Hearing officer Bayard Collier has not yet rescheduled the hearing, she said.

Coleman has a high school General Educational Development certificate. Investigators say she was being paid $47,000 a year.

Reach Lee Mueller at (606) 789-4800 or at lmueller1@herald-leader.com.

NY Authorities Bring Down Huge Gambling Ring, Arrest Poker Player (AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — More than two dozen people, including a former professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged Wednesday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books.

The massive illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a site called Playwithal.com, run by the poker player, James Giordano, 52, of Pine Crest, Fla., Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown said.

A break in the case came last year when New York Police Department investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early Wednesday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortess-like Florida compound.

Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, on Long Island, a one-time scout for the Washington Nationals and for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," Kelly said at a news conference. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Though the gambling ring relied on a Web site, it was different from the online betting operations targeted by recent federal legislation, said Deputy Inspector Brian O'Neill, who supervised the investigation.

The scheme involved placing sports bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the restricted Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, car racing and golf.

The defendants allegedly laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, Brown said. The prosecutor called the $500 million asset forfeiture case "among the largest such cases ever filed."

A total of 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with enterprise corruption, money laundering, promoting gambling and other counts. Giordano had waived extradition in Florida and was expected to be arraigned next week; prosecutors did not have the name of his lawyer.

Falzarano, who was ordered held on $500,000 bail after pleading not guilty, "looks forward to defending himself in court," defense attorney Peter Tomao said.

In a statement, the Nationals described Falzarano as a part-time scout whose contract expired on Oct. 31 and was not renewed. The team declined further comment.

Charges also were brought against three companies that allegedly helped Giordano develop and secure the Web site: Primary Development Inc. of Farmingdale, N.Y., Prolexic Technologies Inc. of Hollywood, Fla., and Digital Networks, S.A., Inc. of Davie, Fla.

Search warrants executed in several locations resulted in the seizure of gambling records, computers and hundreds of millions of dollars in property, some of it stashed in a secret room concealed by a bookshelf in the Manhattan home of one of the suspects.

The property includes four Manhattan condominiums, millions of dollars in cash, tens of thousands of dollars worth of casino chips from the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, jewelry, gold coins, and a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory. Also seized was original artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dali.

Police launched an investigation last year after receiving a tip from a suspect in a separate organized crime probe. Over the next several months, detectives with computer expertise broke the code for the Web site and began electronic surveillance of the suspects.

Giordano "carried everything about the gambling enterprise on a laptop computer never let out of his sight, except when he left it at a hotel in Nassau County where he had returned this past June for a family wedding," Kelly said.

In the three hours that Giordano and his wife were at the wedding, investigators entered the hotel room with a warrant, found the laptop on a desk and made a digital copy of the hard drive without his knowledge, police said.

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em tournament at the Bellagio worth nearly $100,000 earlier this year.

DOJ_NMG_0095024

Online Bookie Ring Has Link To Miami (MH)

The Miami Herald, November 16, 2006

It was the key to a billion-dollar-a-year illegal gambling kingdom: a laptop computer that authorities say was owned by a professional poker player from Miami named James Giordano.

Giordano, who rarely let the computer out of his sight, left it behind earlier this year in New York while attending a wedding, police said Wednesday. But in the three hours he and his wife were away from their Long Island hotel room, investigators armed with a search warrant and computer expertise sneaked in, found the laptop on a desk and made a digital copy of the hard drive.

The covert operation on June 15 helped unlock a sophisticated Internet-based gambling scheme that has taken in $3.3 billion in cash wagers from 40,000 bettors nationwide since 2004, authorities said. They announced charges against Giordano, 26 other defendants and three companies, including one in Hollywood and another in Davie.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," said New York Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly. ``It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

At first, FBI agents and Miami-Dade County police tried to trick Giordano, 52, into letting them onto his property. They phoned him from a call box next to the entrance gate of his walled Pinecrest estate, saying they needed to get in to catch a burglar. He said no.

Armed with arrest and search warrants, they then climbed over Giordano's four-foot wall and knocked on his front door. They arrested him about 6 a.m. Tuesday, and he was placed in police custody.

FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said FBI agents also searched the South Florida homes of some other suspects and the offices of companies involved.

Arrested at his Long Island home in Seaford, N.Y., was Frank Falzarano, identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals baseball club. Falzarano, 52, allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies.

Prosecutors claim the ring ran gambling wire rooms in Miami and on the Caribbean island of St. Martin, where operators took bets and kept records. Bookies assigned clients a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through a restricted website, Playwithal.com. The bets were on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, auto racing and golf.

SHELL CORPORATIONS

The defendants laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, said Queens, N.Y., District Attorney Richard Brown. The prosecutor called the $500 million asset forfeiture case ``among the largest such cases ever filed."

The 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with money laundering and promoting gambling, among other counts.

Giordano waived extradition in Florida and is expected to be arraigned next week. Prosecutors did not have the name of his attorney.

Falzarano, who was ordered held on $500,000 bail after pleading not guilty, "looks forward to defending himself in court," said defense attorney Peter Tomao.

Charges also were brought against three companies that allegedly helped Giordano develop and secure the website: Primary Development of Farmingdale, N.Y., Prolexic Technologies of Hollywood, and Digital Solutions of Davie.

No officials at the companies would comment.

At Prolexic -- in the downtown Hollywood arts district on the fourth floor of the Harrison Executive Centre at 1930 Harrison St. -- at least three law enforcement officers were loading computer equipment from the company onto a dolly. When a reporter walked in, the officers shut and locked the door.

The companies face a fine of $10,000, or twice the amount of their illegal gains, prosecutors said.

The individual defendants face up to 25 years in prison if convicted.

VALUABLE POSSESSIONS

Search warrants resulted in the seizure of gambling records, computers and hundreds of millions of dollars in property, some of it stashed in a secret room concealed by a bookshelf in the Manhattan home of one of the suspects.

The property includes four Manhattan condominiums, millions in cash, tens of thousands of dollars' worth of casino chips from the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, jewelry, gold coins and a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory. Also seized was original artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dalí.

Police launched an investigation last year after receiving a tip from a suspect in a separate organized crime probe.

Over the next several months, detectives broke the code for the website and began electronic surveillance of the suspects.

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em poker tournament worth nearly $100,000 at the Bellagio earlier this year.

Associated Press writers Tom Hays and Ula Ilnytzky, Miami Herald staff writers Jennifer Mooney Piedra, Jay Weaver and Bridget Carey and Bloomberg News Service contributed to this report.

Dozens Charged With Running Gambling Ring (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

More than two dozen people, including a professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged yesterday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books.

The illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a Web site called Playwithal.com, run by poker player James Giordano, 52, of Pinecrest, Fla., according to New York City Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown.

A break in the case came last year when investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortress-like Florida compound.

Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, N.Y., who was identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide.

The Nationals released the following statement: "The Nationals have no information nor any comment on any aspect of the legal proceedings announced today involving Frank Falzarano. Mr. Falzarano was a part-time scout who worked for an area scout, who is no longer with the club. Falzarano's contract with the Nationals expired on October 31 and was not renewed."

Though the gambling ring relied on a Web site, it was different from the online betting operations targeted by recent federal legislation. The scheme involved placing bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the secured Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey and auto racing.

The defendants allegedly laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, Brown said.

A total of 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with enterprise corruption, money laundering, promoting gambling and other counts.

-- From News Services and Staff Reports

27 Arrested In City's 'Largest' Betting Bust (NSDY)

By Rocco Parascandola, Staff Writer; Matthew Nestel And Staff Writer Luis Perez Contributed To This Story.

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

City investigators were deep into a probe of rogue pharmacists when a tip turned into a 28-month-long investigation of a multibillion-dollar illegal sports betting operation that ended with the arrest of 27 suspects, authorities said yesterday.

Thanks to a tip, authorities closed the gambling ring that merged old-school tactics with the Internet and stretched from New York to Nevada and overseas, and took in $2.5 million a day in bets.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," said Police Commissioner Ray Kelly. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting: $3.3 billion over the last 28 months alone."

City authorities said there were 40,000 gamblers; about 2,000 bookies; and shell corporations as far away as Switzerland and Hong Kong.

DOJ_NMG_0095026

The suspects include the alleged mastermind, James Giordano, a high-stakes poker player; accused bookie Frank Falzarano, of Seaford, a scout for the Washington Nationals baseball team; and a suspected enforcer, Steven Tarantino, a Luchese family associate.Kelly said there is no indication Falzarano compromised the integrity of any Major League Baseball games. League officials have been notified of his arrest. "My husband is a good man. That's all I have to say," Falzarano's wife, Joan, 51, said.

The case was made, in part, when authorities downloaded information from the hard drive of Giordano's laptop computer, left at a Long Island hotel while he and his wife attended a June 17 wedding.

"We put a surveillance on him to make sure there were no errors," said police Deputy Insp. Brian O'Neill. "Then we brought his computer back, hooked it up as close as possible to the way he left it and walked out."

Giordano was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents in Pine Crest, Fla. Tarantino, 33, was arrested by police who found him hiding in the bathroom of his East 57th Street apartment.

The suspects in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada have been charged with various counts of enterprise corruption, money laundering, gambling and conspiracy, according to Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, whose office is prosecuting the case because it started in that borough.

Seized were gambling records, about $6 million in cash, real estate and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl champion Jets. The operation differed from most online gambling sites because Giordano's Web site, playwithal.com - essentially a computerized bettor sheet - could only be accessed by those who had already established an in-person relationship with one of the suspected bookies, police said.

The parents of suspect, John Ducato, 47, of Deer Park, came to his arraignment yesterday. "He lives at home," said his mother, Jean Ducato. "He helps his parents every day."

Matthew Nestel and staff writer Luis Perez contributed to this story.

The book on Web bet ring:

28 month investigation

$3.3B wagered in that time

2,000 approximate number of people employed by the operation

$500M civil forfeiture action filed against 20 of the defendants

40,000 different people bet with this site

Queens district attorney's office

$3.3 BIL CASINO ROYALE (NYPOST)

By Todd Venezia,, Erika Martinez & Ikimulisa Livingston

The New York Post, November 16, 2006

November 16, 2006 -- A high-stakes poker player's bets were nothing compared to the gamble he took by running a staggering $3.3 billion Internet bookmaking operation - that was busted when cops cloned his computer hard drive, authorities said yesterday.

James Giordano, the reputed kingpin of the international online sports betting ring, was indicted in Queens Supreme Court along with 26 others - including a mob associate, a Major League Baseball scout and a Long Island Web designer - on a host of gambling and corruption charges.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," NYPD Commissioner Raymond Kelly said. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Giordano is a big-money poker pro who has competed in the World Series of Poker and who in July won a tournament at the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, which bagged him nearly $100,000.

Authorities said his luck actually turned bad a month earlier, when he attended a family wedding in Long Island on June 17.

While Giordano - who goes by the nickname "Dexter" - and his wife were at the ceremony, police executed a warrant in their hotel room. In the three hours they were gone, investigators seized his laptop computer and took it to another room, where they cloned the hard drive, then put the computer back in his room.

Giordano didn't know his computer had been tampered with, and kept using it. The gambler took extraordinary measures to hide his activities, such as getting a new cellphone each month, but didn't know his cloned laptop was allowing cops to watch all of his online gaming activities in real time - and to collect crucial evidence, authorities said.

That helped investigators unravel Giordano's ties to the some 40,000 customers who allegedly placed bets on football, baseball, golf and other sports with the help of a Web site called playwithal.com.

"It made for a much stronger case," NYPD Deputy Inspector Brian O'Neill said. "Everything was happening on that page with the log-in numbers being observed by the NYPD."

Giordano allegedly ran the operation from a walled $10 million Florida compound that was raided by the FBI yesterday. He was taken to the Miami-Dade County jail, where he was awaiting extradition to New York.

After the indictments were handed up in Queens, search warrants were executed around the country. Authorities said they pulled a total of $1.6 million in cash connected to the ring from closets, boxes and attics from numerous sites that were raided.

The searched property includes four Manhattan condominiums owned by two alleged members of the operation: Monte Weiner, 56, and his son Eric, 27.

Cops seized a treasure trove from the family, including jewelry, gold coins and artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dali. Also among the swag were autographed photos of Yankee legends Mickey Mantle and Joe DiMaggio; a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory; and a bat used by Ted Williams.

Officials even seized tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips from the Bellagio.

Despite its high-tech online facade, Giordano's operation ran very much like an old-school, illegal sports-betting business, complete with some 2,000 bookies in almost every state who dealt in cash, police said.

And for those players who felt that they could get away with stiffing an online gaming operation, there was a team of goons on call to collect bets, cops said.

"At lower levels of the organization, they will sometimes use organized-crime associates as enforcers," O'Neill said.

"In one instance, a California man, who was late in paying a $129,000 debt . . . was told that two enforcers were on their way to the West Coast to 'slice your face,' " Kelly said yesterday. "He repaid the money without further encouragement."

The operation's many bookies would kick up money, Mafia-style, to "agents" who dealt in sums that rival the sports betting operation at major Vegas casinos, authorities said. The top agent was Donald Clark, who booked $652,000 in bets in one week alone, police said. Another alleged big earner was Frank Falzarano of Seaford, L.I., who officials said was a scout for baseball's Washington Nationals. He went by the code name "Z8300," and handled wagers at a rate of more than $8 million a year, cops said.

Clark was being held yesterday in lieu of $750,000 bail, while Falzarano posted $500,000 bail and was freed.

Despite Falzarano's participation in the betting ring, no baseball games were affected, cops said. The Nationals said in a statement that Falzarano was a part-time scout whose contract expired on Oct. 31.

Authorities said the ring even had "wire rooms" in Costa Rica and St. Maarten. It was busted in Queens because authorities there got wind of the operation while investigating a prescription drug resale scheme linked to the Bonanno crime family in 2005.

One of the people involved in the drug plot told officials about Giordano and his alleged gambling ring.

The ring used shell corporations and had bank accounts around the world, including Switzerland, the Caribbean and Hong Kong.

After members of the Russian mob allegedly launched a denial of service attack on the playwithal.com server, Giordano allegedly hired a Long Island Web design company called Primary Development and two Florida service providers to beef up security.

Authorities said that the leaders of the computer businesses knew who they were working for. So, in an unusual move, the three companies and Primary's CEO, Maurice Freeman, 37, of East Northport, L.I., were indicted as part of the scheme.

Once the site was buffed up, Giordano's operation started running smoothly, cops said. Over the 28-month period while they were under scrutiny by authorities, they took an estimated $3.3 billion in wagers.

The bettors allegedly used the playwithal.com Web site as a wager sheet to place their bets. They then paid their losses - or collected their winnings - in face-to-face meetings with their bookie, police said.

DOJ_NMG_0095028

The bookies paid up to the agents or runners, according to authorities. The runners allegedly paid up to a group of "money collectors," who included Steven Tarantino, 33, described by cops as a known associate of the Luchese crime family. Monte Weiner and three others were also accused of being "collectors."

At the top was Giordano, who allegedly left the day-to-day operations to his lieutenant - his son in-law Daniel Clarin, who was also indicted. Also charged were Gior- dano's wife, Priscilla Ann, and daughter, Melissa Clarin, Daniel's wife.

Because of the size of the ring, authorities are bringing a civil asset forfeiture case against the suspects worth half a billion dollars.

The busts marked the first time anyone has been charged under the new federal Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, signed into law by President Bush last month.

Queens DA Richard Brown said that gambling online is a plague on the public.

"Internet gambling has been compared by some to the crack cocaine epidemic of the late '80s and early '90s," he said. "It's been said of Internet gambling that you simply click the mouse and loose your house."

todd.venezia@nypost.com

You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed (NYDN)

By Robert F. Mooreand Scott Shifrel, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, November 16, 2006

All bets are off on a $3.3 billion gambling operation that used the Internet, off-shore computer servers and good, old-fashioned mob muscle.

More than two dozen people were arrested and more than $7 million in cash was seized after police and FBI agents shut down the popular sports betting site Playwithal.com.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation this department has ever encountered," said Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly at a press conference announcing the bust. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Among those nabbed was James Giordano, an ex-New Yorker and ranked professional poker player whom authorities identified as the gambling mastermind who ran the illicit operation from behind the walls of his fortresslike Florida compound. Also arrested was a Major League Baseball scout, a Web designer and a Luchese crime family associate.

The bust is the first since President Bush signed a law last month making it difficult for bettors to fund their Internet gambling accounts through U.S.-based credit cards or banks - although Playwithal.com relied on hard cash.

Traditional bookies would give bettors a secret code to use the Internet gambling site, authorities said. Bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, auto racing and golf - and at the end of each week, the bookies would pay off or collect from each client.

"They laundered and stashed away millions in winnings using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland and Hong Kong," said Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, who led the 28-month probe.

Prosecutors also seized hundreds of millions of dollars in cash and property as part of a civil forfeiture suit that seeks $500 million in damages.

Among the assets confiscated, Brown said, were four luxury Manhattan condos, a modern art collection and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl III champion New York Jets.

The artwork by Salvador Dali and Peter Max and the sports memorabilia were found in a secret room hidden behind a bookshelf in a Murray Hill condo.

Investigators said one of the biggest earners in the network of 2,000 bookies nationwide was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, L.I., a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants.

Authorities said the investigation of the sophisticated gaming operation began with a simple tip involving the attempted kidnapping of a gambler who owed a bookie $40,000.

From there, prosecutors eavesdropped on thousands of phone conversations and even broke into e-mail communications at the site's snazzy Web site. Bets also were taken by phone - but all wagers were ultimately recorded on computer servers in Costa Rica or St. Maarten.

"They were as savvy and adept in the use of computer technology as they were proficient in the art of secreting and laundering untold millions of dollars," Brown said.

Still, Giordano allegedly relied on old-fashioned mob muscle from Luchese family associate Steven Tarantino, 33, of Manhattan, and paid tribute to jailed ex-Bonanno family acting boss Anthony Urso, sources said.

A break in the case came last year when investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. On another occasion, investigators tapped Giordano's cell phone while he played in a January poker tournament at the Bellagio, made famous in the movie "Ocean's 11."

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em tournament at the Bellagio worth nearly $100,000 earlier this year.

He was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his Pine Crest, Fla., compound.

"Troublesome is the fact that so many people today are involved in Internet gambling," Brown said. "You simply click the mouse and lose your house."

Campaign Gifts To Governor Probed (MH)

By Frances Robles

The Miami Herald, November 16, 2006

Puerto Rico's secretary of state has until Friday to produce documents relating to dozens of people and firms in the latest chapter of a monthslong federal probe of donations to a political campaign of the current governor.

The office of Secretary of State Fernando Bonilla has confirmed that it received a subpoena for all documents -- including checks, e-mails, faxes and handwritten notes -- on more than 60 individuals or companies tied to a handful of Philadelphia fundraisers.

The fundraisers helped collect campaign contributions for Aníbal Acevedo Vilá while he was resident commissioner -- Puerto Rico's nonvoting representative in Congress. Acevedo Vilá was elected governor last year.

TESTIMONY SOUGHT

Bonilla was ordered to appear Friday morning before a federal grand jury in San Juan but can avoid testifying in person by delivering the documents to the FBI, according to a copy of the subpoena published by the newspaper El Nuevo Día.

A spokesman for the FBI's San Juan office, Harry Rodriguez, said federal law prohibits him from discussing grand jury probes.

"The FBI has jurisdiction to investigate public federal election-law violations involving excessive campaign contributions, corporate contributions and conduit contributions made through third parties," Rodriguez said. ``It is not unusual for these illegal-contribution cases to be connected to schemes to corruptly influence elected officials."

According to media reports in Puerto Rico and Philadelphia, federal investigators are trying to determine whether "straw contributions" -- donations illegally made under another person's name -- were made in order to bypass federal campaign donation limits. A June report by the Philadelphia Inquirer showed that several Pennsylvania dental company employees listed as contributors on Acevedo's campaign finance reports had said they never gave money to the campaign.

The investigation also seeks to determine whether government contracts were steered to companies that helped fill Acevedo's campaign coffers.

"We understand the investigation is about some people from Philadelphia who at some moments made donations to Aníbal Acevedo Vilá's resident commissioner campaign, and federal authorities are trying to determine whether they did so in accordance with the law," Acevedo's spokeswoman, Juanita Colombani, said in an e-mail to The Miami Herald. ``The governor has not been notified that he is a target or subject of the investigation."

Several of the governor's current and former aides, including Colombani, have been subpoenaed to testify. Colombani said she testified before the grand jury and was questioned by the FBI at her house.

"All the donations the governor received for his campaign for resident commissioner were done legally and were reported to the Federal Elections Commission," she wrote. ``The governor has said and reiterates that he has never received or solicited a donation in exchange for anything."

PHILADELPHIA MEN

DOJ_NMG_0095030

The investigation so far has centered around Philadelphia dentist Candido Negron and his business associate, Robert M. Feldman, a Philadelphia Democratic Party fundraiser who once co-hosted a fundraiser for Acevedo Vilá.

Feldman and Negron are under scrutiny because they were seeking a contract from the island's government healthcare system for Doral Dental, a Wisconsin-based company that has paid them hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions, the Inquirer reported.

Among the documents the grand jury requested are those relating to Feldman and 10 of his companies. Feldman's attorney, Henry E. Hockeimer, said Feldman and Negron were business partners who did consulting work for Doral Dental, also mentioned in the subpoena.

"Mr. Feldman never did business in Puerto Rico," Hockeimer said. He declined to comment further.

Attempts to reach Negron were unsuccessful.

Doral Dental spokesman Michael Pflugheoft said the company, which specializes in government contracts, has not done any business in Puerto Rico.

"We became aware of this through the media," he said. ``It isn't anything we're involved in."

The secretary of state was also ordered to produce records relating to prominent Philadelphia developer Kenneth N. Goldenberg. His spokesman Greg Reaves said the company received "a request for information" and cooperated.

`FISHING EXPEDITION'

The subpoena also listed Parkway Corp., a Philadelphia real-estate development company. Calling it a "fishing expedition," company spokesman Howard Trachtman said Parkway was issued a subpoena several months ago, despite not having done business on the island in more than a decade.

"I can tell you we did receive a subpoena, and we responded," Trachtman said. ``I don't know what they're looking for."

Vernon Mayor, Former City Administrator Charged With Corruption (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

Capping years of investigations into Vernon, Los Angeles prosecutors today filed public corruption charges that accused the small industrial city's longtime mayor of voter fraud and the former city administrator of using public funds for personal use.

The indictment came after decades of complaints by critics that the city south of downtown Los Angeles operates as a fiefdom by leaders, including Mayor Leonis Malburg, who has been in office for more than 50 years. He is the grandson of Vernon's founder.

Most of Vernon's homes are owned by Malburg, other council members and the city. Most of the 91 residents are city employees.

Prosecutors charged that Malburg has been fraudulently voting in Vernon elections, even though he has long lived in a posh estate in Hancock Park, 20 miles from the gritty city that is home to various manufacturing businesses and factories.

The district attorney's office charged that longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. used $60,000 in city money for personal uses. Makenhorst was the highest paid city official in the state before stepping down two years ago, earning more than $600,000 a year for running a city of fewer than 100 people.

The charges mark the biggest challenge in decades to the reign of Malburg and his allies, who aggressively fought efforts to unseat them.

The indictment comes after a tumultuous election in which the city hired gun-toting private investigators to follow challengers seeking to unseat Malburg and the other council incumbents.

Prosecutors have been building their cases against the city officials for nearly a decade, but Vernon waged a long court battle in an unsuccessful effort to avoid turning over city records.

hector.becerra@latimes.com

In Murder Case, New Evidence But Same Cell (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

More than two years ago, investigators from the Queens district attorney's office sat in Jaime Acevedo's living room and listened to him describe a night in 1992 — an instant, really — that has yet to end.

Mr. Acevedo, seen by the authorities as an ordinary, law-abiding, working man with no reason to lie, said that he knew the inside details on a little-noticed murder in Woodside, one that seemed to have been solved and settled long ago.

Investigators had never spoken with Mr. Acevedo or realized that he knew anything about the case. But in fact, Mr. Acevedo told them, he had unwittingly given the killer a ride to and from the murder scene. The man he named had never been connected or charged with the crime.

There was more.

Mr. Acevedo said the one person accused and convicted of the murder had nothing to do with it. That man, Joshua Rivera, sentenced to 37 years, had not even been present, according to Mr. Acevedo.

The story did not end there. The district attorney's investigators found another man who told essentially the same story as Mr. Acevedo: he, too, said that he had been in the car with the killer and that Mr. Rivera was not involved.

Two years later, Mr. Rivera, 36, is still serving time for the murder, and the man named as the real killer by the two new witnesses has not been charged.

In an era when DNA tests seem to have made unraveling convictions as easy as untying a shoe, Mr. Rivera's case is a reminder that the criminal justice system, by law and custom, generally resists the reopening of jury verdicts, at times even in the face of new evidence that seems strong.

It is also a vivid example of the discretion that prosecutors can exercise in not only bringing cases but also reviewing their outcomes.

After his appeals were exhausted, Mr. Rivera wrote to prosecutors to insist on his innocence. Starting in 2003, prosecutors in an unofficial unit that examined claims of "actual innocence" located the new witnesses, according to court papers.

After those prosecutors raised questions about whether the right man was in prison, the case was turned over to more senior prosecutors. They resisted Mr. Rivera's first request to overturn the verdict, saying that he and his lawyer could have found witnesses like Mr. Acevedo before his trial in 1995.

Now, however, as Mr. Rivera's advocates continue to press his cause, the district attorney's office has agreed to have the new evidence presented to a judge, who will consider whether it casts doubt on the verdict, a senior prosecutor in the Queens office said.

In particular, the judge will be asked to weigh whether the new evidence is strong enough to contradict the original testimony of two eyewitnesses who said that they saw Mr. Rivera do the killing. That senior prosecutor said he could not speak for attribution because the case is pending in court.

At its beginnings, the case seemed numbingly familiar, and simple.

On the morning of Sept. 19, 1992, a man named Leonard Aquino stood with another man in front of a building at 47-25 48th Street in Woodside. He was approached by a couple of men who spoke briefly, then opened fire. Mr. Aquino was killed; another man, Paul Peralta, was shot, but survived.

Mr. Rivera, whose nickname was Shorty 140, was known to many people in the building and had been in trouble before, including a conviction for gun possession.

His picture was picked out of an array of photos by Mr. Peralta and another witness, and in February 1993, five months after the shooting, Mr. Rivera was charged with killing Mr. Aquino and shooting Mr. Peralta. He was convicted in December 1995.

His efforts to overturn the case were supported by a friend who grew up with Mr. Rivera in Astoria, Sherman Jackson, who had competed with him in break dancing competitions. After a stint in the Marine Corps, Mr. Jackson became a prosecutor in the Queens district attorney's office.

Troubled by his old friend's assertion that he had been wrongly convicted, Mr. Jackson raised the question of Mr. Rivera's innocence in 2003 with his boss, Gregory Lasak, who was a homicide prosecutor and had also been involved in the exoneration of 20 innocent people.

DOJ_NMG_0095032

Based on a prison letter from Mr. Rivera, Mr. Lasak had already begun an investigation into Mr. Rivera's case, according to Mr. Jackson. As part of that review, investigators tracked down Mr. Acevedo and the second man, Kenny Chung, who said he was in the car with the killer that night in 1992.

Meanwhile, Mr. Jackson, who had gone into private practice, spoke with Mr. Peralta and learned that he was wavering on his identification of Mr. Rivera as the gunman. He also spoke with a neighbor who had given first aid to Mr. Aquino and Mr. Peralta. The neighbor said that Mr. Peralta had told her that it had all happened too quickly for him to recognize his attackers.

Mr. Lasak began serving as a State Supreme Court justice in 2004. Mr. Rivera is represented by Chris Renfroe, a private defense lawyer in Queens.

Mr. Renfroe said that he believed that when District Attorney Richard A. Brown focused on the details of the case, he would quickly move to resolve it in Mr. Rivera's favor.

Mr. Brown declined to comment on the case. But in the past, his staff had said that the case was not black and white. For one thing, Mr. Chung had consented to be interviewed only in the presence of a known gang member and had refused to identify the fourth person in the car.

Mr. Jackson, the former prosecutor and friend of Mr. Rivera's, said: "The time for delaying has ended. The prosecution could shine from this because justice goes both ways, putting people in jail and getting them out."

This week, Mr. Acevedo — who had no role in the trials and never spoke with the authorities until late 2004 — sat in a restaurant in Astoria and recalled the night of the murder.

He was 22 years old and had been working steadily in supermarkets and delivering advertising circulars since he was 14, which allowed him to buy the car that he drove into Manhattan that evening with three other men. One was Mr. Chung, who has also spoken with prosecutors about the events; the other two were acquaintances whom he knew only as Aid and Everlast.

After going to clubs, they returned to Queens near dawn. Mr. Acevedo said that his passengers directed him to pull over at 48th Street in Woodside.

The men he knew as Aid and Everlast got out of the car, and Mr. Acevedo said he stepped out a moment later. He estimated he was about five or seven car lengths away when they approached the door of the building. He heard shots, he said.

"I had no idea what was going to happen," Mr. Acevedo said. "I saw flashes off the wall of the building." The two men came racing toward him, and one of them dropped a gun in the curb and picked it up. They jumped in the car and fled the scene, he said.

Mr. Acevedo said he had no choice but to drive them away. "They had a gun and just shot someone," he said.

In the car, he said, they talked about how they had made the approach.

"They said they asked those guys for weed, that was the story, then Aim shot," Mr. Acevedo said. He dropped them at their homes in Elmhurst.

"Then I just drove around for two hours," he said. "My head was so full. I didn't belong with them. I was just being with people I didn't belong with. I never was a thug."

He currently holds a full-time, job, though he asked that it not be described. He has not had a girlfriend since the killing.

"I never got married, I never had kids, and these were my dreams," he said. "At holidays, Thanksgiving with my sisters, sitting there and everyone is having a good time, then you stop. This is in the back of your head.

"When you wake up in the morning, instantly, this goes through my head," Mr. Acevedo said. "To this day. I don't even have to fully wake up. Instantly. Every day."

Simpson Revisits Infamous Case (LAT)

By Robin Abcarian And Martin Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

HOLLYWOOD — The two abiding emotions that characterized the O.J. Simpson double murder case -- revulsion and fascination -- surfaced again this week when, just in time for November television sweeps, Simpson revealed that he will take part in a two-part Fox television special and release a book that will address how he might have killed his ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend Ron Goldman.

DOJ_NMG_0095033

"If I Did It," is to be released Nov. 30 by Regan, an imprint of HarperCollins, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. Another division of News Corp, the Fox network, will air a two-part interview with Simpson, conducted by his publisher, Judith Regan, on Monday, Nov. 27 and Wednesday, Nov. 29. In the book and the interviews, according to a statement from HarperCollins, Simpson will give a "bone-chilling account of the night of the murders," which took place on June 12, 1994.

"I'm going to tell you a story you've never heard before, because no one knows this story the way I know it," Simpson writes in the publisher's release. "I want you to forget everything you think you know about that night, because I know the facts better than anyone."

As condemnation flowed from victims' families, publishers, broadcasters, bloggers and others involved in the sensational criminal case, Regan defended her decision to publish the book. . "It's not fiction," she said Wednesday evening at a dinner for the National Book Awards in New York. As to whether Simpson would agree with that, she replied, "I don't know." She sidestepped questions about whether the former football star had approached her, or the other way around, and how he might be paid. But she acknowledged the torrent of criticism already directed at the joint television-book project.

"I think the media has spun it in the wrong direction," said Regan. "When they see the special and when they read the book and hear about why I did it, why I think this is an important moment, I think they'll have a different viewpoint."

Simpson, who was acquitted of murder, was found responsible for the killings in a subsequent civil trial. The televised trial deeply divided the U.S., often along racial lines, changed the way crime scenes are handled and spawned a new category of TV personality -- the courtroom legal analyst.

One such pundit, Dan Abrams, who provided legal analysis on the Simpson case for Court TV and "The Today Show," noted that Simpson's apparent willingness to discuss how he would have committed the murders is a tack he has used before. "This is vintage O.J. Simpson," said Abrams, who is now general manager of MSNBC. "My guess is that there's more talk of golf and his kids than there is about how the killer may have committed this crime," he said. "I think it will probably do pretty well, because I do think there's still a fascination with him. But I don't think it's going to be a lockbuster night the way it would have been 10 years ago. I think there's a little O.J. fatigue. "

Others familiar with the tragic public soap opera also said that little, if any, new information is likely to come to light in a case that has been the source of exhaustive coverage and speculation and generated scores of books, television programs and even re-enactments.

In the past, even Simpson has speculated about his own guilt. "Let's say I committed this crime," he told Esquire magazine in 1998. "Even if I did do this, it would have to have been because I loved her very much, right?"

The family of Nicole Brown Simpson expressed outrage. "It's unfortunate that Simpson has decided to awaken a nightmare that we have painfully endured and worked so hard to move beyond," said Denise Brown, Nicole's sister, in a statement. "We hope Ms. Regan takes full accountability for promoting the wrongdoing of criminals and leveraging this forum and the actions of Simpson to commercialize abuse."

Their view was echoed by Ron Goldman's father, Fred, who has continued to pursue collection of the $33.5 million judgment that was levied in 1997 against Simpson by a civil jury that found him responsible for the murders. To date, the family has only been paid a couple of thousand dollars in proceeds from items seized from the former football player and sold at auction. According to Daniel Petrocelli, who represented the Goldmans in the civil trial, the debt has grown close to $40 million now, with interest.

Petrocelli doubts that the families will receive any of the money Simpson will earn from the project.

"It is an all-time low for television," said Goldman. "To imagine that a major network would put a murderer on TV to have him tell how he would murder the mother of his children and my son is beyond comprehension."

Goldman said he thinks the outrage should extend to the entire Fox network. "Send a message to Fox that if Fox believes their viewers want this kind of trash on television, they must not think very highly of their viewers," Goldman said.

Fox television executives declined to comment on the broadcast.

Two weeks ago, in his most recent attempt to collect the debt, Fred Goldman was rebuffed in a Santa Monica courtroom when he sought control over the rights to Simpson's name, image and likeness.

DOJ_NMG_0095034

Goldman's current attorney Jonathan Polak said he plans to appeal the ruling. He expressed indignation that Simpson could profit from the very murder that he has long denied, and blasted those who would profit from Simpson's story.

From a legal perspective, said experts, even if Simpson confessed to the double murder, he could not be tried again. Under the legal concept of double jeopardy, a person may not be charged with a crime for which he has already been acquitted.

The controversy and attendant publicity may guarantee what Fox hoped for all along -- big ratings at a critical period when advertising rates are being determined. Media observers likened the move to ABC's 2003 interview with Michael Jackson about allegations of child molestation, which drew some 27 million viewers.

"This is an old-fashioned sweeps stunt pure and simple," said Brad Adgate, research director for the ad-buying firm Horizon Media.

"There's going to be a high curiosity factor to watch it."

Times staff writers Greg Krikorian, Matea Gold, Paul Lieberman and Maura Dolan contributed to this report.

CIVIL LAW:

Unions Object To New Bonus Plan For Dana Executives (AP)

By Marc Hopkins, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Unions representing Dana Corp. employees say its proposal to pay millions to executives while it plans to cut health care and retiree benefits should be struck down.

"It is precisely this double standard — insulating executives from the consequences of bankruptcy while workers must cope with harsh, draconian consequences — that Congress sought to eliminate" with the a recent bankruptcy reform act, the unions said in court papers.

The joint objection from the United Autoworkers and United Steelworkers unions comes in the midst of Dana's renewed efforts to get bankruptcy court approval for a long-term incentive plan.

Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on customers General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co.

The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy due to production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers.

Under the proposal, Dana Chief Executive Michael J. Burns will receive up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008. The payments are tied to the achievement of various earnings benchmarks. The payments aren't guaranteed.

The company said five other top managers would share a bonus pool of up to $3.18 million in 2007 and would be entitled to a pool of at least $1.59 million the year after.

Dana's latest proposal is a step down from a previous plan that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection.

The company's official committee of unsecured creditors filed papers Tuesday supporting the proposal saying it links the performance of top managers to the interests of creditors.

Creditors said the plan motivates executives to minimize the amount of claims against the company. If allowed unsecured claims exceed $2.85 billion, the incentive bonuses to management will decrease.

Dana stressed that incentive payments aren't assured, and that the earnings targets will require management to "stretch" to achieve better operating results.

But the unions don't buy that argument. They said Dana failed to offer any evidence supporting the challenges faced by executives. They also didn't view performance targets as hard to achieve.

The timing of Dana's proposal is also inappropriate the unions said. It coincides with the company's recent announcement to close eight plants in North America in addition to eight other locations targeted for closure under the company's restructuring effort.

DOJ_NMG_0095035

The latest proposal is Dana's second attempt to get Judge Burton Lifland to sign off on the bonus plan. He denied the first plan on Sept. 5, saying it clashed with provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay.

At the time, Dana's bonus request was widely viewed as a litmus test for Section 503(c) of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, enacted a year ago.

The Justice Department has consistently opposed Dana's efforts, and in court papers Tuesday, U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said the company again failed to meet the requirements for bonus payments under the reform act.

Lifland will consider Dana's executive compensation package during a Nov. 21 hearing at the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Suspect In LAPD Excessive Force Probe Enters Plea And Is Released (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The man who was repeatedly punched by a Los Angeles police officer on a video circulated on the Internet struck a plea bargain Wednesday and was released from jail.

William Cardenas, 23, pleaded no contest to a misdemeanor charge of resisting, delaying or obstructing an officer. He had been in custody since his arrest Aug. 11, after he ran from police in Hollywood, who said he had been drinking a beer in public.

Video of the arrest posted on YouTube.com showed Cardenas lying on his back and taking punches to the face from one officer as another officer sat on his stomach. In exchange for his plea to the misdemeanor, prosecutors dropped two felony charges of resisting officers.

Cardenas' lawyer, B. Kwaku Duren, said he had offered the plea bargain to prosecutors two months ago but had not heard back from them. He attributed the plea agreement to the publicity stemming from the video.

Asked whether the video had led to the deal, Deputy Dist. Atty Michael Yglecias said: "I would be lying if I said it didn't. Obviously it was part of the evidence we considered."

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton told Patt Morrison in an interview on KPCC-FM (89.3) that he did not think the release of the video, and the widespread exposure that followed, had an effect on Cardenas' getting a reduction in charges.

"Not at all," he said. "If anything, the video would show he resisted arrest."

Bratton said plea bargains were "something done in the majority of cases in Los Angeles," he said. "I think it's probably an effort on the part of Mr. Cardenas to get out of jail."

Bratton noted that a judge had previously held Cardenas over for trial. "Police work is never pretty, particularly when you have people resisting arrest," the chief said.

He added that the district attorney's office was continuing its criminal investigation of the matter and that the LAPD was continuing the administrative investigation to see if the department had complied with its own policy.

peter.hong@latimes.com

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

Video Arrest Subject Pleads No Contest (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, November 15, 2006, 7:50 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

William Cardenas, 23, was sentenced to three months already served in jail and placed on three years of probation.

The video footage posted on the Web site YouTube.com showed the arrest of Cardenas, an alleged gang member. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood curb as one punches him several times in the face.

The clip caused a sensation, with 155,000 views, and eventually prompted the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department to investigate.

DOJ_NMG_0095036

Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property when they confronted him Aug. 11.

In an arrest report obtained by The Associated Press, the officers said they tried to arrest Cardenas after spotting him on a sidewalk, but he fled.

The officers caught up to him, tripped him and swarmed over him to apply handcuffs, the report said. In their report, they admitted hitting him repeatedly in the face, saying he was resisting and that they feared he might grab one of their guns.

Cardenas' attorney, B. Kwaku Duren, accused the officers of using excessive force.

LAPD Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A district attorney's investigation has cleared police officers of wrongdoing in a videotaped incident in which a transient in handcuffs was apparently pepper-sprayed in a police car, police Chief William Bratton said Tuesday.

The February 2005 incident came to light this week when the videotape, shot by a citizen, was released by the man's attorney.

The tape of Benjamin Barker's arrest surfaced on the heels of an 18-second video showing a Los Angeles officer repeatedly punching a suspect in the face while another officer tried to handcuff the man during a struggle on a Hollywood street on Aug. 11.

At a news conference, Bratton cited a Nov. 15, 2005, decision by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office in which prosecutors declined to file any charges against officers in the arrest of Barker, who had been in a scuffle with a Venice merchant.

"Examination of the videotape clearly shows (the officers) did not use excessive force on Benjamin Barker, nor did they assault him under color of authority," Bratton said, quoting the decision. "The officers showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy to Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior."

The Los Angeles Times reported Tuesday that the tape shows an officer take pepper spray out of a holster, then raise it toward Barker's face, but the actual spraying is obscured by shadows.

The report found that Barker kicked at one officer, lunged toward another, "battered" another officer by spitting on him, and then vandalized the police car, Bratton said.

"The officers used that degree of force necessary to restrain Barker and maintain custody of him," the chief said, quoting from the decision.

Barker has since pleaded guilty to misdemeanor battery on the shopkeeper.

Barker's attorney, John Raphling, told the Los Angeles Times that Barker was whining and crying on the tape, "but he is not being aggressive or threatening" to the officers. Messages seeking comment were left Tuesday by The Associated Press, but were not immediately returned.

The district attorney's office also concluded that reports by two officers that said the pepper spray was administered outside the car were mistaken recollections and not intentional misstatements of fact.

The chief noted that a court commissioner who held a hearing in the separate Hollywood arrest also found the officers in that case did nothing wrong because that suspect was resisting.

But the chief said administrative reviews of whether officers in both incidents violated departmental policies or procedures had yet to conclude. He said his decision in the Barker arrest would be made soon.

More Racist Graffiti Reported In Charles (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Church Defaced Again in Latest Case

Local and federal investigators continued this week to probe a string of racist graffiti incidents in Charles County, the latest one occurring at an African American church that had received a bomb threat a week before.

DOJ_NMG_0095037

Members of Zion Baptist Church in Welcome spotted the latest graffiti when they arrived for Sunday morning service. Someone had used bright orange paint to spray "KKK," "White Power" and "Bang Boom" on a roadway leading to the church's parking lot. The graffiti had been painted that morning or the day before, according to the county's sheriff's office.

On Nov. 5 someone called the church with a bomb threat. Two Charles deputies and their dogs went to the church but found nothing during a sweep of the building and grounds. Investigators said they believe the threat was made from a pay phone at Best One Food Stores in Seat Pleasant, which is in Prince George's County near the D.C. line.

Sheriff's office investigators said they believe the "Bang Boom" graffiti was a reference to the bomb threat, but they don't know if it was done by the same person or by someone who heard or read about the threat.

The weekend's graffiti was not the first such incident at the church. On Sept. 10, sheriff's deputies responded to an alarm there. After arriving, they found "KKK" painted on a side door and on the back of a church sign. Additionally, the front glass door was painted with crudely drawn symbols: a large incomplete circle with geometric shapes on either side, authorities and church members said.

In all, there have been 11 such cases in Charles since August. Local officials arrested two 15-year-olds in connection with one incident after lifting fingerprints from a can of white spray paint, but authorities have not tied those juveniles to any of the other incidents, which have been classified as hate crimes by the sheriff's office.

In September, local officials contacted the FBI, and the agencies have conducted a joint investigation of the incidents since, said Kristen Timko, a sheriff's office spokeswoman. "Our detectives meet regularly with them," she said.

The incidents have left many Charles residents wondering whether the crimes are the work of a few racially motivated perpetrators or part of broader race relations problems. Either way, Sheriff Frederick E. Davis said it's a serious matter.

"When they're spraying 'white pride' and 'KKK,' that's not a perception problem. That's a real problem, and it's something that needs to be stopped," he said in September.

Members of Zion Baptist are facing the same questions.

"We don't know if it's a planned, orchestrated move, or if it's a random act. . . . We're pretty much baffled by it," said Charles "Pete" Williams, chairman of the deacons at the church. Church members are considering new security measures and are appealing to higher powers.

"We're coming together to do what Christians do: Pray. And pray for the people who are doing this," he said.

As of Tuesday afternoon, the graffiti was still on the roadway.

The church's Sunday service draws 200 to 250 people. Many are longtime county residents, and those who live in the Welcome area have not reported problems with neighbors, Williams said.

He said he hasn't noticed a drop in service attendance: "So far we're pretty much standing strong."

Counting The Vote, Badly (NYT)

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

Last week's elections provided a lot of disturbing news about the reliability of electronic voting — starting, naturally, with Florida. In a Congressional race there between Vern Buchanan, a Republican, and Christine Jennings, a Democrat, the machines in Sarasota County reported that more than 18,000 people, or one in eight, did not choose either candidate. That "undervote" of nearly 13 percent is hard to believe, given that only about 2.5 percent of absentee voters did not vote in that race. If there was a glitch, it may have made all the difference. Ms. Jennings trails Mr. Buchanan by about 400 votes.

The serious questions about the Buchanan- Jennings race only add to the high level of mistrust that many people already feel about electronic voting. More than half of the states, including California, New York, Ohio and Illinois, now require that electronic voting machines produce voter-verified paper records, which help ensure that votes are properly recorded. But Congress has resisted all appeals to pass a law that would ensure that electronic voting is honest and accurate across the nation.

Fortunately, that may be about to change. With the Democrats now in control of both houses, there is an excellent chance of passing tough electronic voting legislation. Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, had more than 200 co-sponsors for a strong electronic voting bill before this month's election, and support is likely to grow in the new Congress. In the Senate, Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who will be chairwoman of the Rules and Administration Committee, which oversees elections, plans to develop a similar bill.

DOJ_NMG_0095038

The problems with elections go well beyond electronic voting. Partisan secretaries of state continue to skew the rules to favor their parties and political allies. States are adopting harsh standards for voter registration drives to make it harder for people to register, as well as draconian voter identification laws to make casting a ballot harder for poor people, racial minorities, the elderly and students. Some states have adopted an indefensible rule that provisional ballots cast at the wrong table of the correct polling place must be thrown out.

Congress has failed to address these and other important flaws with the mechanics of the election system. But this, too, may be about to change. Senator Feinstein is saying that providing fair access to the ballot will be among her committee's top priorities in the coming year. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, plans to revise and reintroduce her "Count Every Vote Act," which takes an admirably broad approach to overhauling the voting system.

Election reform has tended to be a partisan issue, with Democrats arguing for reform and Republicans resisting it. It shouldn't be. Congressional Democrats should make fixing this country's broken system of elections a top priority, and Republicans should join them.

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Opens Criminal Probe Of Banks' Municipal Deals (Correct) (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

(Corrects fourth paragraph to show Investment Management was searched by Justice Department officials, not the FBI.)

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Department of Justice is conducting a criminal investigation into whether banks and brokers conspired to rig the bidding for contracts that U.S. local governments use to invest bond proceeds.

Municipalities purchase guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, with bond money until they need the funds to pay for projects. The contracts are what banks and brokers used to invest at least $7 billion of bond proceeds raised by local governments across the U.S. in the past decade that were never spent, according to an Oct. 4 Bloomberg News report.

``It's about time," said Mark Schwartz, a Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania-based lawyer and former head of municipal bonds for Prudential Financial Corp.'s mid-Atlantic region, about the investigation. ``This is an incestuous little business."

Dexia SA's Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd. unit today said it was subpoenaed by the U.S. Justice Department as part of the probe by antitrust regulators. Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a GIC broker and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, was searched by Justice Department officials, Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the firm, said.

The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest the money raised in the $2 trillion tax-exempt bond market has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue.

`Anticompetitive Practices'

Kathleen Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice, confirmed an ``investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal bond industry." She declined to provide further detail of the subpoena of Financial Security or whether other subpoenas were issued.

Betsy Castenir, a spokeswoman for Financial Security, declined to comment further on the investigation. The company, part of Belgium's third-biggest financial services firm, also insures municipal bonds against default. Financial Security said it isn't aware of any specific allegations of misconduct.

The IRS has been investigating bidding for GICs and has raised concerns that improper bidding may have diverted to banks money that should have been paid in taxes. U.S. tax law prevents local governments from profiting by selling municipal bonds and reinvesting the money at higher rates. Such earnings, known as arbitrage, must be paid to the U.S. government.

DOJ_NMG_0095039

The IRS last year told officials from Atlanta that the city may have overpaid for a $453 million guaranteed investment contract from Bank of America Corp. in an auction run by CDR Financial Products Inc.

Payments for Nothing

Bloomberg News reported last month that the Bank of America employee who bid for the work was fired after disclosing that he paid $57,393 to CDR for transactions in which it played no role. The employee said the payments were made to bolster his relationship with CDR.

Bank of America spokeswoman Shirley Norton didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment on whether it has been contacted by the Justice Department. Allan Ripp, a spokesman for CDR, also didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

KKR, Carlyle, 11 Others Accused Of Rigging Buyouts (Update2) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Carlyle Group, the manager of the biggest U.S. buyout fund, are among 13 private equity firms accused in a class-action lawsuit of rigging the market to take companies private.

The class action was filed in Manhattan federal court by investors who claim they didn't receive full value for their shares because of a conspiracy that violated antitrust laws.

``Investors in the target company are deprived of the full economic value of their holdings and `squeezed out' at artificially low valuations," the suit says.

The U.S. Justice Department launched an informal antitrust investigation into allegations that private-equity firms collaborated on leveraged buyouts, according to a person familiar with the matter.

Carlyle spokesman Christopher Ullman declined to comment on the lawsuit.

The suit alleges violations of federal antitrust laws, which entitle successful plaintiffs to recover triple damages. It seeks to represent tens of thousands of shareholders in dozens of deals in which public companies were taken private.

``It's a relatively large class," said Fred Isquith, a lawyer at Wolf Haldenstein Adler Freeman & Herz in Manhattan, which brought the case.

Univision, HCA, Harrah's

The named plaintiffs -- L.A. Murphy, Marvin Sternhell, and Henoch Kaiman -- were investors in dozens of companies, including Univision Communications Inc., HCA Inc., and Harrah's Entertainment Inc.

Other firms named as defendants in the complaint are Clayton, Dubilier, & Rice; Silver Lake Partners; Blackstone Group; Bain Capital LLC; Thomas H. Lee Partners; Texas Pacific Group; Madison Dearborn Partners; Apollo Management LP; Providence Equity Partners; Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc.; and Warburg Pincus LLC.

US Airways Bids To Acquire Delta And No. 1 Rank (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. yesterday launched an $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., a move that would create the nation's largest carrier and possibly trigger other airline mergers in an industry recovering from a major downturn.

US Airways chief executive Doug Parker said combining carriers would boost profit and substantially cut costs by eliminating overlapping work and flights. Parker, who is credited with helping to successfully merge US Airways and America West in 2005, said he wanted to take advantage of Delta's status in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. If he waited until after the carrier exited bankruptcy, it would be harder to jettison unneeded Delta aircraft, he said.

"It's a unique opportunity to create a significant amount of value," Parker said in an interview.

Topping the list of potential obstacles is Delta's management, which isn't excited about any merger. Chief executive Gerald Grinstein sent a memo to employees later in the day, saying he didn't want Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a "merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline."

DOJ_NMG_0095040

The new airline would retain the Delta name and offer more seats than any other airline in the nation, surpassing the current leader, American Airlines, US Airways executives said. Its network would extend from New York to Phoenix and abroad. Delta would become the top airline, serving 155 domestic airports and 350 destinations worldwide, the executives said.

It is not known which frequent-flier program the new company would retain -- US Airways is a member of the Star Alliance network, and Delta is a partner in SkyTeam, both extensive partnerships involving foreign carriers.

Although US Airways executives said they would not stop flying to any cities served by either carrier, they said the merger would allow them to cut about 10 percent of the two airlines' flights. The new airline would be able to cut costs by flying fewer aircraft with more passengers, the executives said.

"We would also benefit from reducing service to some underperforming markets and discontinuing some unprofitable" routes, Parker said in a conference call with analysts.

With the reduction in flights, the number of cheap fares offered by the combined airline on many routes would decline and the average ticket price would increase, experts said.

"Fares will go up a little bit because there will be less overall competition," said Michael MacNair, author of "Smooth Landings," a book on managing business travel. He added that business travelers are nervous about the deal because they "don't want to shoulder the burden of higher ticket prices because competition goes away."

US Airways stock soared yesterday in reaction to the bid, closing up 16.8 percent, to $59.46 a share on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta shares closed at $1.52, up 3.4 percent, and its distressed bonds jumped in value and were among the most actively traded corporate debt issues yesterday.

Most analysts seemed enthusiastic about the proposal, saying they welcomed the idea of consolidation in the industry. Airline executives, including the chief executive of United Airlines, have said the industry needs to shrink to remain competitive. Among other possible merger targets, analysts mentioned United, American, Continental and Northwest airlines.

Analysts cautioned, however, that a US Airways-Delta deal faces many hurdles. US Airways hasn't yet fully digested its last merger; it hasn't even finished painting all of its America West jets in the new company colors.

Delta's chief executive brushed off attempts by Parker to discuss a merger this fall, according to letters exchanged between the two men.

In a statement yesterday, Grinstein said his airline's "plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve that objective."

Grinstein said in yesterday's memo to employees: "I've said before and continue to believe that the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure."

Faced with that resistance, Parker sidestepped Delta's management yesterday and made a direct pitch to its creditors. The offer totals $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock. If creditors like the deal, they could approach Delta management and encourage them to consider it.

Regulators also may question the bid. The new airline would probably have to shed one of its lucrative shuttle routes between Washington, New York City and Boston, US Airways executives acknowledged.

The Justice Department, which would scrutinize any potential merger, might also force the airline to eliminate some of its East Coast hub airports. The airline would have major operations at pairs of neighboring hubs, such as those in Charlotte and Atlanta, and New York and Philadelphia.

Antitrust lawyers said the Justice Department would focus on whether the proposed merger might diminish competition and harm consumers. Six years ago, the department seemed ready to challenge a proposed merger between US Airways and United Airlines before it fell apart.

But the emergence of low-cost carriers and Delta's struggles in bankruptcy may change the view of the department's lawyers, said Bill Bayer, an antitrust lawyer and a former head of the Federal Trade Commission's antitrust division.

"The market has obviously changed in six years," Bayer said, but questions remain about whether "it has changed to the point where the cost savings from combining these two carriers will outweigh the risks to consumers and competition."

If the airlines reach a deal, it will also probably be studied by the new Democratic Congress next year.

DOJ_NMG_0095041

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), the ranking Democrat, and likely future chairman, on the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, said he would probably hold hearings on such a merger.

"A combination of carriers of this magnitude should be scrutinized in the public domain," Oberstar said.

US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1 (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways made an $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines yesterday in an effort to become the largest airline in the world and dominate travel on the East Coast of the United States.

The surprise offer may presage a wave of mergers in the struggling airline industry. While consolidation of companies often leads to higher prices, it is unclear at this point whether this merger would do anything like that.

But any deal for Delta would have to overcome high hurdles, including antitrust scrutiny and a lack of support from Delta's management, which rebuffed advances from US Airways this summer.

In an unusual tack, the unsolicited offer is being made to the creditors of Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy protection — a process that will give Delta management control over any plan to get out of bankruptcy for at least several more months.

Delta said yesterday that it would review the offer. Delta is now the fourth-largest domestic airline and US Airways is No. 5. US Airways said the combined carrier would be bigger than the current leader, American Airlines, and would be called Delta Air Lines. It noted that Delta is a "very, very powerful" brand worldwide.

A deal would presumably be welcomed by many investors and analysts, who maintain that there are too many airlines fighting for razor-thin profits.

Since the drop in air travel after the Sept. 11 attacks, nearly all the established carriers have sought bankruptcy protection. US Airways has filed for bankruptcy protection twice since 2002 and has turned itself around through a merger with America West last year.

This competition among airlines has benefited some passengers. Even as the economy has rebounded and planes are as heavily booked as they have ever been, competition has kept a lid on fares on some popular routes at certain times of the year. That has sliced airlines' profit margin thinner, making mergers — and the opportunity to pare some of their high costs — an attractive proposition.

The offer for Delta changes the calculations for deals to come. It had been widely expected that Delta would find a merger partner after emerging from bankruptcy protection, not before. The airlines that it has code-sharing relationships with now, notably Northwest and Continental, were seen as the most likely partners.

US Airways estimated that a merger would save at least $1.65 billion in operating costs annually by combining facilities at some airports, eliminating flights and cutting capacity by about 10 percent.

About 50 percent of the routes served by Delta and US Airways overlap, said Daniel Kasper, an airline consultant with LECG.

Robert W. Mann, a consultant in Port Washington, N.Y., said, "If the combined companies reduce the number of flights offered in routes where they overlap, you could see higher prices for consumers."

As a result, any deal can be expected to receive scrutiny from the Justice Department and it might well result in the sale of either the US Airways or the Delta shuttle services connecting New York, Washington and Boston. A merger of the airlines could be among the first to be reviewed in Washington after the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

News of the offer drew a mixed reaction from travelers yesterday. While some welcomed the possible combination — particularly if it ensured the survival of Delta — others worried about the prospect of higher fares and still lower customer-service levels.

"They're taking two poorly performing airlines, especially from a passengers' point of view, and putting them together," said Michael J. Grossman, a lawyer from Lexington, Ky., and a Delta frequent flier. "What you're left with is the lowest common denominator."

DOJ_NMG_0095042

A regulatory inquiry would not be the only gantlet US Airways would have to run. The first is overcoming resistance from Delta. US Airways' chief executive, W. Douglas Parker, has approached Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, over the last several months about merging, but was rebuffed, according to letters that US Airways released yesterday. In late September, he tried again. Mr. Grinstein turned him down once more.

Yesterday, Mr. Grinstein said in a statement, "We received a letter from US. Airways this morning and will, of course, review it." Then he added, "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong stand-alone carrier."

Mr. Parker, a longtime proponent of consolidation, said in an interview yesterday that it was imperative that Delta engage in discussions with US Airways while it was still in bankruptcy protection. "We need to act on this before they emerge," he said.

Striking a deal with Delta before it comes out of Chapter 11 protection could have major advantages for US Airways. Mr. Parker said that half the projected $1.65 billion in merger savings could not be achieved outside bankruptcy status.

While in bankruptcy, a company can seek court permission to reject contracts, renegotiate aircraft leases or terminate labor contracts — powers that US Airways exercised during its stays in Chapter 11.

But until February, only Delta management can present a plan to take the airline out of bankruptcy.

To succeed, US Airways will have to win the support of a significant chunk of Delta's creditors, a group that may include hedge funds that acquired the debt in the secondary markets, and hope that they will put pressure on Delta's management to engage in discussions.

GE Commercial Aviation Services, which finances much of the aircraft borrowing in the global industry, could prove to be a powerful player in the discussions because it provided the equivalent of debtor-in-possession financing to Delta at the beginning of its bankruptcy.

With enough backing, "it is very possible that, with patience and fortitude, they could get somewhere," said J. Andrew Rahl, head of the bankruptcy group at the law firm of Anderson Kill & Olick. Delta's unsecured debt has recently traded at 40 cents on the dollar, US Airways noted.

In a sign that creditors welcomed the offer from US Airways, Delta's bonds surged yesterday. The price of its 2009 note rose 21.25 cents, to 61.75 cents on the dollar. Airline stocks, including shares of US Airways, also rose sharply.

If enough creditors think that they would do better in a merger than in a stand-alone reorganization, "Delta's going to have a hard time putting a plan out there," said David W. Dykhouse, a partner at Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler in New York.

Wilbur L. Ross Jr., whose investment firm has bought many distressed companies, said that when a company has been in bankruptcy protection as long as Delta, its debt "starts to move into the hands of the distressed-investment community." These investors, many of them hedge funds, are likely to promote rival offers, he said, adding, "Chances are they would be pushing for an auction."

Two of the largest holders of Delta's unsecured claims are the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation and the Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta pilots.

Members of Delta's committee of unsecured creditors either did not return calls requesting comment yesterday or declined to comment.

US Airways said it was offering $4 billion in cash, plus US Airways stock valued at $4 billion at the market close on Tuesday. That price would represent a substantial premium for Delta's creditors, who would own about 45 percent of the combined company.

Still, it remains possible that Delta's creditors' committee could end up siding with Mr. Grinstein because it could take regulators far longer to decide whether to permit a US Airways-Delta merger than for Delta to come out of bankruptcy alone, antitrust lawyers said.

Regulators are likely to look hard at the combined company's prospective dominance on routes into the Southeast; Delta maintains a hub in Atlanta and US Airways has a hub in Charlotte, N.C., antitrust experts noted.

For instance, US Airways has 19 flights today from La Guardia Airport in New York to Orlando, Fla., and Delta offers 28. From Boston to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., US Airways has 20 flights and Delta has 31.

DOJ_NMG_0095043

And the deal could face an outpouring of criticism from consumers and consumer advocacy groups. Susan Johnson, an auditor from Philadelphia and an elite-level US Airways flier, said yesterday that she was "concerned about the monopoly this will present for US Airways, and how that will affect pricing."

"Sure, prices will be low initially," she said. "But in the long run, will they increase the cost of their ticket?"

Mr. Parker, the US Airways chief, said he was confident that the proposed combination would pass muster under antitrust laws.

Analysts said a merger could result in a leaner, more efficient airline.

"Even though airline mergers tend to be messy while employees, cultures and fleet types are integrated," said Ray Neidl, an analyst with Calyon Securities, "in the long term, a merged carrier should benefit in synergies from revenue generation, the ability to cut overhead costs and the probability that marginal hubs would be closed."

Not all industry watchers are convinced that consolidation will cure the airline industry's ills.

"Airlines are notoriously risky to operate," said Allen Michel, a professor at the Boston University School of Management. "Far in excess of 100 airlines have gone into bankruptcy since airline deregulation in 1978."

Moreover, US Airways has not completed integrating last year's America West combination, "and it is questionable whether the Delta deal will pass antitrust muster," said Professor Michel said. "Adding these factors to the complexities associated with an ordinary merger increase the odds against success.''

Labor-management relations are potentially another problem. Both airlines have clashed in recent years with their unions, principally the Air Line Pilots' Association. And both have struggled to cope with low-price competitors like JetBlue and Southwest.

For fliers, the deal may mean more routes and frequency in the long term, but it could also create headaches as the companies merge their operations, schedules and frequent-flier mile programs.

In an e-mail message to members of US Airways' frequent-flier club yesterday, the carrier promised to "work hard to mitigate transition difficulties," like those that occurred after its merger with America West, when many passengers were left confused. In the same message, US Airways tried to emphasize the "enormous benefits" of a deal with Delta.

The message made no mention of US Airways' plan to cut flight capacity by 10 percent.

US Airways Presses Delta Over $8bn Offer (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways on Wednesday insisted that Delta Air Lines' management would be forced to consider its $8bn offer to create the biggest US airline by revenues, in spite of its rival's pledge to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent company.

Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive, launched his second effort in 18 months to buy a bankrupt carrier and push an enlarged US Airways into the global airline elite.

However, Delta quickly repeated its opposition to the move after rebuffing an approach this year, forcing US Airways to appeal directly to its unsecured creditors.

Mr Parker insisted that Delta's executives would be forced to hold talks as the premium offered to creditors was superior to their existing plan.

"We have put a proposal to them that would be better than anything else, certainly their own plan [and as a result] we will get management support," Mr Parker said in an interview with the Financial Times.

Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chairman and chief executive, has rebuffed approaches from US Airways and United in favour of restructuring the carrier to leave bankruptcy next year, when he plans to step down.

Mr Grinstein favours leveraging Delta's domestic strength in Atlanta and New York to expand its international services after restructuring to give it costs a quarter below rivals such as Air France-KLM and Lufthansa.

"Jerry has enormous credibility with the Delta employees, [and] labour integration is essential to the success of these things," said Michael E. Levine, distinguished research scholar at the New York University School of Law.

DOJ_NMG_0095044

US Airways' cash and stock proposal represents a 25 per cent premium over the pre-announcement value of Delta creditors' claims, which rose more than 40 per cent on Wednesday as US Airways' own stock price climbed 15 per cent to a record $58.42.

Mr Parker said there was "a unique opportunity" to combine networks viewed by analysts as complementary.

Mr Parker maintained that the rise of low-cost carriers in the US meant there would be no antitrust issues with the proposed takeover. He intends to close the deal by mid-2007 when Delta aims to emerge from the bankruptcy protection it sought in September last year. The US justice department blocked an attempt by United to acquire the old US Airways in 2000 on competition grounds, scuppering another proposed combination between American and Northwest.

"There's much less concern [now] with the DoJ about the impact on consumers," said Mr Parker.

Additional reporting by Stephanie Kirchgaessner in Washington and James Politi in New York

US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (PPG)

By Dan Fitzpatrick And Mark Belko

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 16, 2006

It offers bankrupt airline's creditors an $8 billion cash-and-stock deal

After being rebuffed twice by phone and letter, US Airways boss Doug Parker went public yesterday with his campaign to buy bankrupt Delta Air Lines, asking Delta creditors to accept an $8 billion cash-and-stock deal that would create one of the world's largest air carriers, save the combined company $1.65 billion annually and retire the US Airways brand for good.

A longtime cheerleader for industry consolidation, Mr. Parker wants the Delta deal done before the nation's No. 3 carrier emerges from bankruptcy next year, making it easier for the combined company to cut costs, give back planes to lenders, renegotiate contracts and shed unprofitable leases -- just as the twice-bankrupt US Airways did last year while merging with America West Airlines.

After that, "it will be too late," he said yesterday. "We will all regret not acting sooner."

Just how the proposed combination -- if it clears Delta's apparent opposition and regulatory hurdles that some believe will be significant -- would affect Pittsburgh wasn't clear.

Allegheny County Airport Authority Executive Director Kent George believes any cuts would be minimal, given that US Airways already has slashed local employment by more than 10,000 to just above 2,000 and daily flights by more than 400 to 158 since 2000.

US Airways executives reiterated that optimism in comments yesterday, with airline president Scott Kirby saying Pittsburgh "will continue to be an important part of our network" with or without the merger.

But some analysts questioned if a combined US Airways-Delta would be all that committed to Pittsburgh, given that Delta already has a regional jet hub in suburban Cincinnati, where costs are lower and connecting service to other markets is more extensive. "I think a deal like this would be disastrous for Pittsburgh," said local airline analyst Bill Lauer.

Mr. Parker and Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein first spoke about this subject in the spring, via phone.

At the time, US Airways described that exchange as a "courtesy call," with Mr. Parker hearing rumors about interest from other carriers and wanting Mr. Grinstein to know that he was interested, too.

He followed up with a more serious Sept. 29 letter asking for a "meaningful dialogue about entering into a transaction." Mr. Grinstein's response, on Oct. 17, was that it would "not be productive" to discuss a merger at this time.

So Mr. Parker turned up the pressure yesterday by releasing his latest missive to Mr. Grinstein and broadcasting his intent to take the merger proposal directly to Delta's creditors -- the ones who will make a final decision about the airline's reorganization plan and whether any competing bids are better. US Airways will not be able to submit its alternative plan until mid-February at the earliest.

"I believe we owe it to our respective stakeholders to pursue this opportunity vigorously," Mr. Parker wrote to Mr. Grinstein.

Atlanta-based Delta did not appear ruffled by all of yesterday's rhetoric and attention.

Mr. Grinstein, in a statement, said the airline would "of course review" Mr. Parker's letter but that "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working."

DOJ_NMG_0095045

A successful merger could spark a new round of consolidation in the industry. United Airlines-Continental Airlines and American Airlines-Northwest Airlines are some possible hook-ups that could result, according to longtime Virginia airline consultant Darryl Jenkins, who believes Mr. Parker dreamed up this combination two to three years ago, before the America West-US Airways deal happened.

Several hurdles stand in the way of Mr. Parker's plan.

US Airways, now based in Tempe, Ariz., still needs to officially complete its merger with America West, with several labor contracts covering pilots, flight attendants and mechanics still not signed. US Airways machinists and pilots unions issued statements yesterday warning that the current labor negotiations need to be settled before any talks with Delta can begin.

"Management's grandiose plans cannot take off without the pilots on board," said US Airways pilots chairman Jack Stephan.

The deal also is sure to face intense antitrust scrutiny in Washington, D.C., similar to the concern that killed a proposed US Airways-United merger in 2000. US Airways and Delta do overlap in some key markets up and down the East Coast, and the combined company would be the largest carrier at 155 airports.

It would have two big hubs in the Southeast (Charlotte, N.C., and Atlanta), two in the West (Phoenix and Salt Lake City) and two in the Northeast (New York and Philadelphia), along with strongholds in the same geographic areas (Boston, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati).

Some analysts believe hubs will have to be cut, with Charlotte looking most vulnerable sitting so close to Atlanta, Delta's biggest hub. "It is not a clean situation," said Bill Warlick, an airline analyst with Fitch Ratings in Chicago.

But US Airways is convinced this can work. It intends to sell one of the airlines' two East Coast shuttle operations connecting New York, Washington and Boston to mitigate antitrust concerns. Also, it says industry conditions are considerably different than six years ago, when the U.S. Department of Justice nixed the United merger.

Following the 9/11 attacks, a slew of big carriers filed for bankruptcy and racked up more than $40 billion in losses while lower-cost competitors such as Southwest Airlines and JetBlue Airways encroached on new territory, such as Pittsburgh.

The blueprint for the Delta takeover attempt comes straight from America West's successful acquisition of US Airways last year.

America West stepped in at the 11th hour and took the novel step of purchasing US Airways in Chapter 11. Under court protection, US Airways slashed employee pay and benefits, canceled pensions, tore up leases and slashed costs.

When it emerged, the combined airlines flew under the better-known US Airways banner.

US Airways said Citigroup has committed $7.2 billion in financing for the deal.

No city has suffered more as a result of the industry's woes than Pittsburgh.

But US Airways maintained that no job losses would result from a merger and that the Pittsburgh area would keep flights and facilities, such as the maintenance hangars near Pittsburgh International Airport. How much of each it would keep is still unknown -- US Airways also made it clear that flights would have to be cut across the system to lower costs. "It is too early to say" what airports would lose out, Mr. Kirby said.

Mr. George, the airport authority executive director, agreed, adding that he does not believe a Delta-US Airways merger would have an enormous impact on service in Pittsburgh in part because US Airways already has eliminated most of its connecting service, retaining flights that only serve the local market.

Although Delta and US Airways compete on service to Atlanta, a merger would not necessarily diminish that because AirTran Airways also serves the market, he said. The same is true of New York, where Delta and US Airways compete for local traffic. With the entrance of Jet Blue into the market, there still will be competition.

In markets where there would not be competition, he was confident that other airlines would step in to offer an alternative, he said. And he doesn't see Pittsburgh losing flights to Cincinnati, saying that Cincinnati has even less of a local traffic base than Pittsburgh does.

One thing that is all but certain, he said, is that US Airway's move will delay a decision by two to three months on where to put a new $25 million flight operations center.

DOJ_NMG_0095046

Pittsburgh, Phoenix and Charlotte are competing for the center, which would replace facilities US Airways has in Pittsburgh and Phoenix. Before yesterday's bid, US Airways was planning to decide on a new location by February.

"If the merger appears that it's going through, the overall plan in how to do an overall operations and control center must be rethought because now you're doing it for a much larger airline," Mr. George said.

(Dan Fitzpatrick can be reached at dfitzpatrick@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1752. Mark Belko can be reached at mbelko@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1262. Cox News Service contributed to this report.)

US Airways Announces Takeover Bid For Delta (LAT)

By Peter Pae

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group today said it was making an $8-billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines to create one of the world's largest carriers after attempted merger talks with the nation's third-largest airline failed this summer.

US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest carrier in terms of passenger traffic, said it is appealing directly to Delta Air's creditors to buy the larger airline, which is undergoing reorganization in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

"We believe that the combination of US Airways and Delta is extremely compelling and will create significant value for each of our stakeholders," US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker said in a statement.

While US Airways has little presence in Southern California, Delta is the fourth-largest airline operating out of Los Angeles International Airport and the second-largest at Ontario Airport.

If approved — and there are several hurdles to overcome, including federal regulatory approvals — the merger could set off a wave of consolidation in the domestic airline industry, analysts said.

The takeover bid is a fallout of overcapacity in the airline industry that has financially hurt the larger airlines, analysts said. According to the Airline Transport Assn., U.S. commercial airlines have lost $35 billion since 2001, though the industry is recovering and may turn a profit this year.

"The world doesn't need six of these old established legacy carriers," said Ed Greenslet, publisher of the Airline Monitor. "Those six at one time had 90% of the domestic traffic in this country. Now they have half of it. The pie for those carriers is getting smaller because of the low-cost carrier like Southwest and Jet Blue."

For its part, Delta said in a statement that it intends to emerge from Bankruptcy Court protection as a stand-alone carrier.

"We received a letter from US Airways this morning and will of course review it," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said in a statement.

But he added: "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier."

US Airways, which is merging with America West Airlines, said it was appealing to creditors because it was rebuffed in an initial attempt to talk to Delta's management.

"We thought about this opportunity for quite a while," US Airways' Parker said in a videoconference with the airline's employees today. "They responded back that they didn't think it was a good idea."

Parker said a merger of the two airlines could provide a projected $1.65 billion in annual cost savings for the combined companies. He added that the bid was being made now because the projected cost savings could be shaved by half if it waited for Delta to emerge from bankruptcy.

Under the terms of the offer, Delta creditors would receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million US Airway shares, valued at about $4 billion based on Tuesday's closing stock price.

US Airways said it has obtained $7.2 billion in committed financing from Citigroup.

peter.pae@latimes.com

US Airways Proposes $8.7 Billion Delta Air Takeover (Update15) (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095047

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- US Airways Group Inc. made an unsolicited $8.67 billion offer for bankrupt Delta Air Lines Inc. that would create the world's largest carrier.

Delta's creditors would get $4 billion in cash and $4.67 billion in stock of US Airways, formed 14 months ago as it exited bankruptcy through a merger with America West Holdings Corp. Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein agreed today to review the offer even as he reaffirmed his aim to keep Delta independent.

The bid sparked a rally in airline shares, sending the Bloomberg U.S. Airlines Index up the most since May 2003 on speculation that more consolidation will follow. US Airways CEO Doug Parker has championed the idea of mergers.

``We believe this bid may prompt other bids for Delta and possibly set an industry trend for consolidation," Ray Neidl, a Calyon Securities analyst in New York, said in a report. ``However, Delta management remains hostile at this point to any merger, which could cause delays."

Grinstein told employees in a letter Delta wants to remain independent when it emerges from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007, not a ``merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline."

`We Remain Skeptical'

``While Delta is obligated to review this proposal carefully, we remain skeptical that it would make sense to deviate from our plan," he said in the letter.

Like Delta, Northwest Airlines Corp. also wants to exit Chapter 11 next year, and the two carriers' plans are helping fuel the industry's merger speculation. U.S. airlines this year may post their first collective profit since 2000, after more than $40 billion in losses from 2001 through 2005.

Shares of US Airways jumped $8.57, or 17 percent, to $59.50 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, leading a surge by carriers including Continental Airlines Inc. and AirTran Holdings Inc. About 13.8 million US Airways shares changed hands, the most ever for the airline.

Delta's 7.9 percent notes maturing in 2009 rose 21.25 cents to 61.75 cents on the dollar, according to Trace, the bond price reporting system of the NASD. The yield fell to 26.67 percent.

Citigroup Inc. has committed $7.2 billion in financing for the proposed merger, US Airways said. Delta's unsecured creditors would own 45 percent of the combined company. The stock portion of the offer is for 78.5 million shares, so the value of that part of the transaction will change daily.

Biggest Carrier

A combined US Airways-Delta would retain Delta's name and vault past AMR Corp.'s American Airlines to become the world's largest carrier, as measured by miles flown by paying passengers. By that standard, Delta is the third-largest U.S. airline and US Airways is the seventh-biggest.

US Airways and Atlanta-based Delta both have U.S. East Coast networks, while Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways also has a West Coast presence. Delta has added more than 70 new international routes since 2005 under a plan to almost double overseas flying to 35 percent of the carrier's total.

The combined airline would be the largest in terms of passengers carried in the northeastern and southeastern U.S. and Florida, and second-biggest in the Southwest, US Airways said.

A merged US Airways-Delta also would have more than 18 percent of the U.S. industry's capacity, US Airways said. Any merger agreement must be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, US Airways shareholders and the court overseeing Delta's bankruptcy.

`Very Sensible'

``This would be a very sensible move, but fiendishly complicated," said Richard Aboulafia, vice president of Teal Group, a Fairfax, Virginia-based consultant. ``Complicated by issues of seniority, culture, fleet, route networks -- and that's just scratching the surface."

Delta has major airport operations in Atlanta, Cincinnati, Salt Lake City and New York. US Airways has hubs in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Charlotte, North Carolina.

Both carriers run shuttle services in the U.S. northeast, and US Airways' plan calls for selling one of them, Parker said. The company hasn't decided which.

DOJ_NMG_0095048

The US Airways shuttle has 14 daily flights between Boston and New York's LaGuardia airport and 15 between LaGuardia and Washington's Ronald Reagan airport. Delta operates 16 daily weekday flights between Boston and New York, and 15 between New York and Washington.

``We can put the two networks together and optimize them," Parker, 45, said in an interview. ``As we do that, we can actually fly to 100 percent of the cities we serve today with two networks, with 10 percent fewer airplanes. That's a lot of savings.''

Annual Savings

US Airways estimated the annual savings for the two companies at $1.65 billion over two years. US Airways hasn't decided where a combined carrier would be based.

US Airways said it wouldn't have to shed jobs, relying instead on attrition and employee leaves to thin the workforce as the combined airline pares capacity by 10 percent. Delta has 47,000 employees and 469 planes in its main jet operations, compared with 35,425 workers and 357 planes at US Airways.

Pay for the employees would be based on the higher of existing labor costs between the two carriers, Parker said, at an incremental expense of about $90 million.

The pay plan ``is a big positive for employees," US Airways President J. Scott Kirby said in an interview. ``Our employees also would have the advantage of working for a larger, even more financially sound airline. We hope that will get negotiations on a fast track with each group."

Grinstein, 74, responded to US Airways' initial merger offer in an Oct. 17 letter, telling Parker ``it would not be productive." US Airways disclosed the letter in a filing today.

Delta's Strategy

Since filing for Chapter 11 in September 2005, Delta has cut unprofitable flights, reduced labor costs in part by eliminating 9,000 jobs and shed aircraft.

Parker said the merger must be done before Delta leaves Chapter 11, or at least half of the savings would be lost. The offer is ``absolutely" conditioned on completion in bankruptcy, he said.

By law, Delta has the exclusive right through Feb. 15 to file a plan to exit bankruptcy. By going public with its offer, US Airways hopes to convince Delta creditors that a merger is a better option, said William Rochelle, a partner at Fulbright & Jaworski LLP in New York who represents some creditors.

Creditors

``US Airways is not going to get to first base unless they can generate some significant degree of creditor support for the offer," Rochelle said in an interview. ``By simply making the offer public, Parker has thrown a ball up in the air. He'll see which team catches it -- the Delta team or the creditor team."

Rochelle doesn't expect to see a battle in bankruptcy court over Delta, although there will be ``hard bargaining" over any agreement that may be reached.

Parker said the combined airline would be ``a more effective and profitable competitor in the current fragmented marketplace." US Airways' offer is a 25 percent premium over the Nov. 14 trading price of Delta's pre-petition unsecured claims and a 40 percent premium over the average trading price for unsecured claims over the past 30 days, US Airways said.

If approved, the merger would be the largest in the airline industry, ahead of American's acquisition of Trans World Airlines Inc. for $2.8 billion in cash and assumed debt in 2001.

Parker said the merger with Delta would be completed in the first half of 2007 and eventually would boost US Airways' earnings per share by 40 percent.

US Airways still is completing its 2005 merger with America West. The airlines haven't fully integrated their labor groups or their computerized reservation systems and are still flying under separate operating certificates.

Operations Questions

``While this may look good on paper, the fact is Parker has yet to demonstrate for us he's capable of putting two airlines together, much less three," said Jack Stephan, chairman of US Airways' Air Line Pilots Association. ``He needs to address operational and labor issues going on in his own backyard first before he can tackle anything else."

DOJ_NMG_0095049

US Airways and America West pilots plan picketing tomorrow in Phoenix and Charlotte to protest lack of an integrated contract for pilots. A spokesman for Delta pilots didn't immediately return a call for comment.

The Machinists union also wants any merger efforts to wait until after US Airways finishes contract talks. The Association of Flight Attendants-CWA didn't immediately return a call for comment.

Airlines' History

The US Airways-America West combination followed two bankruptcy filings by US Airways and a previous trip through Chapter 11 for America West. In the merger, the airline's headquarters was moved to Tempe from Arlington, Virginia, and America West executives, including Parker, kept the top management jobs.

Maintaining the Delta name for a merged carrier would extend a brand that dates to 1928, when an investment group purchased a 4-year-old crop-dusting company and renamed it Delta Air Service after the Mississippi Delta region where it operated. The company began flying passengers the next year.

United, the world's second-largest carrier, in September hired Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to explore possible transactions, including mergers. United CEO Glenn Tilton has called for industry consolidation since February 2005.

US Air Faces Long Road In Delta Bid (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, November 16, 2006

US Airways' brash $8 billion bid to buy Delta Air Lines won a warm reception Wednesday on Wall Street, but the proposed deal has a long way to go to get done.

US Airways' bid, immediately rebuffed by Delta management, would make the combined airline the USA's top carrier by domestic flying capacity, eclipsing American Airlines. By US Airways' own calculations, the combined carrier would be the biggest airline in the Northeast and the Southeast, the biggest carrier across the Atlantic, and the second-biggest airline in the Caribbean.

US Airways shares closed up nearly 17%, at $59.50, on strong buy recommendations from analysts. The company offered $4 billion in cash and about $4.6 billion worth of US Airways stock, which would give tens of thousands of unsecured creditors at Delta a 25% premium over the value of their claims as of Tuesday: 40 cents on the dollar. Delta filed Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in 2005.

“The proposal we've made is extremely compelling,” US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Wednesday. But it faces several hurdles; some certain, some not.

The takeover bid would require the approval of Delta's bankruptcy judge, US Airways' shareholders, Delta's creditors and the U.S. government. And it might not be the only offer for Delta, a potentially attractive target as the USA's third-biggest carrier. Some of the hurdles:

•Delta management. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein reiterated Wednesday his long-held position that he wants the carrier to exit bankruptcy next year as an independent airline. In its bankruptcy case, Delta has the exclusive legal right until Feb. 15 to present the court a plan of reorganization. Unless the judge terminates that right, a competing plan from Delta's creditors or an outside party can't be considered.

•Antitrust. A merger between two such big carriers needs Justice Department approval. The agency would have to determine whether the deal would help or hurt consumers in terms of fares and flight options. Antitrust considerations are particularly strong along the East Coast, where the route networks of both Delta and US Airways are heavily concentrated.

•A competing bid. Another carrier or investor group could make a competing offer for Delta, leading to a bidding war. That would force US Airways to sweeten its offer or drop out of the bidding.

United Airlines CEO Glenn Tilton, for one, has made no secret of his interest in a merger. Tilton believes that the U.S. airline industry has too many players and should consolidate. United itself emerged from bankruptcy earlier this year.

United Airlines spokeswoman Jean Medina said Wednesday the Chicago-based airline has “been consistent in our position on consolidation in the airline industry, and nothing has changed.” She would not comment on the possibility of a competing offer for Delta.

DOJ_NMG_0095050

• Labor. US Airways is itself the product of a recent merger between Phoenix-based America West and Virginia-based US Airways (story, above). The two carriers' labor unions and operations have not yet been fully merged. Labor tensions and operational glitches remain. A new merger could throw US Airways and Delta into a period of transition again.

"This would have to jump through many hoops," said Chicago-based bankruptcy lawyer Fruman Jacobson, who represented the unsecured creditors of United Airlines during its bankruptcy case. "It could run into some serious antitrust problems." At the same time, he said, Delta's board of directors "has an obligation to review all qualified offers. Looking at just the raw numbers, this has to be taken seriously, especially the $4 billion in cash."

Typically, unsecured creditors in a bankruptcy case receive only stock in the reorganized company as payment for claims, not cash.

New York-based lawyer Daniel Golden, who represents Delta's unsecured creditors committee, said the group was scheduled to begin discussing the offer Wednesday during a regularly scheduled meeting. The committee represents creditors such as bondholders, suppliers and vendors, whose claims are not secured by tangible assets such as aircraft.

Delta CEO Grinstein said in a statement that the company will review the offer. But he reiterated Delta's wish to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a "strong, stand-alone carrier."

The proposal was not a complete surprise. Parker, the US Airways CEO, first approached Grinstein last spring with the idea of merging. In September, Parker sent a formal letter proposing such a deal.

Grinstein politely rebuffed both invitations.

US Airways' bid quickly sparked speculation about more merger activity in the domestic airline industry, which only recently began pulling out of a deep, five-year financial slump.

In addition to speculation about expansion-minded United, the Delta deal focused attention on a possible bid for Northwest Airlines, also operating in Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities said Wednesday the US Airways bid could be the first of many merger proposals.

"We believe that this bid may prompt other bids for Delta and possibly set an industry trend for consolidation," Neidl said.

To finance the offer, US Airways said it has lined up $7.2 billion in financing from Citigroup to provide the $4 billion in cash, refinance Delta's bankruptcy loan, and refinance an existing loan from GE Capital to US Airways.

But Parker said the deal makes sense only if it is sealed before Delta exits bankruptcy. While under the protection of bankruptcy court, Delta has the legal right to reject or renegotiate leases for aircraft and other assets, a powerful cost-cutting tool. US Airways estimates that by combining fleets, networks and facilities, and by eliminating redundancies, the combined airline could achieve $1.65 billion in annual cost savings.

Parker is not proposing the merged carrier close hub airports, exit cities or shed significant flying capacity. On the contrary, he said the proposed new carrier would serve the same cities the two carriers do now, including every major market along the East Coast: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Charlotte, Atlanta and Florida's largest cities. US Airways' home base of Phoenix and Delta's Salt Lake City hub are also relatively close.

The merged carrier would reduce its combined overall flying capacity by 10%, he said.

The biggest concession Parker proposed is selling one of the two hourly shuttle services serving high-paying business travelers in the Boston-New York-Washington corridor. Delta operates one shuttle, US Airways another. Eliminating one would remove a potential objection by the Justice Department.

Parker played down concerns that the deal might be viewed as anti-competitive. "Our management has a record of consumer-friendly pricing," he said. "Consumers on the East Coast would have a stronger airline with the ability to lower fares."

Justice has approved two airline mergers in recent years involving carriers in bankruptcy court: American's takeover of TWA in 2001, when TWA was in its third bankruptcy and in danger of disappearing; and America West's merger with US Airways last year when the latter was in Chapter 11.

The old US Airways was concentrated along the East Coast, while America West was concentrated in the West, with relatively little overlap.

But Justice blocked a proposed merger of United and US Airways in 2001, saying the merged carrier would have too much overlap on the East Coast and would hinder competition.

DOJ_NMG_0095051

Hewitt Pate, former Justice Department antitrust chief and now a partner at Hunton & Williams, said the department traditionally looks at airline mergers in terms of combined market share on routes they serve.

Historically, he said, Justice has been friendly to mergers that combined route systems with little overlap. It has been "skeptical of deals with a high degree of overlap where the two companies serve a lot of the same city pairs," he said.

Business professor Severin Borenstein of the University of California at Berkeley said the two carriers' nearby hubs in Atlanta and Charlotte, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh, and Salt Lake City and Phoenix could pose potential antitrust problems.

Both carriers also have a significant presence in Boston Logan, New York LaGuardia and Washington Reagan. US Airways has the largest presence in Philadelphia and Charlotte, while Delta dominates Atlanta.

"There's a fair amount of overlap in their route structures, particularly in the Southeast, and I would think that would be a problem for Washington," Borenstein said.

Borenstein noted that the USA's airline landscape has changed dramatically in the last six years. Low-cost carriers including Southwest, AirTran, Jet Blue, Frontier and Spirit now control about 25% of the domestic market.

US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. proposed an $8 billion takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines Inc. yesterday, although Delta says it has no interest in the offer.

The proposed entity, which would operate with the Delta name, would be the leading trans-Atlantic carrier.

The proposal is the latest move by US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker, who orchestrated the 2005 takeover of the bankrupt airline by America West Airlines and has pushed for consolidation in the industry.

"Consumers will have the advantages of a larger, full-service airline with the cost structure of a low-fare carrier," Mr. Parker said.

With two major U.S. carriers -- Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. -- operating in bankruptcy, industry watchers have been expecting a wave of consolidation and said a US Airways-Delta deal could jump-start the process.

Under the proposal, the combined airline would serve as many cities as US Airways currently does but with 10 percent fewer flights because some duplicate routes would be eliminated.

The merged company also would sell one of its shuttle operations that operate in the Northeast, mostly between Washington, New York and Boston, to eliminate the overlapping routes and to alleviate antitrust concerns.

But Delta's management has said it is committed to leaving Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in the first half of 2007 as a stand-alone carrier.

"We received a letter from US Airways [yesterday] morning and will of course review it," said Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein. But "our plan is working, and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective."

The bankruptcy court has given the Atlanta carrier until Feb. 15 to file a reorganization plan.

"We will continue to move aggressively towards that goal," Mr. Grinstein said.

Delta rebuffed merger talks with the Tempe, Ariz., company earlier in the fall.

A merger between US Airways and Delta, which has been operating in bankruptcy since September 2005, would give Delta creditors significantly greater value than under any stand-alone plan, Mr. Parker said.

Delta's creditors would get $4 billion in cash and $4.67 billion in stock of US Airways.

"We just believe this is a better plan, and we want to get it on the table to the creditors," Mr. Parker said. "We believe once they understand this alternative plan, they'll prefer it."

US Airways' largest shareholder, PAR Capital Management, backs the offer.

"We enthusiastically support this transaction, which we believe offers the opportunity to build upon US Airways' current competitive position," said Paul Reeder, president of PAR Capital Management. "We have confidence in the US Airways management team ... and the potential upside for US Airways shareholders."

US Airways has obtained $7.2 billion in committed financing for the deal from Citigroup.

DOJ_NMG_0095052

Domestic mergers are subject to U.S. antitrust laws and must be approved by the Department of Justice. The merger, if it were to go through, also would have to be approved by the Department of Transportation, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission, as well as the European Union.

Justice officials declined to comment on the proposal.

But some industry watchers doubt the Justice Department would approve the proposal.

"In some markets, they would create a monopoly position," said Mike Boyd, a Colorado airline analyst. "This stuff [from Mr. Parker] about, 'Well, we all know we need consolidation.' Really? Mr. Grinstein doesn't think so. The chairman of Continental doesn't think so; the chairman of Northwest doesn't think so."

Ray Neidl, an equity analyst for the airline industry, agreed that the merger proposal wouldn't be an easy sell to the Justice Department, saying the offer has a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of rejection.

A reduction in competition also would be bad for consumers, Mr. Boyd said.

"This is a bad deal," he said. "Consumers lose big time. Whenever you lose a top competitor, consumers lose."

A merger of US Airways and Delta would create a cumbersome system with eight hubs -- far too many to be cost-effective, said analyst Anthony Tangorra, chief executive of Latitude Transport Advisory.

"There are other networks available out there that would be a better fit for [US Airways] and Delta," he said.

Although Delta's management is giving the proposal a cool reception, the airline could be forced into a merger if its leading investors push the matter.

"This appears to be sort of like a hostile takeover," said CreditSights analyst Roger King. "Grinstein has made it clear that he doesn't want to merge. But US Airways is appealing directly to the creditors."

US Airways shares jumped 17 percent to $59.50 on the New York Stock Exchange after the announcement.

Delta added 5 cents to $1.52 in over-the-counter trading.

Mr. Neidl cautioned that the market's favorable reaction to the proposal will be tempered in the near future.

"Investing around potential mergers is tricky at best," he said.

US Airways Proposes To Merge With Delta (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker, rebuffed in an approach earlier this summer for merger talks with Delta Air Lines executives, is going around management and directly to the company's creditors with an $8 billion offer to buy the larger airline when it exits bankruptcy-court protection.

US Airways promised creditors "a significant premium" by offering $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, according to a securities filing by Delta.

US Airways chairman and CEO Douglas Parker5 says that he can't wait anymore to try and advance a merger with Delta, and that the company would likely sell its own Air Shuttle service, keeping Delta's instead.

Mr. Parker, in a conference call with Wall Street analysts, said he was making his move now because half of the projected $1.65 billion in annual cost savings that could be achieved by combining the two carriers would disappear if Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways waits until after Delta exits bankruptcy.

While antitrust concerns would be among several hurdles to the combination, Mr. Parker said he didn't think there were any issues that couldn't be resolved. He suggested that either of US Airways' and Delta's competing Northeastern U.S. "shuttles," which connect Boston, New York and Washington, DC, could be put up for sale in order to satisfy antitrust problems. The merger last year of US Airways and America West, Mr. Parker said, shows that mergers "can be good for investors and consumers."

US Airways said frequent-flyer customers at the two carriers would have their current mileage balances combined as part of a Delta takeover. But the airlines participate in different global marketing alliances, so US Airways would have to narrow that to a single partnership.

DOJ_NMG_0095053

Mr. Parker has been buoyed by a high-flying stock price since the company's merger with America West Airlines. The Wall Street Journal reported that he telephoned Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein earlier this summer to gauge his interest in a possible merger. (See article6.)

Mr. Grinstein told Mr. Parker that Delta wasn't interested in starting merger talks, because the Atlanta-based airline plans to exit bankruptcy-court protection next spring as a stand-alone carrier.

Mr. Grinstein echoed that sentiment in a statement Wednesday. "We received a letter from U.S. Airways this morning and will of course review it," Mr. Grinstein said. However, "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective."

The overture by Mr. Parker, an outspoken proponent of consolidation as part of the cure for the airline industry's financial ills, is the strongest signal yet to surface that a long-predicted consolidation among U.S. airlines could finally begin.

Airline mergers are notoriously fraught with troubles, in the past running into obstacles such as unionized-labor opposition and antitrust concerns. Mr. Grinstein has expressed doubt that a Delta-US Airways merger would pass antitrust muster because Delta's Atlanta hub competes for passengers with US Airways' Charlotte hub, a person familiar with this thinking said.

Nonetheless, US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest carrier by traffic, Mr. Parker has repeated his contention that with Delta and Northwest Airlines both operating under bankruptcy-court protection, the time is ripe for an airline merger and that he would be interested in either carrier. Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier by traffic, and Northwest, Eagan, Minn., the fourth-largest, filed for bankruptcy protection minutes apart last September, fueling speculation that the carriers could make likely merger candidates. Airlines in bankruptcy court make attractive merger targets because under court protection, carriers have greater leeway to restructure aircraft fleets and reject existing contracts with employee groups and vendors.

Though Mr. Parker has been the most vocal about his interest in consolidating with an airline in bankruptcy protection, other airline executives are ruminating about the possibility. Top executives, bankers and potential investors are feeding the rumor mill about possible combinations, partly because many in the industry say the U.S. airline industry's current financial recovery would benefit if there were fewer big carriers.

Glenn Tilton, UAL Corp.'s chief executive, is among several top airline executives who have said six U.S. network airlines are probably too many and have urged full deregulation so U.S. carriers can compete with foreign airlines that already are beginning to combine.

UAL, which spent 38 months in bankruptcy-court protection before emerging on Feb. 1, "entertained transaction discussions" with both Delta and Continental Airlines about 18 months ago, according to two people familiar with the matter. But the talks were extremely preliminary and didn't go anywhere.

That investors thus far have done well on the US Airways-America West combination is helping to fan the merger talk. However, there are fears that while the US Airways-America West merger occurred as airlines were on an upswing, the next combination may well miss what may be the peak in the industry's cycle. Also, before its merger with America West, US Airways was in danger of liquidating and thus needed the deal to save itself. Northwest and Delta aren't in that situation.

Meanwhile, the integration at US Airways is by no means complete. Unionized-labor groups from both airlines must still be combined, and several new contracts must be negotiated. Reassigning seniority rankings of merged labor groups could cause tension between employees and management.

Following the initial conversation between Messrs. Parker and Grinstein about a possible deal, Mr. Parker sent the Delta CEO a letter on Sept. 29 pressing Mr. Grinstein to meet for further talks, according to a letter Mr. Parker sent today to Mr. Grinstein. According to the letter, which US Airways released as part of its unsolicited takeover offer, Mr. Grinstein "declined to meet or even enter into discussions."

Betsy Talton, a Delta spokeswoman, said the airline is focused on emerging from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier.

The combined carrier would be holding the leading market share in 155 U.S. airports, have the most flights across the Atlantic Ocean of any U.S. carrier and rank No. 2 in flights to and from the Caribbean region. US Airways insisted it wouldn't have to exit any U.S. markets in order to achieve cost savings of at least $1.65 billion a year following a takeover of Delta. US Airways said it would eliminate about 10% of the combined airlines' capacity.

DOJ_NMG_0095054

US Airways said it thinks that any antitrust issues "can be resolved," though the airline offered no immediate details on what it might do to ease anticompetitive concerns. Since the merger with America West, US Airways says it has lowered leisure fares in nearly 350 markets by an average of 24%.

The proposal would face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which has rejected several big airline deals in recent years. But enforcers have historically allowed most acquisitions of bankrupt companies to proceed. And there has been a broad easing of merger enforcement under the Bush administration, which has approved many deals that might have been challenged in the past.

Even if the merger is allowed to proceed, antitrust enforcers are likely to conduct a market-by-market analysis and could force the sale of some city pairs served solely by Delta and US Airways.

A merger might also draw congressional scrutiny, where Democrats will control transportation and antitrust committees that may seek to weigh in on the deal. "Some mergers will face a tougher political gauntlet than in the past," says Scott Cleland, of Precursor LLC, a Washington consultant. Democrats often are more willing to seek changes in a merger to ease competition concerns, he says. But it is unlikely that the deal will be derailed.

--John R. Wilke in Washington contributed to this article.

Federal Watchdogs Likely To Approve Deal (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 16, 2006

Washington — If US Airways Group can persuade investors and creditors to accept its unsolicited $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., federal regulators likely will approve the deal as well, analysts said Wednesday.

"I don't believe there will be any antitrust problems," said John Pincavage, a longtime airline adviser with Pincavage & Associates.

US Airways spokeswoman Valerie Wunder said the airline will work with regulatory agencies to free up whatever routes, airport slots and gates might be necessary to eliminate monopoly concerns. "We are confident any antitrust issue can be resolved," she said.

Pincavage noted that US Airways has specifically said that the combined company would sell off one of its two lucrative shuttle services linking Boston, New York and Washington to avoid gaining a monopoly in that market.

US Airways also competes with Delta up and down the Eastern Seaboard. And each has a hub in the Southeast, with Delta concentrated at Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport and US Airways at Charlotte Douglas International Airport.

To avoid antitrust problems, the Justice Department likely would want the combined carrier to scale back operations at those hubs to make room for competitors. It also might insist on reductions in operations at Delta's hub in Salt Lake City, which is relatively close to US Airways' hubs in Phoenix and Las Vegas.

But Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said it is too soon say exactly which concessions would be required to win approval.

If the proposed takeover were to move forward, "we would be interested in taking a look at it," she said. Divestiture decisions then "would have to be made on a case-by-case basis," she said.

Administration's 'laissez-faire policy'

Philip Baggaley, senior airline credit analyst with Standard & Poor's, said that "it's more likely than not that the Justice Department will approve" the just-proposed transaction as well, because "the Bush administration has certainly espoused a laissez-faire policy."

Merger opponents may want to look to Congress for help in pressuring Justice officials to stop the combination, especially since the new Congress will be controlled by Democrats, who typically are more skeptical of airline mergers.

For example, during the Clinton era, the Justice Department rejected both Northwest Airlines' attempt to buy Continental Airlines and United Airlines' bid to buy US Airways.

DOJ_NMG_0095055

But this particular takeover might enjoy a warmer reception from Democrats. If unionized US Airways takes over largely nonunionized Delta, tens of thousands of Delta workers could end up paying union dues, an outcome that would please Democrats.

Also, the airline industry has struggled in recent years with overcapacity, which has reduced concerns about inadequate competition.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) agreed that "congressional hearings aren't on the horizon," but said he would use whatever political pressure he could muster to scuttle the deal if Delta continues to oppose it.

His allies in such a fight would be legislators from states that stand to lose service in a merger, such as North Carolina or Ohio, where Delta has a hub in Cincinnati.

"Delta deserves the right to emerge from bankruptcy" and set its own course, Isakson said. "Their home is in Atlanta, and I want to be sure it remains in Atlanta."

Hostile Approach Set To Face Tough Antitrust Probe (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways' hostile bid for Delta will face a tough antitrust review by the Department of Justice, according to Washington experts who say authorities are likely to take into account the companies' concentration of routes along the east coast.

US Air is likely to approach an antitrust probe with an arsenal of arguments to support the proposed deal.

These include the changing dynamics of the troubled airline industry, the fact that it is willing to divest one of the companies' north-east shuttles and that the emergence of cheaper airlines has given passengers more options.

The airline may also highlight proposed synergies of $1.65bn a year - an argument that has resonated in the past with Thomas Barnett, the head of the antitrust division.

But one Washington source with knowledge about such investigations said the division has historically not always been swayed by divestiture offers from airlines, because they may not create enough competition in the marketplace.

Although the justice department would not make an antitrust ruling based on Delta's willingness to be taken over, an unwilling merger partner could offer ammunition to build a case against the deal.

Although the Bush administration has largely been seen as taking a hands-off approach to antitrust reviews, one notable exception was the antitrust division's 2001 rejection of the proposed US Air-United merger.

In a July interview with the Financial Times, Mr Barnett said he did not believe that the justice department needed to rethink its approach to airline mergers, but that it was worth considering whether the underlying "facts" of the industry had changed "so that applying [antitrust] principles might lead to a different result" in some cases.

"Certainly we take into account issues such as the competitive health or viability of an individual company or competitor, whether there are efficiencies that can be gained, whether the regulatory environment is changing to create new sources of competition [and] whether they have better access to consumers than before," he said.

Mr Barnett also noted, however, that some factors - including some city pair routes where airlines have a high market share - "cut in another direction".

US Airways' $8 Billion Bid For Delta May Unleash New Consolidation (FWJD)

By Harry R. Weber

The Fort Wayne Journal Gazette, November 16, 2006

US Airways made a hostile $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines on Wednesday, ignoring Delta's repeated statements that it isn't interested in a merger. The move could start a stampede of competing bids in a long-predicted industry consolidation.

Analysts said United Airlines' parent company may make its own move to acquire Delta, and takeover bids for Northwest Airlines, which like Delta is being reorganized in bankruptcy court, can't be ruled out.

They also questioned whether US Airways could complete its plan to create the country's largest carrier, even after a planned 10 percent cut in capacity, on the compacted timeline it is seeking.

DOJ_NMG_0095056

"My main question mark is if the politicians and regulators would allow it to happen, because if it did it would probably set off a trend for industry consolidation," Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities in New York, said of a Delta-US Airways combination.

It also could lead to higher ticket prices for passengers, industry experts said.

"With a capacity reduction of 10 percent, fares are going nowhere but up," said Robert W. Mann, a Port Washington, N.Y.-based airline consultant.

Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who is set to become chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he is concerned the combination would reduce competition and increase costs for travelers.

"If the Justice Department on its own does not initiate an antitrust review, I would ask them to do that," he said.

Delta said its goal remains to be a stand-alone company when it emerges from bankruptcy and that it had the backing of its creditors committee when it declined earlier discussions with US Airways.

It has yet to file its own plan of reorganization, but has the exclusive right to do so until Feb. 15.

If the deal is completed, the combined airline would operate under the Delta name and serve more than 350 destinations across five continents.

The combined company would divest certain assets, including one of the two hourly shuttle services that Delta and US Airways operate among Boston, New York and Washington. US Airways has not decided where the combined company would be based.

The US Airways offer comes as it and America West are still integrating their operations after their combination last year. To date, only 57 percent of America West planes have been painted over with US Airways' logos, a spokesman said.

The deal also comes with a host of labor-related complications, according to aviation consultant Mann.

"There will be a huge seniority integration problem that will result. It's already problematic after the US Airways-America West merger. This will only increase it fourfold," he said.

As it stands now, Delta's existing common shares are likely to end up worthless when it exits bankruptcy. In most bankruptcy cases, debtholders end up with new shares of the company.

That's where the US Airways offer comes in: It is proposing to pay Delta's unsecured creditors $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock after Delta emerges from bankruptcy.

Shares of US Airways Group Inc. rose $8.57, or 16.83 percent, to $59.50 Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta Air Lines Inc. shares are traded over the counter.

Doug Parker, chief executive of Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways, said in an interview he believes Delta's creditors ultimately will see that his offer is fair.

"The (bankruptcy) process is designed so that the creditors get the highest possible value for their clients," he said.

Parker said he would anticipate flying with 10 percent fewer planes, but "the plan is not predicated on any job cuts" for the 85,000 employees at the two companies.

The combination would create a company with about $28 billion in annual revenue, leapfrogging it past the current No. 1 U.S. carrier, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines.

The projection is based on revenue figures through the first nine months of 2006. It's unclear how any divestitures would affect a combined Delta-US Airways' revenue.

Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said last month he had received "feelers" from UAL Corp.'s United Airlines about a possible merger 18 months ago, but quickly rejected them. And he said in a statement Wednesday that "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, standalone carrier."

In a memo later to employees, Grinstein was more firm, saying "while Delta is obligated to review this proposal carefully, we remain skeptical that it would make sense to deviate from our plan."

Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based UAL sidestepped questions about its intentions, but didn't rule out a possible bid.

"We think consolidation is good for the industry," said Jake Brace, chief financial officer, when asked about its plans at a Citigroup investment conference in New York. "If it makes sense for us to participate in it, we will."

DOJ_NMG_0095057

One analyst called United the perfect merger companion for Delta, with its trans-Pacific routes and international network matching up well with Delta's strengths on Atlantic and Latin American routes.

"If anyone takes over Delta, bet on United," said CreditSights' Roger King.

Morningstar analyst Brian Nelson also said he sees a United pursuit of Delta as a possibility, even though it would conflict with its stated strategy of paying down debt.

Bill Hochmuth, an analyst who tracks airlines at Thrivent Financial for Lutherans, said Northwest Airlines Corp. could potentially be an acquirer, although probably as more of a merger of equals.

Other airlines either declined to comment or said they were reviewing US Airways' offer.

US Airways, which was created after US Airways emerged from bankruptcy and was acquired by America West last year, said the deal is expected to generate $1.65 billion in annual savings from optimization of the airlines' networks and combining facilities in overlap airports.

US Airways sent a letter touting the Delta buyout to its frequent flyers, claiming the deal would reduce fares and combine the two airlines' frequent flyers programs, making it easier to redeem miles.

During a conference call, some analysts were skeptical of US Airways' confidence it can get the deal done if Delta is hostile to the bid.

They also questioned why US Airways is bidding for Delta, as opposed to another airline, like Northwest, which also is in bankruptcy.

Parker said the Delta bid makes more sense because of the synergies that can be realized. He also said he is confident the deal can clear all the hurdles it needs to, and "would prevail over any other bid if there were any."

US Airways has hubs in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Charlotte, N.C. Delta's hubs are in Atlanta, Cincinnati and Salt Lake City.

The deal makes the most sense only if it is consummated through the bankruptcy process, rather than waiting until after emergence to reach agreement, Parker said. That's because of further cost cuts that could be gained through the bankruptcy court.

As for employees, Parker said "we happen to have similar labor costs on both sides."

He did not discuss pilot pay.

US Airways has received a commitment from Citigroup Inc. to provide $7.2 billion in new financing for the deal. The funding would be used to refinance Delta's debtor-in-possession credit facility, refinance US Airways' existing senior secured facility with GE Capital, and provide funds for the $4 billion cash portion of the offer.

All other allowed secured debt and administrative claims would be assumed or paid in full. As of the end of May, Delta owed $7.49 billion to holders of secured claims, according to a court filing.

US Airways said the offer is a 25 percent premium over the current trading price of Delta's pre-petition unsecured claims as of Tuesday, and a 40 percent premium over the average trading price for Delta unsecured claims over the last 30 days.

Associated Press writers Daniel Yee in Atlanta, Joshua Freed in Minneapolis, Dave Carpenter in Chicago, David Koenig in Dallas, Brad Foss in Washington and Vinnee Tong in New York contributed to this report.

POSTED: 6:55 P.M. WEDNESDAY, NOV. 15, 2006

© 2006 Journal Gazette and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.fortwayne.com

Do Fliers Gain When Airlines Consolidate? (WSJ)

By Darren Everson And Betsy Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc., which yesterday bid $8.67 billion to acquire Delta Air Lines, believes consolidation would help the troubled airline industry. But in the wake of US Airways' own purchase by America West, it's less clear how much consumers stand to benefit.

Delta has rejected the offer by US Airways. But if the hostile bid should prove successful, analysts say there could be some advantages for consumers, but also some risks. Users of US Airways frequent-flier miles, for instance, could benefit from having access to Delta's extensive international route system. On the other hand, overlaps in service, especially in some Southern cities where both airlines have major operations, could reduce competition and lead to increased fares. What's more, persistent glitches in the process of integrating US Airways and America West raise concerns about customer service should the Delta bid succeed.

A US Airways-Delta merger would create the country's largest carrier, with an 18% market share by available seat miles, an airline industry measure of capacity. Delta, the nation's third-largest airline by passenger traffic, has hubs in Atlanta, Cincinnati, New York (John F. Kennedy) and Salt Lake City. US Airways, which ranks No. 6, has hubs in Charlotte, N.C.; Philadelphia, Phoenix, Pittsburgh and Las Vegas. There is significant overlap between Delta's 6,795 daily flights and US Airways' 3,846, especially because both operate shuttles on the East Coast.

So far, US Airways has disclosed little about how a takeover of Delta would affect each airline's operations. One exception: One of the two companies' overlapping East Coast shuttle services, which connect Boston, New York and Washington, would probably have to be sold to satisfy antitrust concerns, US Airways says.

Beyond the shuttles, there is significant overlap in the South, with Delta's main hub situated in Atlanta and US Airways having significant operations in Charlotte. The concentration means that "it would destroy competition in the deep South," says Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation-industry advisory group in Evergreen, Colo.

For example, while no airline currently commands more than a 39% market share in Charleston, S.C., a merged US Airways-Delta would gain more than a 70% share of that market, Mr. Boyd says. The new airline would have more than 75% of flights serving Montgomery, Ala., and nearly 80% of the market in Charlottesville, Va. "This is going to really hurt the consumer," he says.

Even outside of the South, the sheer size of the merged airline could create pricing power that pushes fares higher, especially along the East Coast, says Jay Sorensen, president of consulting firm IdeaWorks. However, Mr. Sorensen says that could benefit consumers in the long run.

"The first response to that [merger] outcome might be negative," Mr. Sorensen says. "But I think it's a good thing for the consumer. This industry simply needs higher fares to get back on a solid financial footing. Profitable airlines give better service in every regard from comfort in the air to reliably delivering baggage at the end of a flight."

US Airways counters arguments that fares could rise. It points to its merger with America West, which it says led to fare cuts averaging 24%. Plus, the airline says, even in the South, low-cast carriers like Southwest Airlines and AirTran Holdings Inc. remain as competition.

US Airways has proposed combining the two airlines' frequent-flier programs should the merger succeed. For US Airways' frequent fliers, Delta's extensive international routes could offer more destinations. But for users of Delta's SkyMiles, a merger could bring setbacks. For instance, Delta's SkyMiles currently expire after three years for members whose accounts have no activity, compared with a 18-month expiration term for US Airways' program, which is half the industry standard. Although Delta is shortening its expiration term to a two-year period, that's still longer than that of US Airways, says Tim Winship, publisher of FrequentFlier.com.

"When you boil it down, you have a low-cost carrier acquiring a full-service carrier," says Mr. Winship. "Watch out for terms and conditions changes," Mr. Winship says, "and keep your fingers crossed that they don't reflexively adopt the lowest common denominator since part of the goal of these tie-ups is to squeeze down costs and maximize efficiency."

In the short term, US Airways' merger with America West portends possible logistical problems to a combination with Delta. US Airways and America West aren't expected to be fully integrated until the second quarter of next year, says a person familiar with the process. For now, consumers remain confused about which airport kiosk to use and where to check in at the airport for a flight.

In an internal US Airways newsletter dated yesterday, a Q-and-A explaining the Delta merger proposal acknowledged the integration glitches US Airways still faces with its America West deal. One question began, "Are you guys out of your minds?"

One issue in a US Airways-Delta merger that could need immediate attention is the fate of one of the East Coast shuttle services the two airlines operate. But the sale of either of the shuttle services would likely mean little more to consumers than a change in name on a plane, industry experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0095059

Both services, Delta Shuttle and US Airways Shuttle, currently operate hourly flights on weekdays between New York and the two other Northeast corridor cities, with more infrequent shuttle flights on weekends. The services are not a huge source of profit, despite their popularity, says Mr. Boyd, the aviation-industry adviser.

It's unclear who would be interested in buying either of the shuttle services. Analysts speculated yesterday that AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Northwest Airlines and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines would be the most likely suitors. American has tried to buy the US Airways shuttle before and runs flights along the shuttle routes on tiny regional jets. Its customers would clearly prefer an upgrade. An American spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

US Airways Bid For Delta Could Spur Consolidations (FWST)

By Trebor Banstetter

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 16, 2006

Imagine booking a flight on Americanorthwest Airlines, an aviation behemoth with six domestic hubs and unmatched service to Asia, Latin America and Europe.

Or flying on United-Continental Airways (or perhaps Continental United Airlines, or even UniCont Air), a powerhouse in the West and on the East Coast. And for a low-fare trip, you could check prices on FronTranBlue.

The airline industry is buzzing over those potential airline combinations and more, after US Airways sparked the latest round of merger speculation Wednesday with a hostile bid to take over the bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion in cash and stock.

The chatter sent airline stocks soaring, despite warnings from some experts that industry consolidation is likely to move slowly and that any US Airways-Delta deal faces significant challenges. Delta executives said they weren't interested, and even if creditors sign on, a merger would receive intense scrutiny from regulators and the Justice Department.

And some analysts pointed to the industry's record of failed airline mergers.

"It's a terrible idea," said consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group of Evergreen, Colo. "It's a bad deal for the customers, the employees, for everybody, really, except the financial types."

Still, "investors seem to like the prospect of this deal setting off industry consolidation," airline analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities noted in a report Wednesday. "We would not be surprised if other offers emerge for Delta and that an industry trend in mergers and acquisitions starts."

Shares of AMR Corp., American Airlines' parent (ticker: AMR), rose $1.65, or 5.4 percent, to $32.33 Wednesday, and Southwest Airlines' shares climbed 70 cents, or 4.6 percent, to finish at $15.94. Shares of US Airways (LCC) soared $8.57, or 16.8 percent, to close at $59.50, while Continental stock (CAL) jumped $4.72 per share, or 12.3 percent, finishing at $43.08.

Speculation has been rampant for months that the major airlines may consider mergers, particularly as Delta and Northwest Airlines restructure in bankruptcy. Most analysts say Fort Worth-based American and Dallas-based Southwest are not among the top merger candidates, because both airlines have strong finances and could weaken themselves by buying a struggling partner.

Still, if other carriers do combine, it would increase the pressure for those airlines to consider strategic partnerships, said longtime industry consultant Darryl Jenkins.

"If this happens, then the competitive landscape changes, and American will have to reassess its own plans," he said. "I don't think they want to do a merger, but they're going to be watching this."

Officials with American declined to comment on the proposed Delta merger. "We're watching it closely like everyone else," spokesman Tim Smith said.

Beth Harbin, a Southwest spokeswoman, said her airline already competes with Delta and US Airways. "We haven't heard anything today that would prompt us to change course," she said.

Bob McAdoo, an analyst with Prudential Equity Group, said a merger could be good for the industry, because it would shrink airline capacity further and increase fares.

And industry observers quickly began handicapping other possible combinations.

Analyst Susan Donofrio of Cathay Financial said American could make a good partner for Northwest, despite the two airlines having "very different management styles."

DOJ_NMG_0095060

Northwest's strong Pacific presence would nicely complement American's Latin American and trans-Atlantic routes, she wrote in a note to investors. And domestically, Northwest's hubs in Minneapolis, Detroit and Memphis would "fill out" American's route network, which centers on Dallas/Fort Worth Airport, Chicago and Miami, she said.

American could get a bargain price for Northwest in bankruptcy court. "The acquisition of a bankrupt carrier remains attractive, as there exists the ability to renegotiate or break lease agreements and reduce unprofitable capacity," Donofrio said.

Analysts also suggested that United Airlines might make a good partner for Houston-based Continental Airlines. United executives have speculated in recent months that they might be looking to merge, and there have also been reports that the company might consider going private through a leveraged buyout.

Analyst Roger King of research firm CreditSights speculated that United might make a competing bid for Delta.

"If anyone takes over Delta, bet on United," he wrote in a report. "United has the best strategic fit; the combined networks would create the best airline in the world."

Even the discount airlines are being scrutinized for possible combinations. The announcement that Frontier Airlines and AirTran Airways will share frequent-flier programs sparked some speculation that greater cooperation is in store for the two carriers.

And Donofrio suggested that JetBlue Airways might make a good match for Frontier, because both airlines have Airbus fleets and a combination would balance their route structures.

David Neeleman, JetBlue's chief executive, told Bloomberg News on Wednesday that his company has no plans to acquire or merge with another airline.

"We're not a merger candidate," he said.

Boyd, the Colorado consultant, cautioned that mergers might not be the best answer for the industry's woes. He said the smart airlines will stay on the sidelines and let competitors get distracted by time-consuming and costly acquisitions.

"What the guys at American should do is, they should help US Airways finance this deal," he said. "It would be great for American."

Boyd said Delta and US Airways would be "wallowing in the merger mud" for years, as would most other airlines that try to combine.

"It would get very, very ugly," he said.

Stuart Klaskin, an industry consultant with Klaskin, Kushner & Co. in Coral Gables, Fla., added that the antitrust concerns could overwhelm any significant combination.

"In order to get a deal like this past the regulators, you may have to lop off such a huge part of the system that you don't end up gaining anything," he said.

When Delta executives said they wanted to stay independent, "they weren't being coy," Klaskin said. "They have good reason to want to avoid this." The proposal

US Airways wants to buy Delta Air Lines out of bankruptcy for $8 billion in cash and stock. US Airways

Headquarters: Tempe, Ariz.

CEO: Doug Parker

2005 revenue: $5.1 billion

Destinations:

234 cities in 28 countries

Top cities: Charlotte, N.C.; Philadelphia; Phoenix

Daily flights: 3,846

Airplane fleet: 365

Employees: 35,000 Delta Air Lines

Headquarters: Atlanta

CEO: Gerald Grinstein

2005 revenue: $16 billion

Destinations:

DOJ_NMG_0095061

292 cities in 46 countries

Top cities: Atlanta, Cincinnati, New York

Daily flights: 6,795

Airplane fleet: 625

Employees: 47,000 The speculation

Industry watchers are buzzing about other potential mergers, although nothing has been proposed and some argue that antitrust concerns could block a significant deal.

American Airlines–Northwest Airlines

The pros: These two airlines could create a powerhouse with unprecedented service to Asia, Europe and Latin America and a far-flung domestic system with six hubs: D/FW, Miami, Chicago, Detroit, Minneapolis/St. Paul and Memphis.

The cons: Their jet fleets aren't particularly compatible, and combining labor unions would be a huge obstacle. American executives might also want to avoid the distraction of merger issues as the airline works to return to consistent profitability.

United Airlines–Continental Airlines

The pros: These airlines don't have overlapping hubs, which would reduce antitrust concerns. A merger would also combine United's strength in the eastern U.S. with Continental's in the West.

The cons: Continental, already in relatively good financial shape, might be unwilling to take on a struggling partner. And Northwest could block a deal under an option it holds with Continental.

Discount airlines

The pros: AirTran Airways and Frontier Airlines recently announced an agreement to share frequent-flier programs, which could be a prelude to a stronger partnership. And JetBlue Airways, which has a strong East Coast presence, could benefit from merging with Frontier, solid in the West.

The cons: The discount carriers are already growing fast and don't need acquisitions to expand. And their low-cost structures could be at risk from the complexities that often accompany a merger. Trebor Banstetter, 817-390-7064

tbanstetter@star-telegram.com

© 2006 Star-Telegram.com and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.dfw.com

Let Delta Fly Right (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The proposed merger between US Airways and Delta is a step in the right direction for the ailing industry.

THE NATION'S airline industry has been in a gradual recovery lately. But US Airways Group Inc.'s announced bid to acquire Delta Air Lines Inc. promises to set off a needed consolidation of the business that will make it better able to weather the next financial downturn. Let's hope federal regulators don't block such a transformation this time around.

That's precisely what happened in 2001 when the Department of Justice ill-advisedly blocked the merger of US Airways and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines on antitrust grounds. The airline industry then had to confront an economic slowdown and the post-9/11 trauma with excess capacity, losing billions of dollars. Since 2002, four major U.S. airlines have sought bankruptcy protection; two (Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp.) are currently in Chapter 11.

US Airways says it will cut about 10% of the new Delta's passenger capacity if the two airlines merge (under the Delta brand), mostly from routes that have redundant service. It also could close a few expensive hubs. Between 2001 and 2004, US Airways filed for bankruptcy twice. The airline probably would have shut down completely if scrappy America West Airlines hadn't bought it in 2005. Delta says it will review US Airways' offer but will go forward with its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline.

The federal government should carefully review the deal if it goes forward, as well as any other such mergers. (Continental Airlines Inc. and Northwest have been eyeing each other for years, and United Chief Executive Glenn Tilton has been a vocal advocate of more aggressive consolidation in the industry.) Some routes will need to be dropped, some gates surrendered to competitors.

But regulators need to recognize that the industry is changing. The country needs fewer first-tier coast-to-coast airlines with a broader reach at home and abroad. The problem with some major U.S. airlines is that they are simultaneously too small and too large. Beyond these, growing low-cost carriers such as Southwest Airlines Co. and JetBlue Airways Corp. handle nearly one-third of all domestic passengers, and will have about 50% of the country's total market share in a decade.

Such nimble airlines are more capable than ever at filling niches created by the post-merger abandonment of routes by larger carriers — or by their greedy overpricing in other markets.

If Congress really wants to help consumers and shore up the financial health of airlines, it should allow the entry of foreign carriers and investors, which it has repeatedly declined to do. This is a global industry, after all.

Micron Subpoenaed In Price-fixing Probe; Two Idahoans Sue (IDAHOST)

By Ken Dey, Idaho Statesman

Idaho Statesman, November 16, 2006

Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed Micron Technology in an investigation into possible price-fixing of static random access memory, or SRAM, by semiconductor companies. This week, Micron was also named with more than 20 other semiconductor companies in a price-fixing lawsuit filed in Boise.

The lawsuit, filed Tuesday on behalf of Idaho residents Mark Alon Davis and Kenneth W. Herbert, alleges that between Jan. 1, 1998 and Dec. 31, 2005 the companies agreed to combat declines in prices for SRAM — a type of memory used in computers and electronic products — by manipulating the wholesale price. The lawsuit alleges the manipulation ultimately led to higher prices of consumer electronic products that used SRAM.

Micron confirmed in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it received a subpoena Oct. 11 related to the investigation.

"Micron believes that it is not a target of the investigation and will fully cooperate with the Department of Justice," Micron said today in a statement to the Idaho Statesman. "Micron will vigorously defend against any civil class action cases that are filed."

The Justice Department hasn't said what period its SRAM investigation covers, but a similar department investigation of alleged dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, price fixing covered 1999 to 2002. Micron has cooperated with the Justice Department in that investigation.

SRAM is found in small quantities in personal computers. It's also used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear. Philip Gordon, the Boise lawyer representing Davis and Herbert, said his clients bought products with SRAM including printers, routers and cell phones.

Unlike DRAM, SRAM keeps its data without electrical power. DRAM is used extensively in computers. Mark DeVoss, a senior analyst with iSuppli Corp. which analyzes the semiconductor industry, said the demand for SRAM is declining because more companies are integrating the features of SRAM into the microprocessors of devices, retaining the benefits of SRAM in a smaller space.

AT&T Merger May Face Further Scrutiny (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, November 16, 2006

The next chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee said San Antonio-based AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp. needs more scrutiny and should be the focus of a hearing when Democrats assume control of Congress in January.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman, told reporters late Tuesday that his committee should take a look at the telecommunications megamerger. He said he would like the Federal Communications Commission to delay approval until after the hearing.

"We'd like to know what the impact would be," Inouye said. "I think the people of the United States would like to know."

The hearing will take place, a spokesperson for Inouye later said, whether or not the FCC approves the merger by the end of the year.

Investors appear to be bracing for what the congressional power shift means for AT&T.

DOJ_NMG_0095063

Company shares dropped 1.52 percent to $32.46 on Wednesday on concern the new Congress will bring a less-friendly regulatory environment for the telecom giant.

The shift comes on top of investor worries that the FCC has three times delayed a vote on the deal.

"Everyone seems to think this deal will get done, but there's a new level of uncertainty," Frost Bank analyst Le Keough said.

Although the Justice Department and 18 state bodies have cleared the AT&T-BellSouth deal, it's still awaiting a nod from the FCC, the last regulatory agency needed to approve it. The commission's two Republican and two Democratic commissioners are divided over what conditions to apply to the deal.

The FCC may vote on the deal at its Dec. 14 meeting, experts said, but deliberations could continue into next year if the commission can't break its impasse.

However, the delay might not be indefinite, because FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has the option of bringing in the commission's fifth member, Republican Robert McDowell, to break a tie. McDowell has recused himself from the deliberations because he previously worked for a group that represented AT&T's competitors.

In exchange for approving its takeover of Atlanta-based BellSouth, AT&T has offered to temporarily freeze the wholesale rates it charges competitors and provide $10-a-month high-speed Internet service to customers who also take its phone service.

Competitors have argued that the company should be forced to sign off on net neutrality safeguards and to sell off some of its wireless spectrum.

"The conditions we've offered have received glowing approval from a broad range of individuals and groups, both Democratic and Republican," AT&T spokesman Mike Balmoris said.

Inouye's remarks come on top of comments last week from Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who's expected to become chairman of the House Commerce Committee. Dingell said he thinks the FCC needs to review the deal thoroughly

Although some worry Democratic pressure may slow the review, Inouye's and Dingell's recent remarks may lead the FCC's Martin to speed up deliberations so the merger can be approved before the new Congress convenes, said Jeff Gulati, a Bentley College political science professor who tracks telecom policy.

"I think this is really (Inouye) letting the FCC know that the Democrats are relevant and that they're going to exercise some oversight responsibility on these mergers, which is something the Republicans didn't exactly do over the last several years," Gulati said.

Microsoft Still Short On Data, The EU Says (AP)

By Aoife White, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, November 16, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- Microsoft Corp. still has not supplied the "complete and accurate" documentation necessary to comply with a 2004 antitrust order, European Union regulators said Wednesday. They warned that new fines could be imposed unless Microsoft supplies full information by Nov. 23.

The European Commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for not providing the technical information, said it expects "the remaining omissions and deficiencies" to be remedied quickly.

"Our patience is finite," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. "Until we have the whole set of documents, it's worth nothing."

Microsoft said it already had made "very significant progress" in improving the information it has given regulators, which aims to help rivals make server software that works smoothly with its desktop operating system Windows.

"We stand ready to do any additional work that is required to comply with the commission's decision," Microsoft said.

But the EU's executive arm said that what Microsoft has done so far is not enough and that there are still problems with the technical manual that will eventually be turned over to rivals to check before Microsoft can get the all-clear.

The commission said it wants "the remaining omissions and deficiencies in the technical documentation to be remedied by Nov. 23" so that all the material will be available by the end of this month for potential licensees to review.

Regulators must then decide if Microsoft has finally obeyed its 2004 ruling that found that the company had abused its monopoly by deliberately withholding technical data from rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0095064

That decision would be based on comments from potential licensees and advice from an independent trustee, computer scientist Neil Barrett, on whether that information is "operational."

"Should Microsoft continue to fail to comply, the amount of the daily penalty payment to which Microsoft could be subject would be increased from up to 2 million euros ($2.56 million) to up to 3 million euros ($3.85 million) per day with effect from July 31, 2006," the commission warned.

EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes told the The Guardian newspaper in Britain that her patience had run out, about 3 1/2 years after Microsoft was ordered to hand over the data.

"I don't have eternal life," she said in an interview published Wednesday. "I am not impressed if someone says 90 percent of the information is already there when we need 100 percent. It's a jigsaw, and some parts are missing."

The EU fined Microsoft a record $613 million in March 2004 and told it to share interoperability information with rivals and put on sale a copy of Windows without Media Player software.

Regulators said Microsoft had committed to and missed a number of deadlines for supplying "complete and accurate specifications," the last on July 19.

Microsoft said it had responded quickly and completely to all requests and queries on the technical documentation since the July deadline.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Environmentalists Sue Bush Administration Over Global Warming Report (AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Environmentalists sued the Bush administration for failing to produce a report on global warming's impact on the United States' environment, economy and public health.

Tuesday's lawsuit seeks to compel the U.S. Climate Change Science Program to issue the national assessment, which should contain the most recent scientific data on global warming and projections for its future impacts. The plaintiffs claim the government must complete such a report every four years under the Global Change Research Act of 1990.

"Global warming is one of the most serious threats facing humanity today," according to the complaint. Without the report, decision makers and the public "are without one of the most important tools to grapple with this complex, potentially overwhelming and yet all important issue."

The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, which was named in the lawsuit, had not received the complaint Tuesday and could not comment on it, said spokesman Ben Fallon.

But Fallon defended the administration's record on combating global warming, pointing to increased funding for alternative energy research and partnerships with other countries.

"We feel very positive about our record on climate change," Fallon said. "The president has been focused on results-driven research and looking for practical ways to address climate change in ways that aren't damaging to the economy."

Officials at the Climate Change Science Program, also named in the complaint, did not immediately respond to calls seeking comment.

The lawsuit was filed in federal court in San Francisco by the Center for Biological Diversity, Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace.

The assessment, which plaintiffs allege was due in November 2004, is the "first step in crafting solutions to the devastating consequences of climate change if we don't act now," said Julie Teel, an attorney for the plaintiffs.

Sen. John Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential candidate, who has also been calling on the administration to issue the assessment, expressed support for the lawsuit.

"It's the right time to push Washington to grapple with this issue," Kerry said in a statement. "For too many years, action on global climate change has been stopped dead in its tracks by government foot-dragging, hiding information and smothering science."

DOJ_NMG_0095065

Environmentalists have accused the administration of trying to suppress dissemination of the previous assessment, issued in 2000, which predicted a dramatic rise in catastrophic storms, floods, droughts and heat-related deaths.

The lawsuit comes as experts from around the world meet in Nairobi for the two-week U.N. climate conference, where they have been trying to set a course for future controls on global greenhouse gas emissions.

Scientists attribute at least some of the past century's rise in global temperatures to the accumulation in the atmosphere of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases, byproducts of power plants, automobiles and other fossil fuel-burning sources.

On the Net:

U.S. Climate Change Science Program: http://www.climatescience.gov/

Center for Biological Diversity: http://www.biologicaldiversity.org/swcbd/programs/policy/energy/ ati onal-ass essment.html

Court Asked To Rescind EPA Decision Allowing Field Burning (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- The dense plumes of smoke that arise when grass-seed farmers in Idaho burn their fields cause asthma in children, reduce visibility on highways and actually kill people, but the Environmental Protection Agency did not study those effects before changing a federal rule to allow such fires, a lawyer for a clean-air group told judges Wednesday.

"The smoke from this burning is so thick it sends people to the hospital," attorney David Baron told the three-judge panel from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, where such cases are heard.

Baron represents Safe Air For Everyone, a Washington and Idaho clean-air group, as well as the American Lung Association, which sued late last year to undo the EPA's rule change on the grounds that the agency made the decision without first studying what the effects would be.

Kentucky bluegrass seed grown in northern Idaho is shipped across the nation to be used in landscaping and golf courses. Farmers contend they must burn the stubble left on fields to improve the production of the next year's crop and control pests. The smoke often drifts into neighboring states and Canada.

Hundreds of doctors have signed petitions seeking an end to the burning, saying their patients suffer ill effects from the dense smoke; in 2000, a coroner determined that a Rathdrum, Idaho, woman died from inhaling it. Clean-air groups argue that a 1998 decision to ban grass-field burning in Washington state has not harmed the seed industry.

The field burning has gone on for years in Idaho, where it is allowed under state law but historically not under the federal plan for Idaho established under the Clean Air Act. Last year, after health groups threatened to sue farmers for burning fields, the EPA changed the plan for Idaho, saying it had intended to allow grass-field burning all along.

The EPA insisted that the change was a simple clarification that could be made without first conducting a study.

"There was no statement in the state implementation plan that crop residue burning was allowed," said Justice Department lawyer Paul Cirino. "But everybody knew it was allowed in Idaho."

The judges - Arthur Alarcon, Pamela Ann Rymer and Marsha Berzon - regarded that argument dubiously. They said that field burning clearly had been prohibited under the federal plan, and that the government's rule change allowing such burning was more than a "clarification."

"It says flat out that you can't have open burning, and now the agency can interpret that to mean something else?" Berzon asked Cirino.

"I'm having trouble with your use of the word 'clarification,'" Alarcon added.

Baron said after the hearing that if the EPA is forced to study the matter, it may eventually come around to banning the practice.

"We find it remarkable that the EPA would be so resistant to taking a close look at the effects of this burning, when it's making people sick, sending them to the hospital and clouding skies across Idaho," he said.

The judges will issue a ruling at a later date.

DOJ_NMG_0095066

Also argued Wednesday was a tangentially related case concerning the EPA's requirements for field burning on the Coeur d'Alene Tribe's reservation in Idaho.

Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The U.S. government has vowed that Americans will never be hungry again. But they may experience "very low food security."

Every year, the Agriculture Department issues a report that measures Americans' access to food, and it has consistently used the word "hunger" to describe those who can least afford to put food on the table. But not this year.

Mark Nord, the lead author of the report, said "hungry" is "not a scientifically accurate term for the specific phenomenon being measured in the food security survey." Nord, a USDA sociologist, said, "We don't have a measure of that condition."

The USDA said that 12 percent of Americans -- 35 million people -- could not put food on the table at least part of last year. Eleven million of them reported going hungry at times. Beginning this year, the USDA has determined "very low food security" to be a more scientifically palatable description for that group.

The United States has set a goal of reducing the proportion of food-insecure households to 6 percent or less by 2010, or half the 1995 level, but it is proving difficult. The number of hungriest Americans has risen over the past five years. Last year, the total share of food-insecure households stood at 11 percent.

Less vexing has been the effort to fix the way hunger is described. Three years ago, the USDA asked the Committee on National Statistics of the National Academies "to ensure that the measurement methods USDA uses to assess households' access -- or lack of access -- to adequate food and the language used to describe those conditions are conceptually and operationally sound."

Among several recommendations, the panel suggested that the USDA scrap the word hunger, which "should refer to a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness, or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation."

To measure hunger, the USDA determined, the government would have to ask individual people whether "lack of eating led to these more severe conditions," as opposed to asking who can afford to keep food in the house, Nord said.

It is not likely that USDA economists will tackle measuring individual hunger. "Hunger is clearly an important issue," Nord said. "But lacking a widespread consensus on what the word 'hunger' should refer to, it's difficult for research to shed meaningful light on it."

Anti-hunger advocates say the new words sugarcoat a national shame. "The proposal to remove the word 'hunger' from our official reports is a huge disservice to the millions of Americans who struggle daily to feed themselves and their families," said David Beckmann, president of Bread for the World, an anti-hunger advocacy group. "We . . . cannot hide the reality of hunger among our citizens."

In assembling its report, the USDA divides Americans into groups with "food security" and those with "food insecurity," who cannot always afford to keep food on the table. Under the old lexicon, that group -- 11 percent of American households last year -- was categorized into "food insecurity without hunger," meaning people who ate, though sometimes not well, and "food insecurity with hunger," for those who sometimes had no food.

That last group now forms the category "very low food security," described as experiencing "multiple indications of disrupted eating patterns and reduced food intake." Slightly better-off people who aren't always sure where their next meal is coming from are labeled "low food security."

That 35 million people in this wealthy nation feel insecure about their next meal can be hard to believe, even in the highest circles. In 1999, Texas Gov. George W. Bush, then running for president, said he thought the annual USDA report -- which consistently finds his home state one of the hungriest in the nation -- was fabricated.

"I'm sure there are some people in my state who are hungry," Bush said. "I don't believe 5 percent are hungry."

DOJ_NMG_0095067

Bush said he believed that the statistics were aimed at his candidacy. "Yeah, I'm surprised a report floats out of Washington when I'm running a presidential campaign," he said.

The agency usually releases the report in the fall, for reasons that "have nothing to do with politics," Nord said.

This year, when the report failed to appear in October as it usually does, Democrats accused the Bush administration of delaying its release until after the midterm elections. Nord denied the contention, saying, "This is a schedule that was set several months ago."

Isleta Settlement Gets Approval From Senate (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE (AP) - The Senate has passed a $40 million settlement negotiated by Isleta Pueblo and the federal government over past mismanagement of tribal land.

The measure, unanimously approved by the Senate on Monday, now heads to President Bush for his consideration.

The pueblo sued the government, seeking compensation for damages to its land south of Albuquerque. The pueblo, the Interior Department and the U.S. Justice Department spent years reviewing the claims and reached agreement in June on how to resolve the matter.

The legislation establishes a natural resources fund of more than $32 million for the pueblo to use to restore agricultural, range and forestry property. The measure also authorizes $7.2 million, but that money is subject to administration budgeting and the federal appropriations process.

Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said the legislation, once signed by the president, will allow Isleta Pueblo to improve drainage on its agricultural lands and rehabilitate lands damaged by trespass grazing and excessive logging.

"The pueblo deserves this compensation and the president's signature on this bill will allow that to happen," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., added that restoring tribal lands will help create new economic opportunities for Isleta Pueblo.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mob Reappears In Court (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 16, 2006

"The mob is back and there's gonna be trouble,

"Hey la day la, da mob is back."

- Sung to the tune of the

Angels'"My Boyfriend's Back."

Now, after a four-year rebuilding phase in Philadelphia and South Jersey, organized crime is making a comeback in federal court.

Today, reputed mob soldier Damion Canalichio, 37, once a top aide to jailed mob underboss Steve Mazzone, will seek bail on federal drug-trafficking charges, according to his attorney Joseph Santaguida.

Canalichio, who served 27 months for a 1997 drug conviction, and his sidekick, Christopher Cerr, 36, of Glenolden, were arrested yesterday without incident by FBI agents in South Jersey and in Delaware County.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor said a seven-count indictment was unsealed, charging the pair with selling more than 300 grams of cocaine for a total of $9,200 in June 2004.

During a one-month investigation by FBI agent John Augustine, the two allegedly sold the cocaine on June 2, 10, and 24 in 2004 at the corner of Snyder Avenue and Hicks Street - across from the Melrose Diner - in South Philadelphia, according to the indictment.

DOJ_NMG_0095068

They are charged with three counts of drug distribution, drug distribution within 1,000 feet of a school - South Philadelphia High - and conspiracy. The government also is seeking to confiscate Cerr's 2004 Ford Explorer. Cerr is represented by attorney Carina Laguzzi.

Labor would not comment on why it took 29 months to indict the pair. However, sources say, the feds have ongoing investigations into mob activities, particularly sports gambling.

The street sales - a drop in mob status for Canalichio - allegedly took place a block from where mob associate Frank Baldino was killed during the bloody 1993 mob war between the John Stanfa crime family and a rival faction headed by Joseph "Skinny Joey" Merlino, who later became boss.

Stanfa and Merlino were convicted in racketeering trials. Stanfa, 65, is serving five consecutive life terms, and Merlino, 44, is due to be released in 2011 after serving a 14-year term.

• Meanwhile in New Jersey, reputed mob soldier and convicted extortionist Vincent Filipelli, 53, was arrested on Oct. 24 on a one-count indictment charging him with extortion in connection with running an illegal sports gambling operation.

During a 14-month joint FBI-New Jersey State Police investigation, Filipelli, who competed in professional bodybuilding contests before becoming a mob enforcer, allegedly threatened to put an undercover trooper, who "owed" a gambling debt, in the hospital.

Filipelli, of Cherry Hill, is being held without bail in the Federal Detention Center at 7th and Arch streets, where Canalichio and Cerr are in custody.

• And in upstate Pennsylvania, one of the Philly mob's biggest supporters, William "Billy" D'Elia, reputed crime boss of Northeastern Pennsylvania, was charged on Nov. 1 in an 18-count federal indictment on charges of laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars in drug proceeds via banks in the Dominican Republic from 1999 to 2006.

He faces a maximum of 245 years in prison, forfeiture of $565,000 and a $4 million fine if convicted of multiple counts of money laundering, interstate transportation of laundered money, solicitation of murder, perjury, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, conspiracy and contempt of court.

U.S. Charges Detroit Man In Fentanyl Deaths (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

DETROIT -- Federal prosecutors charged a Detroit man with causing the deaths of two people by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl, a combination blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year.

James E. Coleman, 36, was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death. Coleman has been in custody since June, when he was charged with drug possession in the case.

Coleman is charged in the deaths of Lauren Jolly, 17, of Oakland County's Bloomfield Township, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights.

Jolly snorted a combination of heroin and fentanyl on May 24 in a Detroit drug house. Authorities said Coleman's brother, Donald Cunningham, placed Jolly in a bathtub full of ice in an attempt to revive her, but did not seek medical treatment. Another drug customer took Jolly to a hospital, where the high school junior was pronounced dead.

McElmurry died in June.

Coleman did not know the drugs contained fentanyl and did not intend to kill anyone, defense attorney Warren Harris said.

The charge carries a 20-year minimum prison sentence and a maximum of life in prison.

Jolly told police about the drug house six weeks before her death, when she was arrested in connection with having heroin mixed with fentanyl. Her information helped police obtain search warrants that led to a raid and Cunningham's arrest.

Cunningham, 27, is in state prison on a parole violation. There are no plans to charge him under federal law, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Wednesday.

Feds Charge Suspect In Fentanyl Deaths (DN)

Detroit News, November 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095069

Federal officials today charged an accused heroin dealer with causing the deaths of two drug users by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

They are the first such state or federal charges in connection with the street sale of fentanyl-laced heroin in the Detroit area in 2005-06, which killed an estimated 133 drug users between September and July.

James Edgar Coleman, 36, of Detroit, was arraigned today and is expected to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Detroit Thursday to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death, Coleman's lawyer Warren Harris of Southfield said.

The charges each carry a 20-year minimum prison sentence and a maximum of life in prison.

Coleman is charged in connection with the deaths of Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student who died in April, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, who died May 26.

Harris said Coleman did not know the drugs contained fentanyl and he did not intend to kill anyone.

Coleman has been in custody since June on charges of distributing heroin and cocaine.

Notes: U.S. Rules Won't Be Party To Bode-type Behavior (USAT)

By Vicki Michaelis, Usa Today

USA Today, November 16, 2006

With the memory still fresh of U.S. skier Bode Miller making more headlines for what he did at the bars than on the slopes at the 2006 Winter Olympics in Italy, the U.S. Ski and Snowboard Association has instituted new policies.

USSA staff and athletes no longer are allowed to drink alcohol together. No alcohol consumption is allowed at team hotels. And during official training camps and competitions, all athletes are required to stay in team hotels.

"We'd be naive to say that it wasn't" at least partly a response to what happened at the Olympics, USSA spokesman Tom Kelly said.

Miller, the 2005 overall World Cup champion, was photographed partying with a Playboy Playmate during the Olympics and told reporters after not medaling: "It's been an awesome two weeks. I got to party and socialize at an Olympic level."

U.S. aerials skier Jeret Peterson was sent home after fighting with a friend following a night of partying.

During the Games, Miller and U.S. teammates Daron Rahlves and Julia Mancuso stayed in their own RVs. This season, U.S. skiers can use their RVs between competitions, but the athletes will be with the team during competitions, subject to the stricter alcohol guidelines.

"We just want to have a more professional approach and create more of a performance environment when we're on the road," Kelly said.

BALCO charges

Trevor Graham, who triggered the BALCO steroid scandal, is expected to appear in federal court Thursday in San Francisco for his arraignment on a three-count indictment.

Graham, a high-profile coach whose track athletes have accumulated medals as well as drug positives, is accused of lying to federal investigators three times in BALCO inquiries. He faces maximum penalties of five years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each count.

According to the Nov. 2 indictment, Raleigh, N.C.-based Graham was interviewed by federal investigators in June 2004, a year after Graham anonymously sent a vial of a designer steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. Graham, who later acknowledged sending the vial, told USADA the steroid had been given to athletes by Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative.

The indictment alleges Graham told the agents that he never referred his athletes to someone referred to as Source A to obtain banned performance-enhancing drugs. The indictment alleges Source A provided drugs to Graham and his athletes.

The second count contends Graham lied by stating he never met Source A in person when they had several meetings. The third count alleges Graham told agents he last contacted Source A in 1997 despite having numerous contacts from 1997 through 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0095070

Angel Heredia told a grand jury he supplied steroids, human growth hormone and EPO to Graham from 1996 through 2000 before a financial dispute ended their relationship, according to The New York Times and San Francisco Chronicle.

Landis and the lab

Embattled Tour de France champion Floyd Landis is basing his defense against doping charges on mismanagement in the French laboratory that processed his urine samples at the 2006 Tour. Wednesday, the director of the International Olympic Committee-accredited lab admitted that some "insignificant" numbers were in error but had no bearing on the legitimacy of the tests, which showed Landis' testosterone-to-epitestosterone ratios to be out of kilter after the Tour's 17th stage.

A February date is expected for the Landis USADA hearing, but no matter what the result is, the case will be sent to the Court for Arbitration in Sport for final appeal. Landis could receive a two-year suspension if found guilty.

Contributing: Dick Patrick, Sal Ruibal

Bikers Sentenced For Meth-making (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

Authorities say the illegal activity relatively new in Detroit area.

DETROIT (AP) -- Several people affiliated with a biker gang will face prison time for a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Prosecutors describe it as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. Seven individuals from the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months.

"We're pleased because it just goes to show that methamphetamine is relatively new to this area, and we don't see meth a whole lot," Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Schneider told the Detroit Free Press. "But I think that what this shows is when we see it, we're going to take action."

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced the final defendant, Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Algonac, Mich., on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth.

Prosecutors said members who were convicted and sentenced earlier this year are: Michael Mastromatteo, 48, of Mount Clemens, Mich., and Gregory Schoeninger, 45, of Algonac. Their convicted associates, who also were sentenced in September and October, are: Demetrius Meffer, 38, of Chesterfield Township; Joseph Rottman, 43, of Macomb Township; Tami Watters, 41, of Gaylord; and Drago Stajninger, 41, of Chesterfield Township.

The Schoeningers are married.

In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, Algonac and Chesterfield Township revealed labs had been relocated frequently.

Meth Makers Get Prison (FREEP)

By Christy Arboscello, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 15, 2006

Biker gang allies ran operations in Macomb, St. Clair

Two members and five associates of the oddly-named Devils' Diciples biker gang will face prison time for their involvement in a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday.

In what prosecutors called the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit, the individuals will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months.

"We're pleased because it just goes to show that methamphetamine is relatively new to this area and we don't see meth a whole lot. But I think that what this shows is when we see it, we're going to take action," said U.S. Attorney Matthew Schneider, who worked on the case.

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced the final defendant, Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Algonac, on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth.

DOJ_NMG_0095071

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, the biker gang members who were convicted and sentenced earlier this year are: Michael (Iron Mike) Mastromatteo, 48, of Mt. Clemens and Gregory (Breakdown) Schoeninger, 45, of Algonac. Their convicted associates, who were also sentenced in September and October, are: Demetrius (Demi) Meffer, 38, of Chesterfield Township; Joseph Rottman, 43, of Macomb Township; Tami Watters, 41, of Gaylord; and Drago Stajninger, 41, of Chesterfield Township.

Gregory Schoeninger and Patricia Schoeninger are married. In March 2005, the FBI, Michigan State Police and the County of Macomb Enforcement Team conducted extensive raids at several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mt. Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, Algonac and Chesterfield Township revealed labs had been relocated frequently to avoid detection.

Police: Meth Crisis Minimized In Area (PHTH)

By Molly Montag

Port Huron (MI) Times-Herald, November 16, 2006

Crack remains local illegal drug of choice

Despite two Clay Township men's involvement in a large methamphetamine ring, narcotics agents said crack cocaine still is the leading problem drug locally.

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Clay Township on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth. Her husband, Gregory Schoeninger, 45, was convicted earlier this year.

Prosecutors describe the case, which involved members of the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang, as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens.

Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, the Algonac area and Chesterfield Township revealed labs frequently had been relocated.

St. Clair County sheriff Lt. Tim Donnellon, who assisted with the investigation, said methamphetamine hasn't become the local epidemic authorities once feared it would.

"The meth hasn't really taken hold, and it hasn't been able to displace crack because of the Detroit influence," he said.

Algonac Police Chief Richard Torongeau said he hasn't noticed an increase in meth activity downriver. Algonac is bordered by Clay Township, where the Schoeningers live.

"I'm sure it's here, but we haven't seen a whole lot of it," Torongeau said.

Sanilac County hasn't had a criminal case involving meth in the past two years, said Bill Gray, director of the county's drug task force.

Cocaine use, however, seems to be on the rise, Gray said.

"It is one of the great mysteries of the last decade why methamphetamine is not in the Thumb area the way it is in (other parts of) Michigan or the Midwest," Gray said.

Contact Molly Montag at (810) 989-6275 or mmontag@gannett.com

Livermore Seeks Permanent Ban On Marijuana Dispensaries (TH)

By Brian Foley

TriValley Herald, November 15, 2006

LIVERMORE - City officials are moving forward with plans to permanently ban medical marijuana dispensaries.

An existing moratorium is scheduled to expire Sept. 11, 2007 after the council voted to extend it two months ago. City officials say that the City Council didn't want to wait until the last minute to make a permanent decision.

"We ran the course on investigating and researching and reached a critical point where we were able to come up with a recommendation for the council," said city attorney John Pomidor. "The council didn't want us taking it to the last moment."

On Monday, the council voted 4-1 to instruct its staff to draft an ordinance.

"We've done extensive research," said City Manager Linda Barton. "We were unable to find a model or an example of a successful operation that didn't deal with secondary impacts."

DOJ_NMG_0095072

Those secondary impacts include a reputation that dispensaries draw crime. On top of that, a problem looms for cities because of disparities between state and federal laws. While Proposition 215 legalized marijuana for medicinal purposes at the state level, the federal government regards the drug as illegal.

Councilman Tom Reitter, the dissenting vote, favored communicating with the city of Oakland and its dispensary operators before making a permanent decision.

On Monday, a handful of opponents urged the council to show restraint, reminding them that with Congress shifting to Democratic control that federal marijuana laws might change.

An Oakland attorney, James Anthony, lambasted the city staff's report on the subject that heavily relied on past negative incidents with dispensaries. Anthony called the report "a hatchet job" that ignored positive aspects. He pointed to Oakland, which regulates, permits and oversees four successful dispensaries.

"(The staff report) was very one-sided," he said. "It consisted of cut-and-paste horror stories associated with unregulated dispensaries."

Barbara Killey, an Oakland administrative hearing officer, confirmed that Oakland police has "had almost zero problems with dispensaries." She said Livermore officials have not contacted her.

Livermore resident Michael Ferrucci, a medical marijuana patient, hopes for a strong turnout when the City Council formally votes on an ordinance. He said Tri-Valley residents who are sick shouldn't have to drive to Oakland and Hayward for medicine.

"I want to invite the public -- cancer patients, M.S. patients, pain patients -- to show up and have their eyes on the council as they take their medicine away," he said.

Pomidor expects the city staff to present an ordinance to the council in January.

In June, Dublin formally banned dispensaries and in July, Pleasanton extended its year-long moratorium.

Gardena Joins Bans On Medical Marijuana Outlets (TDB)

By Gene Maddaus, Daily Breeze

Torrance (CA) Daily Breeze, November 16, 2006

Moratorium for 45 days will allow staff time to come up with permanent regulations.

Weeks after ordering two medical marijuana dispensaries to close, the Gardena City Council imposed a moratorium on such facilities Tuesday night.

Both dispensaries are still fighting City Hall. California Caregivers' Association, on Vermont Avenue, has closed, but its owner has sued the city in an effort to reopen next year.

The other dispensary, Nature's Holistic Caregivers on Crenshaw Boulevard, remains open in defiance of the City Council, which revoked its business license last month.

The council passed the 45-day moratorium with little fanfare on Tuesday night. The temporary ban will give the city's planning staffers time to draft permanent regulations.

Allison Margolin, the attorney for Nature's Holistic Caregivers, argued that it is against the law for the city to forbid marijuana dispensaries from doing business.

"It's illegal and it's a moral crime," she said. "What this would do is put marijuana back on the streets." Though California voters legalized medical marijuana a decade ago, it remains a controlled substance under federal law. As marijuana dispensaries have spread statewide, cities have struggled with the question of how best to regulate them. Several South Bay cities, including Lawndale, Torrance, Hawthorne, Redondo Beach, and Rancho Palos Verdes, have instituted bans similar to the one the Gardena council passed Tuesday night.

Councilman Steve Bradford, who was the lone supporter of the dispensaries last month, dissented from the majority again, as the council voted 4-1 to enact the moratorium.

Virgil Grant, the owner of Nature's Holistic Caregivers, presented 500 signatures from Gardena residents supporting his dispensary.

DOJ_NMG_0095073

In an interview, Councilman Oscar Medrano cited concerns that the federal government could withdraw grants if the city allows marijuana dispensaries to operate.

"I will not allow moneys to be taken away from our seniors, our kids, our Meals on Wheels programs," Medrano said. "These are essential programs that are needed to keep the kids off the street." Medrano said he sympathized with medical marijuana patients, but was concerned that marijuana dispensaries are unregulated.

"Let's let a doctor prescribe it in the hospital," he said. "Let it be given in the right way, not in a store where you can walk in off the street."

Mexican Cartels Expand Meth Dealing In U.S. (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 15, 2006

Mexican drug-trafficking cartels have moved in to fill the void left by the successful crackdown on small methamphetamine labs across the United States, and the foreign traffickers have brought the highly addictive drug into parts of the country where it was rarely seen before, according to a new report by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

According to Health and Human Services data, drug use is down over the last four years, but a new report says that Mexican drug trafficking organizations, or DTOs, have gained strength in the United States and that heroin usage has increased among some drug addicts.

DEA officials believe that five main Mexican drug cartels have increased operations in the United States.

Mexican drug-trafficking organizations have "gained considerable strength and greatly expanded their presence in drug markets throughout the country, even in many smaller communities in Midwestern and Eastern states," said the report, which was released today.

Because the ingredients for making meth were easily obtainable, small makeshift meth labs sprang up across the country, feeding much of the surge in meth use since the early 1990s. But when states started passing laws limiting access to some of the key ingredients, such as pseudoephedrine, many of those mom-and-pop labs closed.

The federal government followed suit when Congress tacked a meth provision onto the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act that limits the amount of pseudoephedrine people can buy at pharmacies.

According to the DEA, since 2004 there have been fewer U.S.-based labs, judging from the DEA's seizure data.

"We've had a significant reduction in domestic labs, with Mexican DTOs filling the void," one DEA official, who requested anonymity, told ABC News.

The spread of methamphetamine can be seen in cities such as Atlanta, which has had several high-yield busts in recent months. In August, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta announced the largest meth seizure in Georgia's history, which removed as much as $50 million worth of meth from the streets.

The Mexican cartels were behind the deals, and the DEA believes they have been trying to use Atlanta as a hub for trafficking.

"We've never seen meth on the eastern seaboard … in those quantities," the DEA official said.

National Drug Intelligence Center spokesman Charles Miller said the Mexican drug-trafficking networks have been able to gain influence for several reasons, including their access to the precursor chemicals needed to make high-quality methamphetamine.

Many of these chemicals, including large quantities of the cold medicine pseudoephedrine, come from Asia.

According to the National Drug Intelligence Center, the Mexican groups have been able to use their traditional trafficking networks for cocaine and marijuana to distribute the methamphetamine, which is made in so-called superlabs — large production facilities in Mexico.

DEA officials said they have seen evidence of the Mexican groups increasing their activity in meth distribution, with increased meth seizures at the southern border.

In 2004, DEA data showed that 2,420 kilos of meth where seized at the southern U.S. border. In 2005, seizures had increased to 2,750 kilos.

DOJ_NMG_0095074

Although casual use of methamphetamine appears to be stable, the report said there is an increase in the number of meth-related treatment admissions and methamphetamine-dependent individuals nationwide. In 2004, 129,079 were admitted to treatment facilities for meth treatment, compared with 82,113 in 2001.

Meth is not the only area in which the Mexican groups have increased the business opportunities.

The threat assessment notes that the Mexican groups have the "ability to advance Mexican heroin beyond traditional Western state heroin markets."

The report said this "presents new challenges to law enforcement as more groups make the drug consistently available to individuals even in smaller, more rural Eastern communities."

The assessment also found that heroin use has increased among some drug addicts who abuse prescription painkillers. The report found that prescription narcotic abusers have switched to heroin.

"Law enforcement reporting indicates that abusers of pharmaceutical opioids, primarily OxyContin and methadone, but other drugs as well, have switched and continue to switch to heroin, particularly when heroin is more available and cheaper," according to the report.

The report said this trend has been seen in California, Florida, Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin.

To combat the influence of the Mexican networks, the DEA has engaged in a series of training programs with Mexican law enforcement agencies to try to dismantle their networks.

Meth, Ecstacy, Heroin Readily Available (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, November 16, 2006

Larger amounts of drugs are coming into the United States from Mexico, Columbia and Asia, the National Drug Intelligence Center said.

In its 2007 drug threat assessment, the center said organizations producing ice methamphetamine in Mexico have expanded their presence throughout the United States. The center, which is part of the Department of Justice, said the presence of Mexican traffickers in U.S. drug markets has allowed the introduction of Mexican black tar and brown powder heroin into Southeastern and Midwestern states.

Cocaine availability and use in the United States have not significantly changed, but Ecstasy availability and distribution have increased significantly, the center reported.

Asian gangs based in Canada contributed to increases in potency and distribution of marijuana throughout the United States.

Rates of prescription drug abuse top those of other drugs, except marijuana, but the center said law enforcement agencies have had recent success in reducing illegal use of prescription drugs. However, that has caused some addicts to substitute drugs such as heroin for prescription narcotics.

Most Mexican and Colombian traffickers consolidated their money into large bulk cash shipments, smuggling them into Mexico, the report said. U.S. law enforcement efforts have made it more difficult to launder money in U.S. financial institutions.

Canada-based Drug Traffickers Peddling More Ecstasy In U.S., Says Report (CP)

Canadian Press, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (CP) - Asian drug traffickers based in Canada have gained control over most of the ecstasy distribution in the United States and expanded their reach, said an American drug report released Wednesday.

The National Drug Threat Assessment by the U.S. Justice Department also said the production of high-potency marijuana in Canada is a problem, although marijuana use has declined slightly.

The strength of seized marijuana samples has more than doubled from 2000 through 2005, says the drug threat report, which is published annually.

High potency production has increased at indoor and outdoor sites in the United States, said the report, and outdoor plants in central California are growing a product comparable in quality to Canada's B.C. Bud.

There's also more smuggling of strong weed into the country by Canada-based Asian groups.

DOJ_NMG_0095075

Since 2004, cross-border ecstasy trafficking has increased significantly, with Canada-based operations expanding distribution to most U.S. states.

Distribution is now at a level similar to that of 2001, when availability peaked under the control of Israeli traffickers who have mostly been broken up by U.S. police operations.

Israeli groups smuggled ecstasy into East Coast cities almost exclusively through couriers on commercial flights from Europe.

Traffickers in Canada, said the report, use private and commercial vehicles crossing the border.

U.S. Officials Troubled By Expansion Of Asian-Canadian Drug Gangs (GM)

Globe and Mail, November 16, 2006

Canadian-based Asian crime syndicates have become the No. 1 distributors of ecstasy in the United States, according to a new report released yesterday.

The business of Vietnamese and other Asian gangs, who started out by growing the popular form of marijuana known as B.C. Bud, has boomed, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The agency's national drug intelligence centre says the groups have diversified their product lines and set up U.S. franchises, grabbing a significant share of the multibillion-dollar U.S. drug market.

"Canadian-based Asian DTOs [drug-trafficking organizations] have recently gained control over most MDMA [ecstasy] distribution in the United States," states the centre's annual threat assessment, released yesterday.

It adds that in the United States "an estimated $5.2-billion (U.S.) to $21.2-billion is generated through the wholesale distribution of marijuana and MDMA by Canada-based DTOs, and much of the illegal drug proceeds are transported in bulk" back to Canada.

(The figures were achieved by multiplying the estimates of Canadian-produced drugs available in the United States by their estimated wholesale value; comparable estimates arose a few years ago, when Forbes Magazine put the value of B.C.'s marijuana crop alone at up to $7-billion.)

Figures as high as this would suggest that Canada's illegal drug business with the United States could rival the overall value of Canada's legitimate exports, such as wheat ($2.7-billion Canadian) or even lumber and sawmill products ($18.9-billion). Yet one statistician who examined the U.S. study said comparisons should be made cautiously.

"Using the $20-billion figure is an overstatement . . . it's way, way too high," said Philip Cross, an analyst at Statistics Canada. While the government agency doesn't track illegal drug activity, he looked at the U.S. study's methodology, and said that lower ranges of the estimate are far more likely.

Whatever the dollar amount, the drug business would appear to be as brisk as ever. Mexican drug networks remain, by far, the biggest problem in the United States. But Canadian gangs are also carving out territory in their niches.

Since marijuana grow-operations began spreading eastward from British Columbia in the late 1990s, Canadian police have warned the activity would lead to increasingly entrenched criminal networks dealing not just in pot, but also in chemical drugs, like methylenedioxy-methylampheta-mine (MDMA), the club-drug known as ecstasy.

The United States says it is now picking up precisely this sort of activity. South of the border, police say they dismantled Israeli-based organizations importing the club drugs, only to see Asian gangs from Canada fill the vacuum. The problem, as stated in the threat assessment released yesterday, is that the new gangs appear stronger and more impenetrable, largely because of the difficulty in gaining informants in tightly knit ethnically homogeneous groups.

Syndicates still ship synthetic drugs such as ecstasy from overseas, but increasingly they produce them on the continent. "Canada-based Asian criminal groups most often smuggle the drug into the United States via private and commercial vehicles over the Canada-U.S. border," the report says. "Almost all of the MDMA smuggled into the United States from Canada is produced in Canada."

Ecstasy may be a growth industry, but these gangs have never abandoned their core product. "High-potency marijuana production, smuggling and distribution by Canada-based Asian DTOs, primarily of Vietnamese ethnicity, is increasing," the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0095076

Fugitives Answer Call To Surrender (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner And Lindsey Collom

USA Today, November 16, 2006

PHOENIX — Sean White, wanted on criminal warrants for a probation violation and failure to appear in court, went to church Wednesday morning to get right with the law.

The 32-year-old man was among the 120 suspects who turned themselves in during the first four hours of Fugitive Safe Surrender.

The program, which ends Saturday, basically is an invitation from federal and state authorities who are telling fugitives they might receive "favorable consideration" by turning themselves in at a makeshift justice center at Pilgrim Rest Baptist Church.

Doug Weiner, a former Cuyahoga County, Ohio, prosecutor and co-founder of Fugitive Safe Surrender, said the long-term goal is to conduct programs nationwide. Plans already are underway for ones in Indianapolis; Rochester, N.Y.; Akron, Ohio; and Richmond, Va.

David Gonzales, U.S. Marshal for Arizona, said the program gives suspects a chance to deal with criminal warrants at a neutral site, which cuts costs for the public and reduces the chance of a dangerous situation for law officers.

Defendants who show up at the Phoenix church find public defenders to represent them and judges to conduct hearings. Often, when fugitives are caught in traffic stops or tracked down by agents, they face the humiliation of being handcuffed in front of family and the hassle of going straight to jail.

Under Safe Surrender, Gonzales said, most of those wanted for non-violent offenses will be processed within hours and released without going behind bars. The fugitives who turned themselves in Wednesday morning were suspects in cases involving drunken driving, disorderly conduct and failure to pay fines.

A federal Office of Justice Programs grant for $600,000 is financing the development of Fugitive Safe Surrender. The grant is being supplemented with money, manpower and equipment from state and local agencies. Gonzales said he expects the effort in Phoenix to cost about $75,000.

"We think it's a win-win situation for the community," Gonzales said.

The Safe Surrender concept was first tried 13 months ago in Cleveland. Over a four-day period, more than 840 people visited a church to resolve criminal warrants. Although most were wanted for non-violent misdemeanors, the lineup included 324 felony suspects, with "some wanted for rape, robbery, assault and drug offenses," said Peter Elliott, the U.S. Attorney for northern Ohio.

Elliott said he hit upon the idea for Safe Surrender last year. He said he realized suspects might turn themselves in if they could do so safely, and he figured churches would be good safe havens.

When the suspects in Cleveland were asked why they surrendered, Gonzales said, "The overwhelming response was they were tired of running. … It's stressful."

Sean White had been on the run since 2002, when he walked away from a work-release program. At the time, White was 20 days into a 40-day DUI sentence at a Maricopa County jail. It was the wrong decision, he said, and life hasn't been easy since.

White lost a construction job because his driver's license was suspended, he said, and lack of income led his family of five to move from a three-bedroom home to a pay-by-week hotel.

Even more, he said, the main motivation for surrendering is to help solve his half brother's murder. Robert Dickey, 40, was driving to work when someone he stopped to help along the roadway fatally stabbed him in June 2005, White said. He said he hasn't been involved for fear of arrest.

"It's pretty much weighed me down every single day," White said. "Whatever I have to serve, pay, I want to get it over with so I can get on with my life."

In Maricopa County, where there are about 70,000 criminal warrants waiting to be served, according to Gonzales and county law enforcement, the operation was preceded by a media blitz featuring newspaper ads, church fliers and public service announcements on radio and television. In the days leading up to the roundup, Gonzales said, the marshals' phone line was "ringing off the hook" with calls from fugitives wanting details.

DOJ_NMG_0095077

Gonzales, along with Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio and Attorney Andrew Thomas, stressed that defendants are not being offered amnesty — only a promise that prosecutors will consider the voluntary surrender.

White said he believes that turning himself in helped his case: He was free to leave after the proceedings. A county commissioner at the church quashed one of his warrants; the other will be addressed in a municipal court.

On Wednesday, Gonzales said he was surprised by the turnout so early in the program. "I thought it would start off slow and build up. This is good," he said. "It just shows the desperation."

Despite the program's initial success in Ohio, there have been problems. In Albuquerque, authorities abandoned plans because they lacked resources. And a surrender program in Camden, N.J., was canceled after the state Supreme Court balked because of concerns about mixing church and state.

Elliott and Gonzales said that while ministers support the program and churches provide a venue, Fugitive Safe Surrender doesn't involve preaching or proselytizing.

"This is all about trust," Elliott said. "It's not a faith-based program. It is a law enforcement program that is faith-based in nature."

IMMIGRATION:

29 Immigrants Arrested For Visa Fraud (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 16, 2006

Federal agents on Wednesday arrested 29 people, mostly Pakistanis, who allegedly posed as Muslim religious workers to obtain special visas to enter the USA.

The immigrants, arrested in Boston; New York City; Buffalo; Hartford, Conn.; Atlanta; St. Paul; Newark, N.J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D.C., and Harrisburg, Va., face civil immigration charges and could be deported if they are found to have violated federal law, said Marc Raimondi, spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). Agents involved in the investigation also arrested eight people on other immigration charges, he said.

The arrests were part of a probe into several organizations that posed as legitimate religious groups and filed false visa applications for the immigrants under the religious worker program, ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said.

The immigrants paid fees, sometimes several thousand dollars, for the fraudulent paperwork, Boyd said. He said he could not release the groups' names because the investigation was continuing.

The religious worker program allows churches, synagogues, mosques, temples and other religious organizations in the USA to sponsor visa applications for immigrants with specific religious training and experience. The visas allow a legal visitor to work only in a religion-related job for a limited time, generally no more than three years.

The immigrants arrested Wednesday worked at non-religious jobs, Raimondi said. Among them: gas station attendant, truck driver and factory worker.

"If these allegations are true, it is sad to see people misuse the religious-worker visa program in an attempt to gain fraudulent immigration status in the United States," said Arsalan Iftikhar, national legal director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "In a time where increased dialogue is needed between people of all faiths, it is imperative that initiatives like the religious-worker visa program continue to bring credible religious workers of all faiths to America."

As Congress has wrestled with immigration policy since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, ICE has increased enforcement efforts against document fraud, fugitive aliens convicted of violent crimes and workplaces that employ illegal workers.

In a report released in July, the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services said the religious-worker classification was "historically considered to have a high fraud rate."

The agency said it examined a sample of religious-worker immigration petitions submitted over a six-month period and found fraud in one-third of the cases.

DOJ_NMG_0095078

DHS Watchdog Warns 'Fence' Cost Will Grow (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration's proposal to secure the nation's borders with a high-tech "virtual fence" is likely to cost far more than the $2 billion that industry analysts initially estimated, possibly up to $30 billion, a government watchdog agency warned yesterday.

According to the Homeland Security Department inspector general, the ambitious plan to deploy sensors, cameras and other surveillance technology along 6,000 miles of the borders with Canada and Mexico runs the risk of runaway costs because of poorly defined objectives and a vastly overstretched contracting staff at the department.

The dramatically higher estimates, delivered to House members by Inspector General Richard L. Skinner, injected a new dose of skepticism into the national debate to curb illegal immigration, which has focused in large part on gaining control of the borders.

Critics have charged that a Republican-led Congress and President Bush approved legislation with much fanfare this fall authorizing the construction of a 700-mile fence along a third of the Mexican frontier without funding the work.

Now, the feasibility of the Bush administration's preferred plan, to which Congress has dedicated $1.2 billion and which is beginning on a pilot basis along a 28-mile stretch south of Tucson, drew fresh doubts from Congress as it moves into Democratic control.

Immigration-policy experts said the red flags raised over the border-security initiative could increase pressure on Congress to act on other measures they say are needed, such as stepping up enforcement against U.S. employers who hire illegal workers, cracking down on immigrants who overstay their visas, and overhauling legal immigration channels.

"If it's going to cost 8 to 30 billion dollars," asked Deborah W. Meyers, a senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute, ". . . is that really the most effective way of achieving the policy goal?"

Bush administration allies said the report underscores the need for a guest-worker program, which the president has proposed, to meet the demand for labor in this nation and reduce pressure at the border by illegal crossers.

Members of a House homeland security oversight panel stressed yesterday how the government's poor track record on border enforcement undermined their confidence. A much smaller attempt in the 1990s to deploy remote-sensing technology on the border "started as a $2 million program and turned into a quarter-billion-dollar disaster," said Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), becoming "a poster child of government waste and mismanagement."

"It seems like deja vu all over again," said Rep. Kendrick B. Meek (D-Fla.).

Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R-Ind.) contrasted the administration's assertion that it could gain control of the border by 2009 with what the White House was prepared to pay for. Souder said he was "baffled" by the department's selection in September of aerospace giant Boeing Co. to lead the open-ended effort without more certainty about final cost.

"It could be between 2 and 30 billion dollars, you're not sure which? . . . So it's pie in the sky, 'give us your best shot'?" Souder said. "It just seems extraordinary."

Gregory Giddens, director of the DHS Secure Border Initiative program, and Deborah J. Spero, deputy commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said cost estimates are premature because the administration has not settled on a strategy or decided what it will buy. The cost could be far lower and, responding to congressional pressure, DHS will provide a more detailed blueprint of its plans by Dec. 4.

"We do not have a cost estimate publicly," Giddens said.

Industry sources also expressed surprise at the inspector general's estimate, which ranged from $8 billion to $30 billion. The lower figure had been discussed informally, according to people familiar with competition among Boeing and four other firms. The consensus estimate given publicly, though, was that the project would be worth $2 billion to $2.5 billion.

Former DHS inspector general Clark Kent Ervin said agency officials have underestimated the cost of major programs in the past, partly to sell them to Congress and partly because DHS contracting officers were overwhelmed. In August, 69 of 252 jobs in the office managing the Secure Border Initiative Network project were filled, Skinner reported, and plans call for two-thirds of contract overseers to be contractors.

DOJ_NMG_0095079

We Must Start Over On Immigration Reform (HILL)

By Manuel A. Miranda

The Hill, November 16, 2006

The recent election did not reward hard-liners on immigration, but voters and those who chose not to vote also punished Republicans for an irresponsible immigration solution in the Senate.

Just before the election, the president signed the Border Fence Law. It was not the immigration bill he wanted. Last year, House Republican leaders stopped cold the president's proposal that would have used a guest-worker program as the path to legalize over 12 million illegal immigrants. With far less reluctance, House Republicans rejected a Senate bill that made the president's guest-worker plan worse — much worse. This was a rare act of statecraft, if not courage. All Americans want a solution to address our failed immigration policy, but not necessarily that one.

Exit polls show that 57 percent of voters want to offer a legal status to illegal immigrants, while 38 percent want to deport them. Those are two sizeable, countervailing numbers that politicians should not ignore. Election over, it is time for a cohesive immigration reform.

We all need to take a deep breath and start working for a reform short on slogans and Band-Aid solutions and long on far-sighted policy. Conservatives especially need to throw cold water on our faces. The loss of the Republican leadership in the House means the jig is up. A Senate filibuster is the only hope to block another bloated bill that fails to solve the real problem: America's short-sighted immigration policies.

In 2001, President Bush promised the then-president of Mexico, Vicente Fox, that he would seek a legal status for America's illegal immigrants, over 70 percent of whom are Mexican. In return, the Mexican president promised major fiscal reforms so his people might stay home. Fox never made good. Mexico's fiscal policies only worsened, pushing more Mexicans across the border. President Bush should not feel obliged.

The White House needs to give up the guest-worker program as the only solution, and congressional leaders on each side must distance themselves from the simplistic desires of their supporters. Each major interest can get something, without abandoning America's interests.

All experience suggests that a guest-worker program that is not temporary does more long-term harm than temporary good. It will certainly not work if its true purpose is the legalization of millions. Even so, there is only one good argument against a true guest-worker program: This country has never intentionally sought a peasant class. We would not be the same America if we start now.

A guest-worker program, however, that is truly temporary, and measured to obtain targeted regional and sector-driven goals, can be achieved without injuring our national character. So there is room to give the president, Mexico, liberals, free-traders, bishops and pastors what they want: legal status for some, though not all, illegal immigrants.

No one could reasonably disagree with placing security and employment enforcement first. And no one should be so cold-hearted as to ignore the harm we do with policies blind to the failure of the source country that exports its poor. Illegal immigration is a human tragedy that disrupts lives and separates families. It is a failure of two governments: the one that fails its people and the one that invites their departure for cheap labor's sake. A cohesive reform cannot leave unaddressed the obligation of our neighbors to heal themselves.

Political reality suggests that there will be no solution that disguises an amnesty or fails to legalize millions, but there will be no cohesive reform if millions today translate into tens of millions tomorrow. A policy reform that does not put everything on the table, including the so-called "anchor baby" policy, by which the children of illegal immigrants (and even tourists) become citizens upon mere birth here, and chain migration, by which whole clans get a foot in the door, is no reform at all.

Achieving a cohesive reform requires abandoning Band-Aid solutions. The truth is that, barring disparate regional impacts, which are real, America can absorb (and assimilate) millions of people, but just doing that is not a policy. And neither is a border fence.

The greatest obstacle to immigration reform has been the confines of this past year's debate. We must start over.

Miranda is former immigration counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). He became a citizen in 1976.

DOJ_NMG_0095080

No Mandate For Amnesty (USAT)

By Mark Krikorian

USA Today, November 16, 2006

President Bush and his Democratic allies on immigration are pointing to the results of last week's elections as a mandate for what they call "comprehensive" reform — but what most people would rightly call amnesty for illegal aliens.

The results suggest nothing of the kind; in the face of deep discontent with Republicans over Iraq and a cascade of scandals, immigration probably didn't decide any races at all, largely because most Democrats wisely avoided any mention of amnesty and focused on enforcement.

Assuming the election analysis by the president and others is a sincere mistake, however, it likely stems from a misunderstanding of the options we face to deal with the illegal population of about 12 million people. Almost all polling has offered respondents only the unpalatable choice of mass deportations or amnesty.

But there is a third way, and that is the approach embodied in the bill passed nearly a year ago by the House. Sometimes called "attrition through enforcement," such a policy would strictly enforce immigration laws (something we have never tried) so as to limit new illegal settlement and cause illegal immigrants already here to go home over time.

The result would be an annual decrease in the illegal population, instead of continuing increases. Research by my Center for Immigration Studies found that this approach could cut the illegal population by half in five years, requiring only a modest increase in resources and using only normal law-enforcement tools.

In a pre-election poll of likely voters, done for the center by the Polling Company Inc. using neutral language (i.e., without the words "amnesty" or "aliens"), 44% backed enforcing laws "to cause illegal immigrants to go home over time." An additional 20% wanted roundups and deportations; only 31% supported legalization. When offered the full range of choices, amnesty is rejected 2-1.

Supporters of legalization would do well to keep this in mind, lest they be surprised in the presidential election of 2008.

Mark Krikorian is executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a think tank that supports tighter controls on immigration.

TAX:

The Economic Agenda (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

THE MIDTERM elections were in part a repudiation of Republican economic priorities. The economy has grown strongly for five years even though it is slowing now, but the fruits of prosperity have not been shared widely. While corporate profits and pay for people at the top have risen, the majority of the workforce has experienced a stagnation of pay that stretches back, with only brief respites, to around 1980. The Republican Party has veered between denying the data and acknowledging middle-class anxiety while offering nothing to assuage it. The Democrats have understood the nation's economic insecurity, and they have been rewarded.

Having diagnosed the problem correctly, Democrats need a prescription. Some remedies that were tested during the campaign are not promising. As Slate's Jacob Weisberg has written, Democrats offered a mixture of economic populism (blaming middle-class insecurity on rich Americans) and economic nationalism (blaming middle-class insecurity on poor foreigners). But a populist drive to impose a surtax on energy companies will guarantee higher energy prices by deterring investment in new sources of supply. A populist attack on pharmaceutical companies will produce a lobbying war without solving the problems of health care. The real waste in the system is not that people overpay for drugs, but rather that they consume tests and other services without regard to their cost.

As for economic nationalism, clamping down on trade might help workers in declining manufacturing industries. But restricting imports would push up prices for people in the service sector, which includes hotel janitors, fast-food workers and other modestly paid groups, so the net effect on poor and middle-income families would probably be negative. Restricting immigration sounds like a good way to push wages up -- if there are fewer workers, surely the price of their work will rise? But economic studies find this effect is either negligible or nonexistent. Restricting the supply of low-wage labor may simply cause labor-intensive industries to shift abroad, or it may drive employers to buy extra tools and machines and so get by with fewer workers. Either way, a reduction in the supply of workers may be matched by lower demand for workers, which would explain why U.S. cities without immigrants haven't experienced more wage gains than cities with lots of them.

DOJ_NMG_0095081

The good news is that the Democrats are not tied to these bad policies. One populist promise on which they propose to act promptly happens also to be reasonable: Raising the federal minimum wage makes sense because it is so low that lifting it probably won't hurt job creation. Beyond that, Democrats need to come up with policies that address inequality while not damaging growth, starting perhaps with tax reform. The existing system of tax breaks for savings, homeownership and health care favors the wealthy while draining billions from the government. Restructuring these tax breaks could shrink the deficit while freeing money for Democratic spending plans. Moreover, the Bush administration is on record as supporting tax reform. Here is an opportunity to make bipartisan progress: in a word, to govern.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Put Nominations Back On Table (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — White House officials said Wednesday that President Bush would renominate six of his earlier choices to sit on the federal appeals court, leaving Democratic senators and other analysts to ponder what message he is sending.

At least four of the nominations have been declared dead on arrival in the Senate by Democrats who have consistently opposed them as unacceptable. All six nominations will remain before the Senate through the lame-duck session of Congress and then will expire.

When the 110th Congress is seated in January, Mr. Bush can deliver another list of judicial nominees to the Senate, which will by then have a Democratic majority.

Mr. Bush's motive in sending up the nominations has been closely analyzed, with several Democrats and liberals labeling it as provocative and a sign that he does not intend to seek compromise as he suggested he would after Republican losses in the elections last week.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee. "For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base rather than an indication of things to come."

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will be the leader of the Judiciary Committee, said, "Barely a week after the president promised to change course by working in a bipartisan and cooperative way with Congress, it is disappointing that he has decided to 'stay the course' on judicial nominees."

But Edward Whelan, the president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, who has supported Mr. Bush's judicial nominations throughout the first term, said Democrats were engaging in "rhetorical gamesmanship." He said that despite the changed numbers in the Senate, Mr. Bush was not obliged to offer a unilateral surrender. He said the president was resubmitting the nominees for the lame-duck session because Democrats had refused to comply with the usual courtesy and moved to have the nominations expire at the last recess.

The four nominees whose chances of confirmation are viewed as nearly impossible are: William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's general counsel who was involved in setting many of the interrogation policies for detainees; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

DOJ_NMG_0095082

The other nominees, who have not aroused as much opposition, are N. Randy Smith, a district judge in Idaho, and Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the civil division of the Justice Department.

White House Resubmits Appeals Court Nominees Opposed By Democrats (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration, trying to push through judicial nominations before Republicans lose control of the Senate, resubmitted six nominees deemed by Democrats too conservative for the federal bench.

Five nominees were the subject of an angry exchange in August when Democrats said their selection was a sop to the president's conservative base.

The White House on Wednesday submitted Terrence Boyle of North Carolina and William James Haynes II of Virginia to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.; Michael Brunson Wallace of Mississippi to the 5th Circuit in New Orleans; Peter Keisler of Maryland to the District of Columbia Circuit; and William Gerry Myers III and Norman Randy Smith, both of Idaho, for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco.

Everyone except Keisler has generated intense opposition from Democrats.

Under Senate rules the nominations must be resubmitted after Congress takes an extended break, as was the case this year for the 2006 election.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Judiciary Committee. "For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base, rather than an indication of things to come."

Sen. Jon Cornyn, R-Texas, a vocal backer of many of Bush's judicial picks, said he thought it would be "very tough" to get the nominees through the Senate during the lame-duck session. But, he added, "Hope springs eternal."

Cornyn said judicial nominees will test the Democrats' stated desire to run the Senate with greater bipartisanship.

"We'll see whether now that they're in majority status, if we're going to have ideological litmus tests for judges," Cornyn said.

The president's picks for the federal bench have sparked angry debate in the Senate. The incoming majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada, once threatened to filibuster Boyle's nomination if it came to the full Senate.

Haynes was an architect of the Bush administration's eventually abandoned policy on the treatment of terrorism detainees. He later told a Senate panel that reversing the policy was the "right thing to do."

Bush this week also has sent several nonjudicial nominees to the Senate. One was Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, renominated as chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, the agency that directs U.S. overseas broadcasts. His nomination has bogged down because of allegations of misconduct. A report released in August by the State Department's inspector general said Tomlinson misused government funds for two years as the board chairman. He disputed the allegations.

Bush Resubmits Six U.S. Appellate Court Nominees (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush resubmitted six appellate-court nominees, who earlier drew objections from Democrats, for Senate consideration in the waning days of the Republican majority.

The Senate returned the six appeals-court nominees to the president in late September when Congress recessed to campaign for midterm elections. The elections gave Democrats a majority in the Senate starting in January and the power to block confirmation of the nominees.

Bush's decision to resubmit the six nominees was criticized by Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, who will be chairman the Judiciary Committee in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

``The president is choosing partisanship over progress and division over unity," Leahy said in a statement. ``The signal the president is sending by renominating these controversial candidates is regrettable."

Bush spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said the White House is ``hopeful that the days of obstruction are behind us."

``We view this as a logical step in the judicial nomination process," she said.

The Judiciary Committee's current chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, said yesterday, ``It is obvious that they cannot move" through the Senate before the Democrats take control.

Defense Department Counsel

The resubmitted nominees include William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel who helped devise military interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. Democrats and some Republicans argue the interrogation policy encouraged abuse of prisoners seized in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Democrats, including Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, have questioned whether Haynes was evasive during a July hearing when he was questioned about how the interrogation policy was adopted.

Haynes, 48, was nominated for a seat on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia. Also nominated for that court was Terrence W. Boyle, 60, a federal trial judge in North Carolina who Democrats argue has shown hostility to employment discrimination lawsuits.

Bush also renominated Michael B. Wallace, 55, a Jackson, Mississippi, lawyer who the American Bar Association's judicial screening committee found professionally ``unqualified" for a seat on the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Wallace is a former aide to Senator Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican.

Myers

William G. Myers III, 51, a mining and ranching lobbyist, was renominated for a seat on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Democrats object to Myers' record as an opponent of environmental laws, arguing that as the Interior Department's solicitor he promoted corporate interests over enforcement of regulations to protect federal land.

Peter D. Keisler, head of the Justice Department's civil division, was renominated for a seat on the Washington-based D.C. Circuit.

The panel's eight Democrats objected in July to considering Keisler's nomination, citing a longstanding dispute over whether to fill the vacancy on the Washington court. During Bill Clinton's presidency, Republicans refused to act on nominations to fill the seat, citing a decline in the court's workload.

California Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein has opposed the confirmation of N. Randy Smith, an Idaho resident, on the basis that he was nominated to fill a seat on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals traditionally reserved for a California resident.

Leahy has suggested that Bush nominate Smith for the Idaho seat that Myers has been picked to fill.

Bush Renominates Judicial Picks (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

President Bush renominated six previously blocked candidates for federal appeals court yesterday, triggering the first real battle with ascendant Democrats since the midterm elections and signaling what could be the start of a fierce two-year struggle over the shape of the federal judiciary.

The move heartened conservatives who worried that Bush would scale back his ambition to move courts to the right and outraged liberals, who called it a violation of the spirit of bipartisanship promised since Democrats captured Congress. Both sides saw it as a possible harbinger for the remainder of Bush's presidency, particularly if a Supreme Court vacancy opens.

The decision to send back the six nominees, along with four new candidates for the bench, was a provocative maneuver intended to signal that Bush does not plan to cower in the face of an opposition Congress, because the Senate almost certainly will not act on them in the lame-duck session that adjourns next month. If Bush wants to keep pushing for these nominations, he will have to resubmit them in January, when the Senate reconvenes with a 51-vote Democratic majority.

"We are hopeful that the days of judicial obstruction are behind us," said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. Noting that a Republican Senate confirmed 15 of Bill Clinton's nominees to the federal appeals bench in his last two years as president, she added: "We are hopeful that President Bush's nominees will receive a fair up-or-down vote."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said none of the six would be confirmed. "It's a real slap in the face," he said by telephone. "It basically makes you think the talk of bipartisanship is just talk. . . . I guess it's a sop to the right, but if he's going to keep doing sops to the right, it means they didn't pay attention to the results of the election."

DOJ_NMG_0095084

Judgeships have been a priority for conservatives and a major flashpoint between Bush and congressional Democrats. A group of centrist senators from both parties last year brokered a truce in the nomination war and Bush secured confirmation for two Supreme Court nominees, John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. In his final days on the campaign trail, Bush warned supporters that a Democratic Senate would never have confirmed Roberts or Alito and would stonewall future nominations.

Now he appears ready to test that proposition. None of the six nominees resubmitted yesterday received a Senate floor vote: Michael B. Wallace for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit; William J. Haynes II and Terrence W. Boyle Jr. for the 4th Circuit; William G. Myers III and Norman Randy Smith for the 9th Circuit; and Peter D. Keisler for the D.C. Circuit.

In addition, he sent four new nominations: James E. Rogan to the U.S. District Court in California; Benjamin H. Settle to the district court in Washington state; and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott W. Stucky to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Rogan, a Republican former congressman, is the most prominent of the four, having served as one of the House managers who prosecuted Clinton during his 1999 impeachment trial.

Four of the previously blocked nominees were criticized as unqualified or too conservative. One of the others ran into objections from California senators who did not want his seat moved to Idaho and the last was stalled by assertions that the caseload on his circuit did not justify another judge. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said Tuesday that he would not move the nominations during the lame-duck session.

Elliot Mincberg, legal director of the liberal People for the American Way, said: "This is a disturbing sign . . . in terms of Bush trying to reach out for genuine consultation and consensus. But even more important will be what he does in January. If he takes the same tack in January, then he signals that he wants confrontation."

Conservatives hope that is what Bush wants and say it will test Democrats' commitment to bipartisanship. "The president's sending the message that he's not going to deviate one iota from his judicial philosophy, which is that he's going to send up nominees who don't legislate from the bench," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel of Pat Robertson's American Center for Law and Justice, who advises the White House.

Bush Resubmits 6 For Judgeships (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

The White House yesterday resubmitted six contentious judicial nominees to the Senate in what Republicans said was a signal President Bush will fight over judges even under Democratic control, and Democrats said proves the president already has forsaken bipartisanship.

In addition to the six resubmissions -- needed because the nominees had been automatically returned to the White House during the October recess -- Mr. Bush also sent over four new nominees.

The White House said the nominations are "a logical step" meant to keep the confirmation process on track.

"These renominations simply restore the nominees to the position they were in prior to the [October] recess, when the nominees were pending in the Senate and awaiting fair consideration of an up-or-down vote," said Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman.

But several of those nominees would have a difficult time gaining a majority vote, and with little time left in this year's session and with Democrats about to take control next year, nothing is likely to happen.

"There is zero, zip, zilch chance of any of these judges making it through the Senate killing fields in the waning days," said one Republican aide, who has watched the nominees situation but asked not to be identified. "Without a plan for successful confirmation from the White House, the only point is to fly the flag as the judicial-confirmation ship slips beneath the waves. Burble, gurgle."

All nominees expire at the end of this year, and Democrats said with so little time left, Mr. Bush's move proves he is playing a partisan game rather than trying to work with them.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and a point man for his party on judicial nominees.

DOJ_NMG_0095085

But Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, a conservative group that advocates for judges, said Democrats forced the issue by denying Mr. Bush the usual courtesy of carrying the judges over the recess. That is why Mr. Bush had to resubmit the six contentious ones yesterday.

"It's a bullying tactic to try to paint the president into backing off from these nominees," he said.

The six resubmissions are Terrence W. Boyle and William James Haynes II to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, Peter D. Keisler to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, William Gerry Myers III and Norman Randy Smith to the 9th Circuit and Michael Brunson Wallace to the 5th Circuit.

The new nominees are James Edward Rogan to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, Benjamin Hale Settle to the District Court for the Western District of Washington and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott Wallace Stucky to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

It is a curious end to a year that began with the confirmation of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court. But since then, confirmations have dropped off. One key senator earlier this year blamed the White House for not sending up new nominees fast enough, though Mr. Rushton said the Senate leadership failed to push the pending nominees.

House, Senate Pass Stopgap Funding Bill (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Congress passed a bill Wednesday that keeps open those agencies awaiting approval of their budgets as lawmakers seek a deal on lots of unfinished fiscal business.

The temporary spending measure sped through the House and Senate on voice votes. Without passage, 13 Cabinet agencies would have had to close down Friday at midnight. When President Bush signs the bill, the government will remain open through Dec. 8.

The bill's passage was the only significant accomplishment Wednesday by the postelection Congress. Senate leaders had hoped to turn to an agriculture spending bill and a bill to allow civilian nuclear fuel shipments to India, but lawmakers quickly bogged down.

Republican conservatives want to slow the appropriations process. They fear that Appropriations Committee members will muscle through a massive spending bill full of parochial projects as one of the last acts of Congress before Republicans lose control.

Farm-state Democrats, meanwhile, demanded a vote on a multibillion dollar billion farm disaster aid plan as part of the agriculture spending measure.

The net result was gridlock broken only by passage of the stopgap measure.

Congress has yet to finish nine of 11 spending bills for the budget year that began Oct. 1. Those bills total more than $460 billion. The only practicable way of finishing them before lawmakers exit Washington for good in December is to bundle them into one or more multiple bill proposals.

But there are divisions among Republican over whether to even try to advance the spending bills. Without GOP unity, it will be virtually impossible to do so. That raises the prospect that Democrats will have to tackle the difficult task after taking control of Congress in January.

Past Is Not Prologue For Gates (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Democrats could find themselves walking a fine line as the chamber takes up Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates, weighing the value of regime change at the Pentagon after six stormy years of Secretary Donald Rumsfeld against their new position of power as an incoming majority.

The dozen sitting Democrats who voted against Gates when he took over as CIA director in 1991 face a particular challenge as they re-examine old allegations about Gates's role in intelligence-gathering during the Iran-Contra affair. Several

DOJ_NMG_0095086

CIA colleagues came forward then to charge Gates with twisting intelligence to fit the White House agenda, criticism that had derailed an earlier Gates bid to head the agency.

The Senate's Democratic majority ended up confirming Gates in 1991, with eight members who are still serving voting yes — including new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Yet, those 12 Democratic votes against Gates in 1991 appear to set little precedent for Senate Democrats ready to replace Rumsfeld's combative and closed leadership style with Gates, a former member of the independent Iraq Study Group that will soon weigh in on the Iraq war policy.

The first senator to reveal that he would reverse an old vote against Gates was Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who told ABC's "This Week" on Sunday that a desire to change course in Iraq would overcome his former skepticism about Iran-Contra.

"To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there," Biden said.

Another Democrat who had opposed Gates's CIA bid, Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.), then attributed his vote to unanswered questions about Gates's politicization of intelligence, a charge reminiscent of some war critics' view that the Bush administration "cherry-picked" intelligence to justify invading Iraq.

"In the spirit of moving along," Baucus said on Monday, he would likely support Gates this time around. "Gates is certainly qualified."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), who will take over the Intelligence Committee next year, gave a floor speech against Gates in 1991. Rockefeller said in a statement last week, however, that choosing Gates to head Defense "may signal that [Bush] is searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror."

Other Democrats set to become committee chairmen in January voiced discontent 15 years ago over Gates's role in sharing intelligence with Saddam Hussein during Iraq's 1980s war with Iran, including Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and Tom Harkin (Iowa). Seven other sitting Democrats voted against Gates then: Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), John Kerry (Mass.), Frank Lautenberg (N.J.), Kent Conrad (N.D.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Carl Levin (Mich.), and Paul Sarbanes (Md.). Sen. Jim Jeffords (I-Vt.), who, like Sarbanes, is retiring this year, also voted against Gates.

Levin will take over the Armed Services Committee next year, but he is not likely to gavel in any Gates hearings. Levin and current Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) are planning to start the confirmation process when the Senate returns from Thanksgiving recess and complete it as soon as possible.

What is unclear is whether Democratic senators will view their past votes on Gates as a precedent; the caucus's unified effort to effect positive change in Iraq and begin a phased redeployment of troops is certain to play into the debate. Reid, who voted to install Gates at the CIA in 1991, said at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast yesterday that he welcomes a swift process.

"There is some urgency in our minds to move this along as quickly as possible," said Reid, who noted that Gates's ties to Iran-Contra did concern him. "I certainly want to get rid of Rumsfeld, sooner rather than later."

Levin has said that he will re-examine Gates impartially, adding this week that "the last 15 years are more important to me [than Iran-Contra]. … I'll give him a fresh, fair hearing."

Democrats are conscious of the need to thoroughly examine Gates before sending him to replace Rumsfeld, who had become a symbol of the Bush administration's Iraq missteps for members of both parties. Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), Democrats' new third-ranking leader, was in the House during Gates's last confirmation vote but cautioned that Democrats "do not want to do anything dilatory."

Democrats will be asking, "Does he have an independent mind?" Schumer said.

Reid and Schumer addressed several other future goals at the Monitor breakfast. Senate Democratic leaders are considering legislation to establish criminal penalties for election fraud and manipulation, a response to widespread reports last week that Democratic voters were targeted with late-night robo-calls and efforts to mislead them away from the polls.

Reid also hinted that the outside fundraising groups that have become pivotal to Democratic campaign operations would be scrutinized by the Democratic majority.

"We're going to have to take a real close look at 527s," Reid said.

DOJ_NMG_0095087

Lott Beats Alexander 25-24 For Comeback (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Republicans chose Trent Lott (Miss.) as their new whip yesterday by the narrowest of margins, cementing his comeback after four years out of leadership and signaling a GOP minority ready to assert itself and bounce back from defeat.

Lott bested Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who began openly campaigning more than a year ago, by 25 votes to 24. Senators said Lott's proven negotiating ability and his institutional knowledge made the difference as Republicans prepare to move into a full cycle of minority status for the first time since 1995.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who was unopposed in his bid for conference chairman, said "experience" was the singular force behind Lott's last-minute triumph against the well-liked Alexander. "There's nobody better at working with other folks, including across the aisle, than Trent."

Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) echoed that sentiment, saying, "I want people with confidence and people who will work well with the Democrats" in the leadership.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) noted Lott's rededication to the party as he worked his way back from the turbulence of 2002, when the Mississippian was forced out as majority leader under pressure from the White House after making remarks seen as racially insensitive.

"Trent Lott was a great team player after suffering a great emotional defeat for him," said Allard, who publicly supported Alexander. "He has worked hard since then. I think [Lott backers] appreciate that."

Lott has called the whip's post the best job in the capital, and yesterday said it was the "job I have loved to do the most." The longtime House whip, who also won a one-vote Senate whip election in 1995 against former Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), must now try to divert the media attention he naturally attracts toward the Republicans' new majority leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

Arriving before the cameras yesterday, the new GOP leadership team referred to McConnell one question about the conference's post-election mood – "upbeat," he said, "which may surprise you" – before the topic turned to Lott. The new whip demurred, seeking to shift the spotlight back onto McConnell, "where it belongs." McConnell then closed down the press conference.

The challenge McConnell and Lott face in ensuring that the latter does not upstage the former will be amplified as senators jostle to position themselves for presidential bids. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the GOP's frontrunner, was a strong Lott booster as the latter delayed any public campaigning until Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the natural heir to the whip job, lost his reelection race.

Less than 18 months ago, Lott was the subject of rampant retirement rumors after Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast, demolishing his family home in Pasacagoula, Miss. But the personal setback appeared to reinvigorate the institutionalist Lott, who took on an increasingly helpful role for the GOP leadership led by the man installed to replace him, outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Lott also led the way at times as Republican lawmakers asserted their independence from the Bush administration. Lott publicly warned the president in March that if he vetoed legislation negating a ports takeover by a Middle-Eastern company, "Okay, big boy, I'll just vote to override your veto."

That independence was a factor for Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), another Lott backer, who said the events of 2002 were water under the bridge.

"Trent understands … that what the president may want may not be what we can advance," said the centrist Snowe. "You have to have a broader umbrella for all Republicans. Not every Republican is going to be able to vote the same way."

Republican senators cast a unified vote for the rest of their leadership, including Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) as GOP Policy Committee chairwoman, John Cornyn (R-Texas) as conference vice-chairman and John Ensign (R-Nev.) as National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman.

Cornyn said yesterday that the closeness of the whip vote would leave no lingering tension in the conference, adding that Alexander would play a key role.

DOJ_NMG_0095088

"I would not be surprised," Cornyn said, if a leadership position tailored to Alexander's strengths were created. Senate Democrats crafted their own new post this week for their victorious campaign chief, Charles Schumer (N.Y.).

Cornyn, whose new mandate is to hone and articulate the GOP message, also described a willingness among Republicans to heed the Democratic majority's call for bipartisanship but rebel when it is called for. "It doesn't mean we are going to be unnecessarily partisan … but we can shape, or in some cases stop, legislation," he said.

McConnell had a similar message, telling reporters that "we represent a vigorous body of 49, and hopefully a minority that is only in this position for a couple of years."

Republican Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Gordon Smith (Ore.) gave Lott's nominating speeches, according to sources, while Sens. Bob Bennett (Utah) and Johnny Isakson (Ga.) gave Alexander's.

Democrats, who faced no contested leadership races, were watching the contest almost as avidly as Republicans. Mississippi Rep. Gene Taylor (D) issued a statement hailing Lott's win, and new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said at a breakfast interview yesterday morning that he has "great affection for Trent Lott."

"Behind the scenes the past two years, he has been extremely helpful to me," Reid said.

Roxana Tiron contributed to this report.

Lott Returns To Senate Leadership (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Mississippi's Trent Lott barreled back into the Senate Republican leadership as party whip when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

The narrow 25-24 caucus vote echoed Mr. Lott's 1994 victory when he wrested the same No. 2 party post from former Wyoming Sen. Alan Simpson. But this triumph also spelled redemption for a man who rose as high as Senate majority leader before falling precipitously in 2002.

For President Bush, the Mississippian's return could be a mixed blessing. Mr. Lott blamed the White House for contributing to his ouster, but he brings a set of legislative skills that the administration sorely needs to move its agenda in the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

After four years of Bill Frist, the retiring Senate leader who never seemed at home in the chamber, Republicans are hungry for a proven expediter. Mr. Frist's Tennessee colleague, Sen. Lamar Alexander, who began campaigning for the whip's post a year ago, couldn't withstand Mr. Lott's late surge.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) said of Mr. Lott: "He goes across the aisle better than any other member of our caucus. He has an intuitive sense of the way this place works."

"He's the best I've seen in 20 years in the Senate in working both the Senate and the other side of the Capitol," said Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.).

Mr. Lott fell from power after suggesting at a televised party in December 2002 that the nation would have had fewer problems if the segregationist policies of the old Dixiecrat Party in the South had prevailed. He denied any racist intent but was rebuked by the president and complained that the White House encouraged efforts to replace him with Mr. Frist.

Mr. Lott was emotional after his triumph and pledged his loyalty to the new Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.). Mr. McConnell had signaled privately that he wouldn't work against Mr. Lott's comeback, but the victory also reflects changes in the senator as a person.

Mr. Lott reached out to colleagues like Sen. McCain, with whom he had fought in the past. And in seconding the nomination, Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith said Mr. Lott was stronger for having dealt with the twin setbacks of losing his leadership post and seeing his home state and Gulf Coast house devastated by Hurricane Katrina.

"If any man has gotten a one-two punch and gotten off the mat a better man, it's Trent Lott," Mr. Smith said.

Mr. Lott's return also underscores the human dimension of leadership elections in Congress, a huge factor again today for House Democrats deciding on majority leader for the coming Congress. Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the party whip, is seeking the post, but faces stiff resistance from Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, a Marine Vietnam veteran who has helped to galvanize public support for the party by speaking out against the Iraq war.

DOJ_NMG_0095089

Part of the fight is about loyalties, most notably those of Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.), the future speaker who publicly endorsed Mr. Murtha, a friend. Part also is about ideas. The 74-year-old Mr. Murtha has risked much of what he has in the House to press his case for a stronger stand on Iraq. And part is about money and the ethical problems that persist for Congress after an election in which corruption was an issue for voters.

Public Citizen, the consumer nonprofit group, last night released a study showing that Mr. Hoyer ranks far higher than Mr. Murtha in his dependency on special-interest political funds. But as the race tightens, Hoyer supporters have focused on Mr. Murtha's ethical scrapes and role as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam bribery scandal in 1980.

A videotape of Mr. Murtha meeting with an FBI operative posing as a cash-wielding Arab sheik was resurrected earlier this year by conservatives attacking his stand on Iraq. It has now come into play in the leadership race and could be fatal.

Mr. Murtha denies taking any money but remains very much an old school politician who lives by his own code. Others in similar circumstances have redeemed themselves in the public's eye by becoming reformers; Mr. Murtha is much more resistant to new rules as the solution, though he has promised to back an ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi.

House Republicans also have their caucus races -- and divisions -- which will play out tomorrow. Ohio Rep. John Boehner appears increasingly confident of keep his post as the new minority leader after Rep. Joe Barton (R., Tex.) withdrew last evening and pledged to support Mr. Boehner against the remaining challenger, Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.).

Write to David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com2

Senate Republicans Tap Lott For No. 2 Leadership Job (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans picked a blunt White House critic to be their party's second-in-command Wednesday, as they resurrected the political career of a lawmaker who once made comments viewed by some as racially insensitive.

President Bush called Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott from Air Force One to offer congratulations after Lott won the GOP's minority whip job over Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, who had predicted victory Tuesday night.

“We have a lot of important priorities to work on and as the president told Sen. Lott, he very much looks forward to working with him,” White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Lott stepped down as Senate majority leader in 2002 after he suggested the nation would have been better off if then-senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run as a segregationist “Dixiecrat.”

Since then, Lott has not shied from criticizing the White House.

•“They still need men and women of gravitas and stature,” Lott said of the administration in March, while also predicting that Bush would “be a drag in the fall” elections if his approval ratings did not rise.

•“The White House can become a cocoon. The president and vice president have to make sure they reach out and listen to a variety of voices,” Lott warned in an interview with USA TODAY before Bush began his second term.

Lott was more circumspect Wednesday as he joined Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, who was elected GOP leader, as the power brokers in the new Republican Senate minority.

Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada will be majority leader and Dick Durbin of Illinois will serve as majority whip when the new legislative term begins in January.

Even though Democrats will have a 51-49 vote edge in the Senate, the minority party can use parliamentary tactics to block legislation and nominations. McConnell said he would “lead a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 votes to do anything.”

Lott said he is “honored to be part of this leadership team … and to do a job that I've really loved the most: count the votes.” He also previously served as whip in the House and Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0095090

Lott's spokeswoman, Susan Irby, argued that the senators' vote of confidence in Lott was a credit to his “proven talent” as a vote counter and not a jab at Bush.

Paul Light, a professor of public service at New York University, believes administration officials likely are not so sanguine in private. “I doubt they're saying, ‘Gee, how great it is to see Trent back in the leadership chain,' ” Light said.

Lott beat Alexander on a 25-24 vote in a secret ballot. The whip serves as the party's chief vote counter and legislative tactician and is charged with enforcing party loyalty.

For Republicans, their leadership contest returns to the limelight a canny Southerner whose career seemed in tatters. In 2002, Lott said he was just trying to make Thurmond feel good at his 100th birthday party. Lott apologized repeatedly for his remarks.

“For Lott, it's a four-year journey from presumed ruin to undeniable redemption that is nothing short of remarkable,” said Sid Salter, a Mississippi political analyst and newspaper columnist for The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson, Miss.

Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, said some colleagues supported Lott because he'd not only been publicly embarrassed but also lost his Pascagoula, Miss., home in Hurricane Katrina. “This guy has been through hell,” Voinovich said. “There was some feeling that Trent got a bad deal several years ago. … This was some way of letting him know there is redemption.”

Lott is currently living out of a trailer on the site where his home used to be while he waits for insurance claims to be settled in court.

“Senators, like most Americans, like a comeback,” Alexander said.

Republicans Return Lott To Leadership (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Less than a half-hour after Republican senators voted to return Sen. Trent Lott to their leadership team, the Mississippi senator's phone rang. It was Vice President Dick Cheney, calling with congratulations on his election as the Senate's Republican whip, the No. 2 post, behind GOP minority leader-elect Mitch McConnell.

A few hours later, Cheney again delivered an atta-boy in person during a GOP policy lunch. So did White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolton. And President Bush rang from Air Force One.

Lott's redemption had begun — just four years after the same White House helped engineer his ouster as the party's Senate leader.

It must have been sweet. Lott, 65, did little to hide his resentment during his exile from the party's top Senate ranks, shoved out for rhetorical offense: At Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday bash, Lott had saluted the South Carolina senator with comments later interpreted as support for southern segregationist policies.

Lott explained. He apologized. But some Senate colleagues undermined him, he wrote in a book last year. White House officials demanded his ouster. And perhaps worse, Bush hurt his feelings by disavowing the comments in a tone that was "devastating ... booming and nasty."

What a difference four years makes. Bush's popularity is drooping over the war in Iraq. Angry voters stripped Republicans of their majority in the Nov. 7 elections. And in a 100-member chamber in which Democrats hold the majority by one senator, Lott is the Republican in charge of lining up and counting votes for the next two years — when members of both parties will be seeking legislative accomplishments to tout on the 2008 campaign trail.

That makes him powerful enough to get the White House's attention once again.

En route to Singapore, Bush "told Senator Lott that he looked forward to working with him in the upcoming Congress," according to White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

Another event during Lott's exile changed his relationship with the White House: Hurricane Katrina. The massive storm devastated Lott's home state, not to mention his historic oceanside home in Pascagoula. He found his refrigerator a few blocks away in a neighbor's yard. For him, the administration's bungled response was personal. He considered retiring this year, after three terms in the Senate and eight in the House.

But even as he was making that decision, Lott hinted to a reporter that he'd like to return to leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0095091

"I might do it just to make everybody nervous," he said last year.

The comeback is an apt outlet for Lott's talents. He was the rare majority leader who seemed to relish the vote-wrangling duties that some of his predecessors loathed. Lott appropriated former majority leader Howard Baker's derisive description of the job for the title of his tell-all memoir last year: "Herding Cats: A Life in Politics."

Last week, Lott began an under-the-radar campaign for whip, notwithstanding Tennessee Sen. Lamar Alexander's 18-month bid for the same job.

He shifted into prime cat-herding mode Tuesday evening when senators returned to the chamber for their first vote since the election. Buzzing from one colleague to the next, sitting, standing, gesturing and pausing to count a list of supporters, Lott lined them up even as Alexander's office boasted of as many as 30 votes.

The next morning, the mild-mannered Tennessee senator estimated Lott had peeled off three senators who had committed to Alexander but changed their minds. Lott won the election 25-24.

Living proof that there can be second acts in politics, Lott was uncharacteristically mum when he strode out of the caucus with the rest of the newly elected GOP leadership team. He was sticking to the pledge he made during his quiet campaign to not overshadow his party's new leader, McConnell. Asked if he felt vindicated, Lott just pressed his lips together and shook his head.

Trent Lott Rejoins Senate GOP Leadership (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Four years after he was ousted as majority leader for racially insensitive remarks at Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, Mississippi's Trent Lott returned to the GOP leadership ranks today.

In an election closer than the one that put Democrats in charge of the Senate, Republicans today narrowly chose Lott for the vote-counting whip position over Lamar Alexander of Tennessee by a 25-24 vote, giving Lott the No. 2 leadership slot.

Lott was forced to resign as majority leader in 2002 after the Bush White House joined a chorus of criticism over remarks in which Lott noted that Mississippi voted for South Carolina's Thurmond when he ran for president in 1948 on a states' rights platform that supported racial segregation.

"We voted for him," said Lott. "We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years either."

Lott explained that he had just made an off-the-cuff remark, but as demands grew for his resignation, he went on Black Entertainment Television to repudiate past votes against civil rights legislation and to affirm his support for affirmation action programs.

With the drumbeat growing for his removal, White House maneuvering forced Lott to resign his leadership post to make room for Tennessee's Bill Frist. In the years since, Lott has nursed his skills as a backbencher — talents for vote-counting and behind-the-scenes maneuvering now critical to a GOP in the minority. In his own campaign for reelection as a senator last week, Lott won with 64% of the vote.

"We're going to be a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 to do anything," said Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, elected unanimously to be the new Senate GOP leader. Introducing his new leadership team, McConnell said, "Hopefully, we're a minority that will only be in that position for a couple of years."

Lott deflected efforts by reporters to question him about his return to the leadership ranks, saying "the spotlight" should be on McConnell.

Hill observers were buzzing at the feat because Alexander — a former governor and Cabinet secretary — had campaigned for more than a year as a clean face choice for a demoralized party and had been boasting that he had the votes.

The vote within the Republican caucus could also reflect unhappiness with President Bush for engineering the switch to Frist, who was not considered a strong leader.

Other members of the new leadership team include: John Kyl of Arizona, Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, John Cornyn of Texas and John Ensign of Nevada, who will head the Republican senatorial campaign dedicated to returning Republicans to power after the 2008 elections.

DOJ_NMG_0095092

"We have a lot of incumbents to protect," he said. Expressing hope that "this title of minority we only have for two years," Ensign said, "We're going to look for a couple of (Democratic) targets."

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

In The End, It's Lott By A Single Ballot (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

Proving himself once again to be the master vote-counter the job requires, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) orchestrated a stunning return to the GOP leadership Wednesday by pulling off a one-vote upset of Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) to become the next Senate Minority Whip.

The former Majority Leader bested Alexander on a secret ballot tally of 25-24, but few dared to predict the outcome before Senators convened behind closed doors to elect their chain of command for the 110th Congress. Even heading into the vote, Alexander suggested the tally would be close and jokingly hoped the final outcome would reflect the 27 solid commitments he was convinced he had at 11 p.m. the previous night.

"I think Trent proved to be a better vote counter and I think Senators, like most Americans, like a comeback," Alexander said afterward. "He deserves great credit for that."

In signature Lott style, the veteran Senator was able to win by corralling a solid base of support, picking off a number of Alexander's backers and working his candidacy right up to the Wednesday-morning vote. Lott was seen walking into the Old Senate chambers talking with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), whom several GOP Senate aides characterized as one of the few remaining undecided lawmakers.

The vote in the Whip contest came after the Republican Conference confirmed Sen. Mitch McConnell's ascension to Minority Leader. He replaces retiring Sen. Bill Frist (Tenn.) as the GOP leader.

Lott's coup was somewhat remarkable given he entered the race long after Alexander, who had been campaigning for the job for more than a year. Lott, ousted as the Majority Leader in December 2002 after making remarks perceived as racially insensitive at the late Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, had been campaigning quietly in recent weeks but didn't formally jump into the Whip hunt until Monday night.

Yet the Mississippi Senator has made no secret that serving as the Republican Whip had been his most pleasurable leadership experience to date, and reiterated that sentiment Wednesday, saying he was delighted to "do a job that I've always really loved most, and that's count the votes."

Lott formerly served as the House GOP Whip and later as the Senate Republican Whip, a slot he also secured by a narrow one-vote margin when he took on and beat then-Sen. Alan Simpson (Wyo.). Just as Alexander was viewed as the frontrunner for the Whip job, many had predicted Simpson would outpoll Lott during that race in 1994.

Lott said he was "exhilarated to have the opportunity" to get another shot in the Republican leadership (those close to him said it would have been his last try at a comeback had he failed). As he campaigned, Lott and his allies touted his battle-tested abilities as a Whip, experience at making a deal and knowing how to be effective as a member of the minority — a status the Republicans have experienced only briefly over the past dozen years.

In the end, "it came down to negotiating skills and a strong professional relationship with Democrats, both rank and file and the Democratic leadership," said one GOP Senator who supported Lott. "And, I think, a common sense understanding of what Republican Members want from their leadership."

Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine), a Lott supporter, said the job "does require someone who's got that institutional knowledge and appreciation of what it's going to take not only to help rebuild the Republicans within the institution, but also nationally."

Even Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Majority Leader, gave a nod to Lott's political skills, saying: "I have great respect for his abilities ... behind the scenes he's been very helpful."

But for all Lott's attributes, he also may need to spend part of his honeymoon proving to his critics that he won't be overly outspoken or constantly overshadowing McConnell. Lott sought to dispel those concerns both privately to Senators on Wednesday morning, and again to the public when he emerged with McConnell and the five other newly elected leaders following the votes.

DOJ_NMG_0095093

Perhaps the strongest signal sent to his Conference came in the form of the two men he chose to nominate him: Sens. Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Judd Gregg (N.H.), who had only moments earlier performed the same task for McConnell.

The media savvy Lott spoke only briefly to the press, and when asked to talk about his return to the limelight with a victory over Alexander, he deferentially turned to the incoming Minority Leader, saying: "The spotlight belongs on him."

Snowe said Lott expressed that same desire to his colleagues in private, saying she believes such a posture "is most appropriate."

"He understands that his role is to help reinforce what the leader's going to be trying to achieve on behalf of all the Conference."

Beyond that, Lott will undoubtedly have to ride through the replay of how he fell from grace as the Majority Leader just four years ago. Lott's colleagues forced him from the helm after he implied that had Thurmond, a 1948 candidate for the White House, been elected president on a segregationist platform, we could have avoided "all these problems" we have today.

Several Republican Senators said Wednesday that it is time to let the past go.

"I think that people understand that he has been deeply apologetic and regrettable for having made those remarks," Snowe said.

Clearly, Lott's past was his greatest selling point and perhaps shortcoming, given those backing Alexander said it was a fresh face and loyalty they sought. Still, most agreed the closeness of the outcome for the Whip job signified that the two Senators are both well-liked and respected, and insisted there is not a division among them about how best to move ahead in the next session.

"Lamar had a lot of support, but there is a lot of confidence in Trent as a Whip," explained Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the newly elected Conference chairman. "This is a victory for Trent as a Whip, but this is not a loss for Lamar."

"If there was ever a leadership race where people liked both people, it was this one," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), the new Policy Committee chairwoman. "Both are recognized for their very strong characteristics ... I don't think there was a vote against either one of them."

In fact, shortly after the results were announced, several Republican aides and Senators suggested that Alexander might find a place at the leadership table after all. Sen. John Cornyn (Texas), the new vice chairman of the Conference, said he expected Alexander will have an "important role" in the next Congress, and that there will be "additional ideas on that."

Republicans enter the 110th Congress with 49 Senators, six seats fewer than in the current Congress following their crippling electoral loss last Tuesday. Despite the turn of events, Republicans attempted to put a brave face on their new status, and each talked about their razor-sharp focus on toppling the Democrats and taking control of the Senate in 2008.

In addition to tapping McConnell as their Minority Leader and Lott as Whip, GOP Senators unanimously chose Kyl as Conference chairman, Hutchison as Policy Committee chairwoman, Cornyn as Conference vice chairman and Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) as National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman.

"My responsibility is to make sure the title of minority party is a title we only have for two years," Ensign said.

Emerging as the incoming leader, McConnell described his Conference as "very upbeat, which may surprise you." McConnell, who is vacating the job as Whip, added that the Republicans' margin in the Senate should not be discounted, noting that it takes 60 votes to pass legislation in the chamber.

"We will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority and hopefully a minority that is in that position for only a couple of years," he said, referring to the 2008 elections.

Sen. Lott Returns To GOP Leadership With One-Vote Victory (CQ)

By Daphne Retter

CQ, November 16, 2006

Senate Republicans proved on Wednesday that there can indeed be second acts in politics, electing their former leader Trent Lott of Mississippi to the No. 2 minority leadership post for the 110th Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0095094

Lott prevailed over Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., by a single vote in a race he jumped into only this week, after the Nov. 7 elections gave Democrats control of the Senate by a 51-49 margin. Alexander began lining up support nearly a year ago

Lott, 65, will serve as GOP whip under newly anointed Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who was unopposed in his bid to succeed retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. McConnell has served as whip for the past four years.

Alexander announced a week ago that he had lined up more than 25 votes — a majority of his caucus. But secret ballot elections for leadership posts are notorious for wrecking all advance nose counts.

Lott's victory is sweet redemption for a man whose long public career appeared to derail four years ago. Just weeks after Republicans chose him as majority leader following the 2002 elections, he was pressured out of the job after suggesting that the country would have been better off had former Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C. (1954-2003), won the presidency in 1948 running on his segregationist "Dixiecrat" platform.

He contemplated retiring at the time, but decided he still could help funnel much-needed federal largess to Mississippi, one of the nation's poorest states. He hunkered down, and took over the chairmanship of the Rules Committee — a consolation prize he was given at the time by the new Frist-McConnell leadership team. McConnell had chaired the committee before he was chosen as whip.

Now, Lott — newly elected to a fourth Senate term — will be McConnell's deputy. Unlike the Kentuckian, a backstage operator with little appetite for dealing with the media, Lott glories in the give-and-take with reporters. His pithy assessments of the Senate's dynamics and quotable views on issues of the day have made him a media favorite.

The whip's race was the only contested leadership election for Republicans. Although no official announcements were available at mid-morning, Jon Kyl of Arizona was expected to replace Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania as Republican Conference chairman. Santorum was defeated in his re-election bid Nov. 7.

Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas was in line to be the Republican Policy Committee chairwoman, Kyl's current spot.

John Ensign of Nevada was expected to head the National Republican Senatorial Committee in the 2008 election cycle. Republicans will be defending 21 seats in 2008, compared with 12 Democratic seats in play. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee will again be chaired by Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., whose record-breaking fundraising in the 2006 cycle gave Democrats a huge boost in their successful drive to recapture the majority.

In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — In their rehabilitation campaign, Senate Republicans will rely heavily on a man whose recent history is itself a testament to sudden falls, unlikely recoveries and the fickle hands of fortune in American politics.

Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, who went from Senate minority leader to presumptive majority leader to disgrace in a matter of days four years ago, was elected minority whip, the party's second-ranking Senate leadership position, on Wednesday.

Usually, the choice of a whip, a vital but unglamorous job, would draw little attention. But the election of Mr. Lott offers an unlikely study in professional redemption.

"One thing that this proves is that the United States Senate, like the American public, likes a comeback story," said Senator Lamar Alexander, the Tennessee Republican whom Mr. Lott defeated by a single vote.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who was said to be an important supporter of Mr. Lott, added, "He paid a pretty high price for the statement he made."

Mr. McCain was referring to a 100th birthday party toast for Senator Strom Thurmond, Republican of South Carolina, in which Mr. Lott seemed to praise Mr. Thurmond, a longtime segregationist, for his 1948 presidential campaign. Noting that his home state had voted for Mr. Thurmond then, Mr. Lott added: "We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems."

Mr. Lott, who was in line to be the Senate majority leader, explained his comments as a well-intentioned tribute to a longtime colleague. He issued serial apologies, but was eventually forced to give up his leadership position.

"We all believe in redemption," Mr. McCain said Wednesday, adding, "Thank God."

DOJ_NMG_0095095

Republicans favored Mr. Lott for the leadership post largely because of their election losses last week. With Republicans now a minority in the Senate, Mr. Lott was seen as effective in rounding up votes and striking deals. Several senators said the caucus badly needed his legislative expertise, including his ability to work across party lines. (Among the first well-wishers to call him Wednesday were two Democrats, Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.)

Mr. Lott declined to be interviewed, citing a desire to allow the incoming minority leader, Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, to serve as the spokesman for the leadership team. "I'm going to shock you and defer," Mr. Lott told reporters. "The spotlight belongs on the leader today."

Mr. Lott, 65, made his way back into prominence by deploying the same skills that have sustained his political career. He courted and counted his votes carefully. He quietly did committee work and dutifully attended hearings. He earned credit by running for re-election this year rather than retiring, thereby saving what might have been a vulnerable Republican Senate seat. And he bided his time.

Mr. Lott has always been vigilant in allowing reason and results to prevail over emotion. He is a fierce pragmatist, who has spoken of his father's alcoholism and its effect on him. "It makes you maybe grow up a little early," he said in 1997.

He has always craved order and leaves little to chance. In the throes of his crisis in 2002, Mr. Lott spent hours bunkered in his home in Pascagoula, Miss., methodically calling friends and colleagues — 50 calls a day — in an effort to save his job. It was a rigorous and disciplined process, similar to the one he followed in recent days as he campaigned quietly for the whip post. He contacted colleagues by phone and in person, emphasizing his ability to get results, his encyclopedic grasp of Senate rules and his skill in working closely with the House.

Once forced out of the leadership, Mr. Lott complained bitterly that Republican senators and the Bush administration had betrayed him.

"I'd been knifed in the back," Mr. Lott wrote in his book, "Herding Cats: A Life in Politics." "But in order to be effective again," he wrote, "I had to shake some of the hands that held the daggers."

Mr. Alexander recalls seeking Mr. Lott out to make sure he attended a celebration for new senators soon after he stepped down in 2002. Few expected Mr. Lott to attend, and he was not in a celebrating mood. But he showed up . "He wasn't pouting, "Mr. Alexander said. "He wasn't feeling sorry for himself."

Mr. Lott largely undertook his campaign for whip in one-on-one discussions, figuring that a visible effort would bring attention to his past troubles and perhaps scare off potential supporters.

"Nobody knew where he was; it was a stealth candidacy," said former Senator John B. Breaux, Democrat of Louisiana and one of Mr. Lott's closest friends. "His strategy was, 'Run silent, run deep,' like the old submarine."

Mr. Lott's "stealth" return was also forged over many quiet dealings and much legislative grunt work. "He reimmersed himself in committee work, went to a lot of hearings and asked a lot of questions," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine. "Once you've been a leader, it's hard to come back and do these things."

Mr. Lott's public fall was followed by a series of blunt remarks befitting a man who felt he had little to lose. "They're going to have to deal with me," he said of the Bush administration in a Time magazine interview in September 2003. "And they need to keep me in mind because I can be a problem."

He became a critic of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld ("I'm not a fan," he said in 2004.), the failed Supreme Court nominee Harriet E. Miers and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He said President Bush should be "ashamed of the abysmal" way he had treated former Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, who resigned this year after months of lukewarm support from the White House. And he took repeated shots at Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, his successor as Republican leader. (Mr. Frist did not seek re-election this year.)

Mr. Lott was at his most fervent after Hurricane Katrina. He became a vocal critic of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, challenged insurance companies that refused to cover damages from the storm and helped secure federal relief money for homeowners.

The hurricane destroyed Mr. Lott's home on the Gulf Coast and marked a pivot point in his life and career. Mr. Lott and his wife, Tricia, had decided in 2001 that he would not run for re-election this year. But the hurricane, which he called "a disastrous event of biblical proportions," spurred a reassessment. "I concluded that I still have a zest for the job here in Washington," he said in a news conference early this year. One of the many congratulatory calls to Mr. Lott on Wednesday came from Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and Louisiana native, who said she gained respect for Mr. Lott after the storm.

DOJ_NMG_0095096

"I believe in reconciliation; I've always believed in that," Ms. Brazile said. "I'll never forget the morning that I had to suck it up and call Trent Lott to help me with my relatives in Mississippi." She added, "On Katrina, he's just been a champion."

Among the other callers were President Bush, from Air Force One. Vice President Dick Cheney offered his best wishes in person.

"It's just a hugely significant political victory for Trent, especially after he had the rug cut out from under him," Mr. Breaux said.

He said he believed Mr. Lott would thrive, given the makeup of the Senate and his ability to work with Democrats .

Mr. Breaux hastened to add a caveat: "Trent promised me he'd never give speeches at any more birthday parties."

Lott Rejoins Senate Leadership (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Four years after racially impolitic remarks cost him the Senate's top post, Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) rejoined Congress's leadership ranks yesterday when his Republican colleagues turned to the veteran insider and skilled vote-counter to help them plot their return to majority status.

By a 25 to 24 secret-ballot vote, Lott defeated Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) for the position of minority whip, the party's second-highest post. As expected, GOP senators elected Mitch McConnell (Ky.) as Senate minority leader for the new Congress that will convene in January. But his victory was tempered by Lott's come-from-behind win over Alexander, who was seen as McConnell's and the Bush administration's preferred choice for whip.

Lott's feat ranks among the more impressive political comebacks of recent times, just as his fall from grace in December 2002 was spectacular and painful. At a 100th-birthday party for then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), Lott said the nation "wouldn't have had all these problems" if Thurmond had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run on a segregationist platform as a Dixiecrat that year, and critics denounced the remarks as racist.

Lott said he was simply flattering an old man. But Bush administration supporters and other Republicans helped engineer his ouster just as he was about to become Senate majority leader again after the 2002 midterm elections, replacing him with Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Now Frist is retiring, and Republicans are reeling from last week's elections, which gave Democrats a 51 to 49 edge in the Senate and a bigger margin in the House.

As GOP senators emerged from their closed-door meeting at the Capitol yesterday, several said the shock of last week's results prompted wavering colleagues to vote for Lott, who has spent 34 years in Congress (to Alexander's four), and much time negotiating deals and crafting compromises.

"We're going through a major transformation from the majority to minority status in both the House and Senate," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), a prominent GOP moderate and Lott supporter. "So it does require somebody who's got that institutional knowledge and appreciation for what it's going to take not only to rebuild Republicans within the institution but also nationally." Implicitly noting that Lott has never been close to President Bush, Snowe added that "there are times when you can't put all your eggs in the president's basket."

The White House said Bush, en route to Singapore, telephoned Lott from Air Force One to congratulate him.

Snowe said she thinks that Americans are ready to forgive Lott's Thurmond remarks. "He regrets it and has apologized," she said. "I think people have admired how he has been able to come back from that. He paid a heavy price, and he deeply regrets that, obviously."

Lott, 65, was uncharacteristically mum after the elections, telling reporters that it was McConnell's day to shine. Asked if he had any new reflections on the 1948 presidential race, he laughed and said, "Oh no, not at all. I'm strictly looking forward."

Almost from the day he joined the House in 1973, Lott -- a former cheerleader at the University of Mississippi -- was a genial and sawy insider who craved leadership posts. He was elected House minority whip in 1980, and 14 years later he became the first Republican to have been elected whip in both chambers. In that 1994 Senate GOP election, much like yesterday's, most party leaders opposed Lott, but many rank-and-file members rewarded him for years of friendship and guidance. He was Senate majority leader from June 1996 through mid-2001, except for a brief period in January 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0095097

Yesterday, colleagues said the GOP's new minority status calls for a leader who has lived through such an experience and knows when to cut deals with the majority and when to stand firm. Alexander, a former governor and two-time presidential candidate, is well-liked, said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), a Lott supporter. "But, at the end of the day, what helped swing it for Lott was that experience in the minority and knowing what the tactics and rules of engagement are," he said.

Referring to Lott's Thurmond comments, Thune said that Americans believe in redemption. "It's one of those things that happened fairly long ago," he said, "and people have moved on."

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, was less forgiving. "For many African Americans the sting of Trent Lott's hurtful words are unlikely to expire anytime soon," he said in a written statement. "However, his Republican colleagues have given him a second chance to address many of the glaring disparities that impact poor people, particularly African Americans, that he and his party have ignored for so long."

Lott Returns To GOP Leadership Position (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Four years after his racially incendiary remarks forced him to step down as Senate Republican leader, Trent Lott of Mississippi was born again politically on Wednesday, winning the second-ranking post of Republican whip.

As expected, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky was chosen unanimously for the top job of Senate minority leader, beginning in January.

The new Senate GOP leadership team represents a return to pragmatism. They're seasoned GOP parliamentarians who are expected to cross party lines and buck the White House more often than did retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who concentrated more on pleasing the president and the Republican Party base that's key to his presidential hopes for 2008.

McConnell and Lott are Senate traditionalists, and while both are conservative partisans, they also know how to cut deals to get things done.

"I can work with Mitch," said the next Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, D-Nev., who praised McConnell's understanding of how the Senate operates. Reid's deputy, Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, said dealing with McConnell would be a "double-edged sword" because as much as McConnell might see the benefits of cooperation, he also would be skilled at obstruction when he chose.

In an interview, Lott said it was "very likely" that Republicans would join Democrats in increasing the minimum wage if it could be packaged with incentives for businesses. "I have a pragmatist side to me and I'm also a populist. I have a blue-collar, working-class family background, and that feeling wells up in me sometimes."

The next big congressional leadership showdown comes Thursday. House of Representatives Democrats will select their No. 2 leader for the next Congress, when they'll be in the majority for the first time since 1994.

The contest pits the popular moderate Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland against Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who led Democrats in questioning the Iraq war over the past year and has the support of incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

But Murtha also has some ethics issues.

Murtha was a target in the federal Abscam probe of congressional corruption a quarter-century ago. He refused to take a bribe from undercover FBI agents, but a secret film of the exchange shows him suggesting that he might be open to a cash payoff later: "You know, we do business for awhile, maybe I'll be interested," Murtha said. He was never indicted.

Voters last week rejected Republican rule in Congress in part because of disgust with corruption scandals. If the first decision newly elected House Democrats make is to choose Murtha as their No. 2 leader, they risk tarnishing their image on ethics before they even take power.

In addition, Murtha has a reputation for playing pork-barrel politics as one of the House's key appropriators. Another reason voters rejected Republicans was because of their outrage at their soaring spending, especially on special "earmarks," or pork projects inserted into spending bills by appropriators such as Murtha as special favors for lawmakers in exchange for their support.

DOJ_NMG_0095098

Elevating Murtha thus could undercut the credibility of Pelosi's vow to rid Capitol Hill of corruption. But Murtha is a loyal lieutenant to Pelosi, and she's said to have a grudge against Hoyer, who challenged her unsuccessfully for party whip in 2001 .

On Wednesday, however, it was the Senate Republicans' secret-ballot elections that captivated Capitol Hill.

"We are unified in our desire to work with the Democrats across party lines to see what we can accomplish for the country," McConnell said, with his leadership team at his side. "But we will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority and hopefully a minority that is only in that condition for a couple of years."

McConnell has largely supported the president and corporate America and led a high-profile attempt to block campaign-finance limits, saying they infringed on free speech. He also crossed party leaders in blocking a ban on flag burning. He's married to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao.

As for Lott, several Republicans said their party has benefited over the years from his brokering of bipartisan deals for a higher minimum wage, welfare reform, health insurance portability and tax cuts.

Lott edged out Tennessee Sen. Lamar Alexander for the whip's job by one vote, and GOP senators at the closed-door session said the Mississippian's eyes filled with tears upon his victory.

In an interview later, Lott said his return to leadership "takes on extra meaning for me because of how I exited it and what I went through last year. I lost my mother and I lost my house (to Hurricane Katrina). All of that just kind of welled up in that moment."

Lott was forced to step down as the Republicans' leader in 2002 after his remarks at a 100th birthday celebration for Sen. Strom Thurmond, who'd run for president in 1948 as a segregationist. Lott had said that "we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years" if Thurmond had won.

Lott's subsequent apology and explanation that he'd meant to honor Thurmond's life accomplishments, not segregation, failed to save him.

With President Bush's backing, Frist, a heart surgeon with weaker political instincts and less experience than Lott, stepped in, but he's been roundly criticized for political miscalculations.

Lott, meanwhile, has worked behind the scenes to redeem himself with colleagues, and he drew bipartisan praise last year for advocating for Hurricane Katrina victims.

He'd planned to retire, but after Katrina, chose to seek re-election. "I worked very hard to show I can take a lick and keep on going, and I was not just going to go away and sulk and give up the ghost. I took my lumps and I licked my wounds, and I came back."

Reid called Lott's victory "a great comeback."

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, a swing vote on many issues, said of Lott, "Because of where we are today and because he did have those skills, we needed to take advantage of his capabilities and talents and skills and institutional knowledge."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Lott "is the most adept at getting legislation passed of anyone I've ever known, probably . . . I think most people think he paid a pretty heavy price for the mistake that he made. We all believe in redemption, thank God."

The More Things Change ... (NYT)

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

As victorious Democrats choose the Capitol hierarchy to promote their promises of reform, and Republicans choose their new minority leadership, they are entitled to their own best judgments. With that in mind, we have no prime candidates to tout for caucus leadership. We just want to remind lawmakers of the one clear message from this muddled election season: voters wanted something other than the old back-scratching status quo.

So far, the Democrats seem not to have paid much attention to the tattered baggage lugged into the limelight by Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Iraq war critic who is Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice for second in command. And yesterday, Republicans resurrected Trent Lott, the Mississippi senator who fell from the majority leader's post three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0095099

For all his commendable instincts in articulating the Bush administration's Iraq failures, Mr. Murtha has long been known in the Capitol as a crude master of swapping pork-barrel budget goodies for lobbyists' campaign lucre. Only recently, he stood out for opposing strong ethics reform.

And while Ms. Pelosi is vowing to hammer home ethics reform as her first order of business, the Capitol newspaper Roll Call reported that Mr. Murtha was vulgarly belittling her program in private meetings with lawmakers. Mr. Murtha's ambition is directed against the current No. 2, Representative Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who also is no slouch in maintaining overly close ties to the K Street business and lobbying powers.

The Republicans' defeat at the polls has sparked decidedly Transylvanian initiatives: Mr. Lott, who tripped from power over racially charged remarks he made in a fit of Dixiecrat nostalgia, has returned to new life as No. 2 in the minority leadership. And Representative John Boehner, finished as House majority leader, is plumping for resurrection as minority leader. At least Speaker Dennis Hastert was chagrined enough to drop the gavel and head for the shadows in the face of the voters' verdict.

Voters can only hope the party conferences this week do not signal that the obvious lessons of Election Day are already being lost on the next Congress.

Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents (NCP)

By Jared Allen

Nashville City Paper, November 16, 2006

After a last-minute and surprise loss in his bid to become the No. 2 Republican in the U.S. Senate, an upbeat Lamar Alexander on Wednesday tried to spin his stunning loss to former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott as good for Tennessee.

Despite going into Wednesday morning's GOP conference leadership elections confident that he had secured more than a majority of the votes necessary to succeed Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., as Republican whip, Alexander lost by one vote to Lott, who had announced his intention to run for the leadership post only a week-and-a-half ago.

"Senator Lott conclusively proved he's a better vote counter than I," Alexander said in a Wednesday afternoon conference call with reporters.

Alexander, who had said as late as Tuesday night that he had 27 of the 49 Republican votes, ended up with the support of only 24 of his GOP colleagues, one shy of the 25 gained by Lott.

"Some people changed their minds," Alexander said with a laugh in describing what happened.

"I would have been better off if the vote had been 11 p.m. last night [when] I had 27 votes," he said.

Saying that last minute "changes or switches are not unusual," Alexander explained that he was likely beaten by a delayed backlash against those — including former Sen. Majority Leader and Tennessee Senator Bill Frist — who helped orchestrate Lott's ouster as Majority Leader four years ago.

"One of the senators said to me at lunch that this was about redemption. Some senators felt as though [Lott] was treated unfairly four years ago and wanted to give him a second chance," Alexander, who is now Tennessee's senior senator, said. "There are lots of personal feelings that come into decisions like this."

After remarking publicly that the United States would have been better off had then-Dixiecrat and segregationalist presidential candidate Strom Thurman won election to the White House in 1948, Lott was forced to step down as Republican leader.

Alexander said he harbors no ill will toward Lott, who he said remains his "good friend," and pledged to support both Lott and McConnell, who was elected to succeed Frist as the GOP leader.

But Alexander said that while he openly wanted the whip post — which he campaigned for over a year for, and that he thought he had locked up after Sen. Rick Santorum (R-PA) failed in his bid to return to the Senate – he believes his loss will free him up to vote his conscience on issues, rather than fight for party votes.

"I'm a pretty independent fellow, anyway," the former Tennessee Governor said. "And having my independence increased on the issues I care about the most appeals to me a lot."

Alexander said education, energy, job creation and the environment will continue to sit atop his legislative agenda.

Senate GOP Focusing More On Big Picture Than Lame Duck (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0095100

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Newly elected Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) convened his new leadership team for the first time late yesterday afternoon to take stock of its party's recent setback at the polls and to plot the future.

The leaders discussed next month's leadership retreat and the importance of keeping open the channels of communication among themselves, but they did not discuss in depth how to handle the few remaining weeks of the Republican majority. Leaving Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in charge of next month's agenda has created somewhat of a leadership vacuum in a growing split within the Senate GOP conference over spending priorities.

"We might have an opinion, but others are in charge right now," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the newly elected Republican whip, said after the meeting when asked about the chamber's immediate agenda. Democrats take control of the Senate in January, but the remaining Republicans' legislative agenda in this Congress is significantly hampered by their poor showing at the polls.

Earlier in the afternoon, the entire Republican conference met to assess last week's election and discuss what they hoped to accomplish before turning power over to the Democrats.

Behind closed doors, frustrated Republicans voiced concern that they lost six seats because they have drifted away from their core principles, said participants.

First and foremost, Republican senators are distressed that the GOP is no longer regarded as the party of fiscal discipline, an anxiety that is fueling a debate over how to handle the pending appropriations bills. The unfinished spending bills make up a significant portion of the work leaders hope to complete during the lame-duck session in December.

While Frist, who will retire from the upper chamber at the end of the year, is still technically the majority leader, and outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is still the GOP conference chairman, the real power in the Republican leadership has passed onto the new leadership team: McConnell, the Republican leader-elect; Lott, the Republican whip-elect; and Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the elected Republican conference chairman.

One of the new leadership's first challenges is to bridge schisms that have emerged within the Republican conference over how to handle the remaining spending bills.

But members confined their first meeting to other topics, according to participants.

At a closed-door meeting of the Senate Republican conference yesterday, lawmakers argued back and forth over whether to attempt to complete the nine outstanding appropriations bills.

A group of Republicans led by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) argued that to cut costs, the spending bills should be left unfinished, said colleagues. DeMint believes that Congress should freeze spending at current levels by passing a stopgap measure funding government into next year.

"There are some people who want to do that and I think that's a very bad move," said Sen. Kit Bond (R-Mo.), a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee. "The Democrats have indicated that they want to cooperate, so I think we need to get everyone on the buggy and do the job we were elected to do."

Some Republican strategists believe that pushing the spending bills into next year would tie up the Democrats and make it more difficult for them to aggressively pursue their agenda on other issues such as Iraq, Medicare, and middle-class tax cuts.

A White House official said that is a major reason for why Democratic leaders are eager to cooperate on finishing the spending bills this year.

Meanwhile, another conservative Republican freshman, Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.), has prepared nearly 40 amendments to strike earmarks in the pending agriculture appropriations bills. And he has made it known that he plans to attack other project-laden spending bills in the same way, setting his colleagues up for a slow legislative grind if they decide to pass appropriations bills individually in December, as some lawmakers have urged.

"His concern is that voters want to see the favor factory shut down, not turned over to new management," said John Hart, Coburn's spokesman. "The worst response Congress can have to the elections is to go on an earmark spending binge with one of the first appropriations bills."

DOJ_NMG_0095101

"I think there are a number of different fractures within the conference on the bills," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), chairman of the Homeland Security Appropriations Subcommittee. "There are people like myself who don't like to see the emergency spending being thrown in there, there are people like Coburn who don't like the earmarks, there are people like DeMint who think they should be kicked over to the next Congress like [former Sen. Tom] Daschle [D-S.D.] kicked it over to us, and there are people like [Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman] Thad Cochran [R-Miss.] who want to get it done because they think it's their job."

While some lawmakers are pushing for the stopgap spending measure, and others want to pass as many individual bills as possible, a third option would be to combine the bills into a massive omnibus spending package, or several smaller "minibus" packages.

GOP leaders had hoped to pass the agriculture bill before recessing for Thanksgiving, but that may not be possible because of nearly $9 billion in emergency spending that may accompany the legislation, drawing protests from conservative Republicans.

Leaders also hope to ratify a nuclear non-proliferation treaty with India. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, who sat in on yesterday's Senate Republican conference meeting, exhorted the assembled lawmakers to pass the bill. Lawmakers said there was a chance of doing that last night.

A Senate GOP leadership aide said that in addition to the spending bills, other items on the December agenda include legislation giving Vietnam permanent normal trade status, a package of tax-cut extensions, and legislation addressing the threat of bioterrorism.

Senate Republicans have not yet placed offshore drilling legislation on their December agenda because it's not clear whether a similar bill could be passed in the House.

A House GOP leadership aide said that House Republican leaders would put the Vietnam trade bill back on the floor next month, as well as a package of tax-cut extensions. In a surprise vote, the House rejected the Vietnam trade measure earlier this week.

What tax cuts will be in the package is still the subject of bicameral negotiations.

The House aide said that Republican leaders, chairmen and rank-and-file members are also debating whether to finish the appropriations bills or postpone their completion until the next Congress.

May The Best Bulldog Win: GOP Rivals (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

House Republicans have already begun mapping their attack strategy for the next two years.

Leadership candidates have highlighted their plans to hammer the incoming Democratic majority for ethical lapses, fiscal irresponsibility and legislative mismanagement, borrowing from a playbook those same Democrats used with great success to unseat the Republican majority.

Leadership hopefuls have made regaining the majority the central thrust of their campaigns, but rank-and-file members are debating as to which candidates can successfully implement their attack strategies as well as the particulars of the individual plans.

Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), who is locked in a tight race with Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to retain his post in the next Congress, released a detailed roadmap yesterday to unify Republicans on tough votes, offer viable alternatives to Democratic bills on the floor and target potentially vulnerable Democrats on every tough vote.

Blunt is trying to make his procedural knowledge a big advantage over Shadegg heading into a potentially tight election with the Arizona conservative.

In the strategy memo, entitled "24 Months to a New Republican Majority — A Plan for Victory," Blunt outlined 60 Democratic seats carried by President Bush in 2004 where Republican leaders will apply pressure either to flip Democrats on the floor or punish them in campaign materials for voting with party leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0095102

"We must hold our Conference together to deny [presumptive House Speaker] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) victory and force vulnerable Democrats to take tough votes," Blunt wrote. "This won't be as simple as going to the floor every day and simply voting 'no.' We will have to offer well-crafted alternatives that allow some of our Members to vote 'yes' on a better plan before voting on the Pelosi plan."

Blunt outlines amendments he would offer to projected votes implementing pay-go rules in the budget process, raising the minimum wage and allowing the federal government to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, each of which is expected to be part of package offered by Democrats in the first 100 hours of their majority.

"It's going to take a lot more than that," said Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill about offering amendments to sink the Democratic legislation. "There is consensus on each of these issues, and I think there will be a push for clean passage" on the popular measures.

Shadegg also offered members his own broad vision statement yesterday in which he promises to work with the next chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee to hold freshman Democrats accountable for the campaign promises they made during the last cycle.

In an echo of the GOP's combative stance, Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the retiring chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, gave an impassioned speech to members yesterday during their regularly scheduled conference meeting, members and aides said afterward.

"The wake is over," Thomas told his Republican colleagues yesterday while imploring those who will remain next year to use their power as a minority to exploit divisions on the other side of the aisle.

Thomas, who has never shied from partisan sparring, told his soon-to-be-former colleagues to hammer Pelosi immediately for her attempts to elevate Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to the majority leader post despite his role as an un-indicted co-conspirator in the FBI's Abscam investigation.

As members prepare to elect a new slate of leaders in the wake of their devastating electoral loss, Republicans appear likely to elect a slate of familiar faces to the leadership, even though many lawmakers are concerned this could send the wrong message to voters.

During a closed-door meeting of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), Blunt hinted that four members of the current leadership — himself; his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.); Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio); and Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) — will return to the leadership, an aide present said.

Blunt is trying to hold his post as whip despite a groundswell of support for Cantor. There has been talk of organizing a write-in candidacy for the Virginia Republican, but members and staff are doubtful that a member will stand up and nominate him in the conference meeting for fear of angering Blunt.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) circulated a letter yesterday outlining his own vision for Republicans in the minority in which he questions the wisdom of electing familiar faces to the leadership.

"Are House Republicans electing a leadership team to be an effective minority or a leadership team to regain the majority?" Gingrich wrote to members. "These are very different roles and require very different considerations, very different strategies and very different leaders."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the self-proclaimed "cheerful pugilist" who chairs the RSC, delivered a fervent speech to centrist members of the Tuesday Group yesterday that one aide present believed would sway at least a few members in attendance, even though Boehner is still considered the front-runner.

Pence ducked into an empty conference room with Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas), who is also running for leader, after making his presentation, but denied afterward that the two were conspiring against Boehner, the odds-on favorite.

In addition, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) announced his endorsement of Shadegg yesterday, even though Shadegg's team debated releasing the senator's endorsement during the race for leader last winter. Some House Republicans are not fond of McCain, claiming he's a liberal Republican who constantly seeks media attention.

Republicans have punted one of the biggest questions about their reorganization until after the reorganization caucus this Friday.

DOJ_NMG_0095103

Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), the outgoing chair of the Republican Conference, told members in their closed-door meeting yesterday that leaders would not introduce a revised conference rules package until members return from the Thanksgiving holiday. Staff for outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) will work with the staff of the newly elected leaders to craft the final package.

The two big questions at this point regard term limits for ranking members — whether or not service as chairman counts against members in vying for ranking member slots and whether those ranking members will be chosen solely for seniority or will be allowed to make presentations to the reconfigured Steering Committee.

Most of the members vying for those slots have already made inquires with leadership about that process and will continue to angle for those slots as leaders craft the new rules.

"We're waiting on leadership selection," said Rep. Richard Baker (R-La.), the senior Republican on the Financial Services Committee, who was in a tight race to chair the committee before last week's loss. "It's too early at the moment to know how it will play out."

Baker's chief rival for the slot, Rep. Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.) — should Pryce and Dreier not ask to be considered — will also continue to campaign.

"It matters," Bachus said of becoming the ranking Republican. "Whoever the ranking member is absolutely has a step up" in a potential future race to become chairman.

To Learn From '06, We Must Heed Lessons Of '94 (RC)

By Rep. John Boehner

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

In the wake of last week's defeat, Republicans have engaged in a serious and much-needed dialogue about our party and its future. This is a healthy exercise, and one from which Republicans will emerge stronger.

In my letter announcing my candidacy for House Minority Leader, I talked about my experiences in the early 1990s. Instead of settling for our minority status back in 1993-94 and adopting the mindset of a permanent minority, we set out to change things in a big way.

In 1994 we developed the vision that led to the "Contract with America," which proudly said that House Republicans were ready as a team to take on the Washington, D.C., status quo. One of the secrets of the contract's success was that we recognized the things that unite Republicans across the spectrum are tax cuts, spending taxpayers' dollars wisely, ethics and accountability, and reforming government programs to demand results. We also recognized these ideas and policies have the added benefit of bringing in more and more Americans to support the conservative cause.

If we want our majority back in 2008, House Republicans need to get back to these basics and rededicate ourselves to the reform mindset that put us in the majority. We need to rebuild the Republican coalition by focusing on conservative ideas that can win broad-based support not just among House Members, but among the American people.

It's something you've heard me say time and time again: Good policy equals good politics. Together, we'll produce a next generation of great Republican ideas while always adhering to our core principles: a smaller, smarter, less-intrusive federal government. We'll draw on the talents of every Member and look to the outside for solutions.

We'll aggressively sell these solutions inside and outside the Beltway, using traditional and new media, and our network of friends and allies throughout the country. This will be hard work — no one Leader can do this — but working together as a team, we can get it done.

We also must work to prevent, root out and punish corruption and ethics violations. In 1994 we changed our rules to deny prime positions to any Member who had been indicted. But the appalling behavior of various Members on both sides of the aisle makes it clear we must do more.

The existing ethics committee process must be faster, and we need to give it teeth. More to the point, I simply will not tolerate ethical misconduct in our Conference. Clear likelihood of serious transgressions will lead to suspension from important committee posts; guilt will lead to immediate and severe consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0095104

The Minority Leader will need to hold every Democrat accountable for their behavior, their promises and their policies. The Leader will need to fight for fairness for all Republican Members, in committee assignments, resources and process.

The Leader will need to look in every corner of every Democrat-held district to help recruit candidates to win back the majority, and to ensure our candidates have the resources they'll need to compete and win. In short, the job of a Republican Leader in the minority will be to hold the job for as short a time as possible.

My collective experiences in the House — as a minority backbencher; as a co-author of the Contract with America; as Republican Conference chairman; as chairman of a committee; and as Majority Leader — have given me the perspective and experience our Conference needs to lead this effort.

These elections weren't a battle of ideas in which Americans embraced the values of Democrats over Republicans. We failed to meet the expectations of voters who supported us since 1994. Simply announcing our intention to return to our core principles is not enough. We need a Leader who knows how to build teams; how to articulate a vision for the future; how to set bold goals that bring out the best in our team; and how to achieve those goals.

I was in the minority once, and I hated it. I know how we got out of the wilderness, and I know how we built a majority that delivered reforms that changed American history. I know we can do it again. If House Republicans honor me with their vote, I will help lead the way.

Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) is House Majority Leader.

Conservative Democrats Seek Larger Role (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

For a dozen years, the Democratic conservatives known as Blue Dogs have been baying at the moon, ignored by Republicans and tolerated by their more liberal Democratic colleagues. Now, these House lawmakers say that is about to change.

Republicans "did not lose their seats to liberal Democrats" in last weeks elections, said Rep. Mike Ross, D-Ark. "Republicans lost their seats to Blue Dog Democrats."

"We'll have a lot to say about what passes and what doesn't" when the 110th Congress convenes in January with Democrats in control for the first time in 12 years, said Ross, new communications director for the caucus.

With the addition of nine newly elected freshmen, the Blue Dogs claim 44 members, nearly 20 percent of the incoming Democratic majority. They will be led by Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla., and include Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., in line to become the next Agriculture Committee chairman.

The Blue Dogs were formed in 1994 after Republicans swept the long-entrenched Democrats from power. They tend to be social conservatives on such issues as abortion. But their big issue is fiscal discipline — balancing the budget and reducing the federal debt.

Many in the group are from the South, and the group took its name from the old adage that southerners would vote for yellow dog if he were on the Democratic ballot. A blue dog, they decided, was a moderate or conservative "choked blue" by the Democrats in the years leading up to 1994.

Already, leaders from both parties are courting their votes. Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, a California liberal, has promised to make "paygo," a Blue Dog-backed principle that any new spending be paid for with cuts in other programs or new revenues, one of her first legislative goals.

"Leader Pelosi looks forward to working with the Blue Dogs in the 110th Congress," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman. "They are important voices in our diverse caucus."

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., who is running for the position of Republican leader in the next Congress, listed cooperation with the Blue Dogs as part of his platform.

"We also will attempt to restart the old GOP-Boll Weevil coalition that proved so successful in the 1980s to advance President Reagan's revolution," Pence said. "There are Blue Dog Democrats that want to balance the budget, address our nation's abounding debt, strengthen Social Security and protect life and marriage. Our minority will look for opportunities to work with them when there is agreement."

DOJ_NMG_0095105

Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, said the influence of the Blue Dogs could depend on President Bush. If the president "shows interest in legislation on Social Security, the deficit, and fiscal issues that the Blue Dogs care about, then I think they will have a lot of leverage," Fowler said.

Americans, said Stephanie Herseth, a Blue Dog Democrat from heavily Republican South Dakota, "are looking for leadership from the center." She said they will seek consensus with other Democrats while at the same time will "certainly continue to work with our Republican friends in a bipartisan way."

On the Net:

Blue Dogs: http://www.house.gov/cardoza/BlueDogs/bluedogs.shtml

'Tuesday Dogs' May Join Forces (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

In an effort to boost their influence in the sharply divided chamber, members of the moderate Republican and Democratic House factions indicated Wednesday that the two groups may coordinate efforts in the 110th Congress and could move to create a formal bipartisan coalition in the new session.

Members of the fiscally conservative Democratic Blue Dog Coalition and the centrist Republican Tuesday Group met in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Wednesday, to discuss areas where the groups could align.

"We have a lot of common interests," Matheson, a co-chairman of the Blue Dogs in the 109th Congress, said of his meeting with Republican Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who co-chairs the Tuesday Group.

According to Matheson, the moderate coalitions are most likely to work together on pro-growth and fiscal legislation, while Kirk cited issues such as expanding stem-cell research and portions of the "Suburban Agenda," an effort spearheaded by Kirk that includes legislation to stop online sexual predators and improve access to health care.

"At this point, we're starting a dialogue," Kirk said in an interview Wednesday, adding that the recent influx of new moderate Democrats elected last Tuesday will bolster opportunities to govern "from the political center."

Kirk said the two groups will hold a luncheon to swap legislative agendas when Congress returns the week of Dec. 4. There they will discuss the possible creation of a new bipartisan caucus that Kirk dubbed the "Tuesday Dogs."

With the defeat of six current Tuesday Group members, as well as a co-chairman, Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), Kirk said the group also will hold leadership elections in December to name a new co-chairman. He estimated the group's roster in the next Congress to total 35 members.

Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) is one moderate viewed as a potential candidate for co-chairman, although others could step forward.

"There's a lot more that unites us than divides us," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), who will be a co-chairman of the Blue Dogs next year. "The American people expect us to reach across the aisle. There may be temptation to 'get even' [with Republicans in the 110th Congress], but I think that would be a huge mistake."

Although the Blue Dog leaders had attempted similar meetings with moderate Republicans in the current session, Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.) said he believes those efforts never came to fruition because of pressure from the GOP leadership.

"There may be more opportunity now," said Cardoza, a co-chairman of the coalition in the current Congress. Citing the number of moderate Republican losses in the recent elections, Cardoza added: "Now they're emboldened ... to be more aggressive on behalf of the national agenda, instead of the party agenda."

During a Wednesday morning press conference to introduce the newest Blue Dog lawmakers, several of the coalition's leaders stressed that the group will work on bipartisan efforts in the next session.

"The Blue Dogs believe in partnership, not partisanship," said Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), who along with Ross and Rep. Dennis Moore (D-Kan.) will chair the group in the new Congress. Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) will serve as the group's whip.

DOJ_NMG_0095106

"We're not going to be a rubber stamp for anyone. We're going to help bring our party back to the middle," Ross said of the 44-member coalition, which includes nine freshman lawmakers. "We have a lot to say about what passes or doesn't pass when it reaches the floor."

The Blue Dogs also discussed their 12-point agenda, which calls on Congress to pass a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget; restore "pay as you go" budget guidelines through 2010; implement new rules requiring roll call votes for spending bills with more than $50 million in new spending; establish strict rules on emergency spending, as well as establishing a "rainy day" fund for those funds; subject any increase in the debt limit to a roll call vote; implement new rules requiring all Congressional earmarks to include publicly accessible justifications; new guidelines requiring a three-day minimum for Members to review legislation before a scheduled vote; as well as new guidelines requiring House committees to detail their oversight efforts in biannual reports.

What You Heard About 'Conservative Democrats' Winning Was Wrong (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

It quickly has become conventional wisdom that last week's Democratic House victory swept in a crop of moderate and conservative Democrats who'll both keep party liberals in check and help remake the image of the party of former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Well, I met dozens of Democrats running in 2006 — no, not everyone, but most of them — and I can't find much more than a couple who merit the label "conservative." That's not meant to be either criticism or praise. It's merely a statement of fact.

North Carolina Rep.-elect Heath Shuler surely qualifies as a culturally conservative Democrat, but the pro-life, pro-gun Democrat who is a member of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes is the exception, not the rule. Virtually all of the Democrats I interviewed were pro-choice, favored rolling back President Bush's tax cuts and sounded traditional Democratic themes on education, the environment and foreign policy.

In Connecticut, Reps.-elect Chris Murphy and Joe Courtney are pretty typical Northern liberals. In New York, Rep.-elect John Hall, who I didn't meet, appears to be quite left of center. Two upstate Democrats, Reps.-elect Kirsten Gillibrand and Michael Arcuri, have more moderate personas, but I wouldn't go so far as to call them conservatives, or even moderates.

Arcuri often referred to himself as a "Boehlert Democrat," a label that won't make conservatives who cringed at the voting record of retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R) the least bit comfortable. Gillibrand, who is impossible not to like, didn't sound like a liberal firebrand, but I'd be surprised if her record was much different from that of most Northeast Democrats.

In Pennsylvania, there is no reason to believe that Reps.-elect Patrick Murphy and Joe Sestak will be anything but typical suburban Philadelphia Democrats: If you are a liberal, you'll like them, and if you aren't, you probably won't.

In Florida, Rep.-elect Ron Klein's state legislative voting record seems consistent with a liberal Democrat, and while some observers have pointed out that Rep.-elect Tim Mahoney talked a moderate line during his campaign and is a former Republican, my notes from my interview with him show that he has not supported a Republican presidential nominee for more than 20 years and seems likely to vote along traditional Democratic lines.

Texas Rep.-elect Nick Lampson may have to vote like a moderate or conservative if he has any hope of winning re-election in Texas' 22nd district in two years, but his record when he was in Congress was not what one normally would identify as conservative, or even moderate.

My interview with California Rep.-elect Jerry McNerney suggests he's quite liberal. The same goes for Rep.-elect Steve Kagen in Wisconsin. I didn't interview Iowa's newly elected Member, Dave Loebsack, but his profile — he's a political science professor at Cornell College and ran against middle-of-the-road GOP Rep. Jim Leach from the left — suggests he's no moderate.

In Ohio, Rep.-elect Charlie Wilson is conservative on cultural issues, so that makes him a relatively moderate Democrat. But fellow Buckeye State Rep.-elect Betty Sutton certainly isn't a moderate, and although I didn't meet Rep.-elect Zack Space, I am told by people who did that his views seem fairly liberal.

DOJ_NMG_0095107

I wrote after the previous cycle that I liked Indiana Democrat Joe Donnelly and hoped he'd run again, but I'd never call him a conservative Democrat. On the other hand, Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth told me that he is pro-life, supports a constitutional amendment defining marriage and supports capital punishment, so he does appear to be a moderate Democrat.

Then there is Rep.-elect Baron Hill, who, if you ask him, probably will call himself a moderate Democrat. The only problem is that voters in Indiana's 9th district fired him two years ago because they thought he was a cultural liberal who tried to have issues both ways.

I've never met Rep.-elect John Yarmuth, who knocked off Rep. Anne Northup (R-Ky.) and has a reputation for being both very personable and very liberal. Kansas Rep.-elect Nancy Boyda is pro-choice, and as far as I can tell, there is no reason to see her as a moderate.

Kentucky Democrat Ken Lucas would have been a conservative Democrat, but he lost. Florida's Christine Jennings, a bank president, might have been moderate on business issues, but she apparently lost narrowly.

Colorado Rep.-elect Ed Perlmutter? Liberal. Iowa Rep.-elect Bruce Braley? Very liberal. Arizona Rep.-elect Gabrielle Giffords? Liberal, I think.

Now let me be very clear about my point. I'm not saying that it's good or bad that most of these Democrats are likely to be pretty typical members of their party. I'm only saying that's where they fit. A bunch of conservative Democrats didn't win election last week.

So how and why did the buzz get going that the Democrats elected last Tuesday foreshadow a different Democratic Party? I'm not sure.

Part of it may have been all the hype about Democrats "broadening the playing field" and possibly taking very Republican seats in Idaho, Nebraska, Colorado, Washington, Wyoming and Indiana. That didn't happen, though in some cases the Democrats running for those seats performed well above what would be expected for their party.

Though there were obvious exceptions, most of the House takeovers occurred in swing and Democratic-leaning districts, and those districts elected pretty conventional Democrats.

The election of Bob Casey Jr. (Pa.) to the Senate may have added to the impression that Democrats were sending moderates and conservatives to Washington, D.C. But again, Casey — who opposes legal abortion — is the exception, not the rule.

House Democrats way well attempt to steer a more moderate path between now and 2008, especially since their opportunities are limited with Bush in the White House. But if that happens, it would be the result of a pragmatic decision by party leaders, not the result of an infusion of moderates and conservatives into their party last week.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Which Bipartisanship Will Bush Choose? (WSJ)

By Newt Gingrich

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

The election results pose two enormous strategic choices for America. First, the obvious outcome of a Democratic-controlled Congress and a Republican White House is the need for bipartisan cooperation in order to get anything done. The key question is: Which kind of bipartisanship will emerge? Will there be a Ronald Reagan approach to bipartisanship which appeals to the conservative majority of the House? Or will there be an establishment bipartisanship which cuts deals between liberals and the White House? Second: Will the departure of Donald Rumsfeld and his replacement by Robert Gates lead to a tactical effort to minimize the difficulties of Iraq, or to a fundamental rethinking of the larger threats to American safety?

These two choices are strikingly interrelated. An establishment bipartisanship between the White House and liberal congressional leaders will almost certainly make it necessary to focus narrowly on how to minimize difficulties in Iraq and postpone consideration of the larger threats to America for the remainder of this and into the next presidency. By contrast, a conservative bipartisanship that knits together the House Republicans and the Blue Dog Democrats into a floor majority, working with a White House that emphasizes popular issues at the grassroots, would make it much easier to focus on the larger threats to American safety. (Such a bipartisanship could stress making the cap gains tax cut permanent; controlling set-asides and discretionary spending; oversight on failing bureaucracies and waste; English as the language of government; and biofuels as part of an energy policy.)

DOJ_NMG_0095108

How these bipartisanship choices are made will do a great deal to define our government and politics for the next few years. Each strategy cross-pressures a different part of the House and Senate. Each requires some members to choose between their loyalty to their values and those held by their districts on the one hand and their party leadership on the other.

A liberal establishment strategy will almost certainly split the GOP and lead to a grassroots rebellion against the kind of policies which a Pelosi-Reid alliance would force on the White House. House Republicans would find themselves split again and again as their leadership cooperated with Nancy Pelosi to bring forward liberal legislation. Conservative senators would find themselves blocking and filibustering liberal legislation brought forward by the Senate establishment Republican leadership and Harry Reid. Their supporters at home would be angrily insistent on active opposition to a liberal establishment legislative agenda.

On the other hand, a conservative populist grassroots strategy would almost certainly make daily interactions with liberal leaders more confrontational as they found themselves nominally chairing committees but losing votes on the floor and having their initiatives rejected by a conservative grassroots coalition. With a conservative populist grassroots strategy it is the 44 Blue Dog Democrats who would find themselves cross-pressured. In the House, some 54 Democrats won by claiming they were much more conservative than Nancy Pelosi, and much more conservative than the San Francisco values she represents. Here, they would be forced to choose between their voters back home and the promises made to them during the campaign, and their leadership.

Ironically, the very nature of the Democratic victory makes it possible to re-establish the conservative Democrat and House Republican coalition which made the Reagan legislative victories of 1981-82 possible. Tip O'Neill was the liberal Democratic speaker when Reagan became president, but he did not have a liberal majority in the House. Yet despite a seemingly liberal Democrat lock in a 242-192 majority, they lost control of the floor on the most important bill of Reagan's first term. His tax cuts were initially passed 238-195 with 48 Democrats splitting from the leadership and siding with Reagan and the GOP. The final passage of the conference report passed 282-95, with a 113-vote Democratic majority siding with Reagan and only 95 liberal democrats voting "no."

I was a sophomore during this exciting Reagan first term and I learned from him the art of appealing to the American people to win votes in Washington. When we passed welfare reform in 1996, the Democrats split 98 "yes" and 98 "no." When we passed the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, the Democrats split 153 "yes" and only 52 diehard liberals voted "no."

If President Bush decides to govern as President Reagan did, he will work to unify the Blue Dog Democrats with the Republicans to win a handful of very large victories while accepting a constant barrage of unhappiness from the liberal leadership. That is what conservative bipartisanship is like. If on the other hand, President Bush decides on an establishment strategy of cooperating with the liberal leadership, he will guarantee splitting his own party and will see his legacy drift further and further to the left as the Pelosi-Reid wing of their party demands more and more concessions.

This choice of which strategy to follow domestically has an enormous implication for national security. A liberal coalition will focus narrowly on Iraq and seek to avoid thinking about the scale of threat we face internationally. A conservative bipartisan coalition will look first to the larger threat to American security and will then seek to find solutions in Iraq to strengthen American security. It is hard to see how a liberal coalition will be able to look at the larger threats to our safety, even when the threat, articulated in this warning by Vice Admiral Patrick Walsh, is clear: "What we are talking about today is an ideology that thrives on murder, intimidation and fear. It puts innocent people at risk, particularly those in open societies. What we are talking about are people who worship death itself."

Thus the decision about which bipartisanship to pursue with regard to a legislative agenda and the Iraq war becomes for the Bush administration a decision about how safe and how prosperous America will be under divided government.

Mr. Gingrich is a former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Murtha Calls Ethics Bill 'Total Crap' (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095109

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) told a group of Democratic moderates on Tuesday that an ethics and lobbying reform bill being pushed by party leaders was "total crap," but said that he would work to enact the legislation because Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) supports it.

Murtha and Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) are locked in a battle for the House Majority Leader post, and both men made presentations to the Blue Dog Coalition on Tuesday in a bid for their votes.

"Even though I think it's total crap, I'll vote for it and pass it because that's what Nancy wants," Murtha told the Blue Dogs, according to three sources who were at the meeting.

Pelosi has made enactment of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act the cornerstone of her legislative agenda for the 110th Congress, and she is preparing to make it the first bill introduced under her reign. Murtha voted against the legislation earlier this year on the House floor.

Congressional corruption was a major issue for voters in the recent midterm elections, and Pelosi has pledged to clean up the Congress as part of her efforts to reform the House.

A Democratic lawmaker, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said he was "surprised" by the tone of Murtha's comments, especially Murtha's repeated claim that he would back any proposal that Pelosi favored. This lawmaker has already declared for Hoyer.

"'My agenda will be Nancy's agenda' — he kept saying that," the lawmaker said. "The performance was stunningly awful."

Another Democrat who was in the room said Murtha's remarks, especially on the ethics and lobbying reform bill, "were not the right thing to say in front of a roomful of Blue Dogs."

Murtha office's did not comment for this article.

Many Say Leadership Race Damages Democrats' Image (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — House members acknowledged on Wednesday that the increasingly bitter contest for majority leader was sullying the image of unity and new direction that Democrats hoped to convey.

"It's four days that we haven't talked about our message and built on the euphoria," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, a California Democrat who is supporting Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland in the leadership vote on Thursday. "We had such perfect pitch last week."

Downtrodden Republicans were enjoying the spectacle of the split between Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker, who is publicly pushing Representative John P. Murtha, her longtime ally, and Democrats rallying behind Mr. Hoyer, who has served in the leadership slot beneath Ms. Pelosi for four years.

"I can't believe they are self-destructing before they even get started," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois. "Everyone on our side is giddy."

The race has not broken along conventional ideological lines. Mr. Murtha, a staunch conservative on most issues with the exception of his highly publicized opposition to the Iraq war, enjoys support from some of the most liberal Democrats. Mr. Hoyer, the more liberal of the two, has attracted strong backing from moderates and centrists, as well as some of the most seasoned House Democrats.

It has also left Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate straining to understand Ms. Pelosi's strategy.

They wonder why, in her moment of victory, she injected herself into a leadership fight that will end with the selection of her rival or her own choice, a lawmaker criticized for his ethics record, after an election in which Democrats campaigned on a clean-government theme.

Mr. Murtha himself has thrown more fuel on that fire. Members of the conservative Democratic Blue Dog group said that during an appearance before them Tuesday, Mr. Murtha disparaged an ethics overhaul that Ms. Pelosi and the leadership have been promising as one of their first orders of business.

Two lawmakers at the session confirmed that the comment, first reported by the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, left many stunned, given the new scrutiny Mr. Murtha's deal-making on the Appropriations Committee has drawn, along with his involvement in the 1980 Abscam bribery sting run by the F.B.I. He was never charged in that case, but a widely circulated film showed him being offered a bribe and responding that he was not interested in the money "at this time."

DOJ_NMG_0095110

In an interview on the MSNBC show "Hardball" Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Murtha said that at the time of Abscam he was interested in attracting foreign investment to relieve high unemployment in his Pennsylvania district and, though suspicious of the offer, wanted to keep open the possibility of legitimate investment. As for the ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi, Mr. Murtha said he was complaining that Congressional wrongdoing was superceding other matters "when we've got a war going on and we got all these other issues — $8 billion a month we're spending."

After writing a letter of support for Mr. Murtha, Ms. Pelosi has personally gone to bat for him, attending a reception for new members and pressing lawmakers on their choice for majority leader. Her allies say her intervention reflects the sort of risk-taking strategy that has brought her to the brink of becoming speaker. And no matter how it turns out, they say, it will send a message to lawmakers that if they stick with her, she will reciprocate.

But several Democrats said her direct involvement was clouding the Democratic takeover by showing squabbling Democrats in serious disagreement over the direction of the party.

"This is somewhat distracting us," Mr. Hoyer conceded Wednesday, even as he predicted that he would win the race and that the party would avoid substantial fallout.

"I expect that we will bring the party together and become unified and move on from this," he said in a brief interview.

Mr. Hoyer came in for criticism of his own Wednesday from an outside watchdog group, Public Citizen. It ranked him as a top Congressional recipient of contributions from lobbyists and political action committees, receiving more than $5.6 million in PAC money since 2000. Mr. Murtha collected about half that much.

"Both candidates for House leadership have taken large amounts of special interest money," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen.

Mr. Murtha and his allies have emphasized the role he played in building Democratic opposition to the Iraq war, an issue that was crucial to the party's victories last week.

Mr. Hoyer and his supporters acknowledge the import of Mr. Murtha's turnaround after his initial support of the war. Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts described it as a "Nixon goes to China moment," but said it did not entitle Mr. Murtha to the leadership post.

Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, a liberal Democrat from Ohio who disagrees with Mr. Murtha on major social issues like abortion and gun control, said in a letter distributed to his colleagues that Mr. Murtha's leadership on the war outweighed other considerations.

"We need Jack Murtha for majority leader," Mr. Kucinich wrote, "because at a critical moment on the major international policy issue facing America and the world, he showed an openness, a readiness to listen and a willingness to set a new direction, based on new information. This is the mark of someone who moves forward with courage."

House Race Pits Murtha Vs. Ethics (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

House Democrats will decide today whether to install as their majority leader one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress.

Today's vote on Rep. John P. Murtha -- whom likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi enthusiastically supports -- comes 10 days after Democrats seized control of the House and Senate after promising to clean up the corruption that they said had become a hallmark of the Republican Congress.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Republicans yesterday picked as their leader Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. The No. 2 position of Republican whip went to Sen. Trent Lott, the Mississippian who four years ago fell from leadership after praising the 1948 presidential campaign of then-segregationist Strom Thurmond of South Carolina.

Mr. McConnell, who for years has excoriated Democrats for obstructing the Republican majority in the Senate, signaled the new minority's willingness to play a similar role.

DOJ_NMG_0095111

"We represent a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 to do anything," he told reporters. "We are unified in our desire to work with the Democrats across party lines to see what we can accomplish for the country, but we will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority, and hopefully a minority that is only in that condition for a couple of years."

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats emphasized the need for Republican cooperation.

"We really need bipartisanship," said incoming Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin, the Illinois Democrat who helped lead the filibusters of President Bush's judicial nominees.

But most of the attention on Capitol Hill yesterday fell on Mr. Murtha's run for House leadership, which many Democrats worry will sully their stunning victories last week and ruin any hopes of a reputation for ethical reform. Mr. Murtha didn't help his case when reports surfaced yesterday that he dismissed the party's plans for ethics reform during a gathering of newly elected Democrats.

Mr. Murtha, elected last week to his 18th term, is often noted today for his service in the military and his demands that troops be withdrawn from Iraq. But for more than 25 years, he's also been remembered as the "unindicted co-conspirator" in one of the most famous and blatant cases of congressional corruption ever exposed.

In 1980, Mr. Murtha of Pennsylvania was among eight members of Congress lured to a town house in Washington to collect $50,000 in "walking-around money" from what turned out to be FBI agents posing as emissaries for an Arab sheik seeking influence.

Video of the rendezvous shows Mr. Murtha negotiating for a long-term relationship with the apparent crooks, trying to cut fellow congressmen out of the deal and stating that he may be willing to take money from the men in the future.

Mr. Murtha turned down their bribe -- for the time being. But he spent 54 minutes doing so, according to FBI surveillance tapes recently obtained by the conservative magazine the American Spectator and posted on the Internet.

"These guys were trying to corrupt me," he said in an interview yesterday with Chris Matthews of MSNBC. "They were the slimiest guys I've ever seen.

"I deal with people like this all the time," he added.

He insisted that his only interest was in getting the men to invest in his district.

Mr. Murtha testified against his fellow congressmen in federal court and was not charged with any crimes. In 1981, the House ethics committee also declined to punish him.

"The ethics committee cleared me completely, unanimous vote," he said yesterday.

According to news reports at the time, the panel in the Democrat-controlled Congress declined to pursue charges on a party-line vote.

Some Democrats say Mrs. Pelosi's backing of Mr. Murtha doesn't bode well for her promise to aggressively root out corruption in Congress. At the very least, critics say, Mr. Murtha failed to obey House rules requiring that members report any attempted bribes -- a rule that Mr. Murtha should have been aware of as a member of the House ethics committee in 1980.

The liberal activist group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington named Mr. Murtha one of the most corrupt members of Congress -- not mentioning his role in the Abscam scandal, but instead highlighting his dealings with lobbyists and pork-barrel spending in recent years.

Both Mr. Murtha and Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who is currently the No. 2 House Democratic leader, have said they have the votes to get elected majority leader.

Dem Division And Dismay (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, November 16, 2006

House Democrats head to the ballot box today to elect their majority leader, with many of them fretting that the contentious race has split their caucus into two warring camps, one allied with Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and the other with Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), regardless of today's outcome.

The race has reinforced longstanding divisions between different factions in the caucus, members and observers said, and has diverted their attention from a positive message they hoped to project just days after winning control of the House.

DOJ_NMG_0095112

"We're trying to say it's a new day, and unfortunately, we've started a new day with unnecessary controversy," said Rep. Charlie Gonzalez (D-Texas), a Hoyer ally. "Members see this as something unnecessary, something counterproductive, something that is sucking up all the oxygen in the room when we really need to work on improving the functioning of the House."

Elated by their victory last week at the polls, many House Democrats were further encouraged by the harmonious resolution last week of a battle brewing for the post of majority whip, praising Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for brokering the compromise.

But on Sunday, Pelosi took a decidedly different tack by stepping into the majority leader race on Murtha's behalf, a move that escalated an already vigorous contest. Two hundred thirty-one House Democrats will meet this morning at 9 a.m. to vote for their entire slate of leaders, although the majority leader position is the only contested race. They will first vote on a motion to allow Christine Jennings and Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to vote. Jennings's Florida race is still contested. Jefferson still faces a runoff.

Many Democrats were dismayed at the ever more heated and at times ugly battle between two of their most senior members, much of it playing out on national television.

Some Hoyer backers questioned Pelosi's political judgment, arguing that the effort to "purge" Hoyer from the leadership would damage caucus unity.

"It's a terrible way to start. It's a lose-lose situation. Either way she has polarized the caucus," said one House Democrat allied with Hoyer.

"You're going to be more likely to question her after something like this that is so clearly bad for us and could have been avoided," another commented.

The situation reminded more than one lawmaker of a remark made once by former Rep. Mo Udall (D-Ariz.): "I have learned the difference between a cactus and a caucus. On a cactus, the pricks are on the outside."

A Murtha backer took offense at the suggestion that the battle would create long-lasting acrimony among members.

"I've been hearing that for six months, that it's going to do damage to the caucus. Yeah, for about 30 seconds. Anyone who feels that way is a jerk. I don't feel that way. If someone says that, they really don't belong in politics," said Rep. Michael Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha ally.

"If this thing was about making an empress, I wouldn't do it," Capuano added.

Members will vote by secret ballot, making it difficult to predict an outcome.

Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.), a Murtha ally, said he could tell which members might ultimately switch their votes.

"You know when people are telling you what you want to hear. You know when they hem and haw … Who knows how it's going to turn out, but we'll be ready."

Murtha himself was absent during House floor votes yesterday as he has been all week. Hoyer has not missed a vote.

As the sun set on the Capitol last night, both camps were executing their endgame. Murtha's allies huddled in a Rayburn committee room to plot strategy. Reps. Anna Eshoo (D-Calif.), Robert Brady (D-Pa.), Tim Holden (D-Pa.), John Larson (D-Conn.), Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.), Tim Ryan (D-Ohio), Allyson Schwartz (D-Pa.), Gene Taylor (D-Miss.), Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), as well as Capuano and Pascrell, attended.

Pelosi continued to meet individually with incoming freshmen members yesterday. Pelosi has been raising the majority leader race with freshman during the same introductory meeting where they discuss committee assignments.

"Some of the freshmen who came in with some naivete are understanding the meaning [of Pelosi's endorsement]," Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) said Monday night. If they do not, "They'll screw themselves for the rest of their lives."

Both sides asserted that they had the necessary support, but the secret-ballot vote means that members may defect at the last moment without ever facing retribution.

Rep. Albert Wynn (D-Md.) said he expected some members not to honor the commitments they had made to the candidates.

"Ask anyone who's ever run for a leadership position and they'll tell you: Members lie."

Brad Haynes contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0095113

Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Though incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to push through ethical reforms in Congress, both of the Democrats vying to be her second-in-command have long histories of earmarking, close relationships with corporate interests, and using their positions to raise millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

Pelosi's choice for the job, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, used his seat on the appropriations committee and the largely secret earmark process to obtain $121 million in earmarks during the current session, making him one of the top earmarkers in Congress, according to the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Murtha, a tough-talking veteran who made headlines last year by denouncing President Bush's policy in Iraq, directed much of the money to firms and institutions in Johnstown, Pa., in his district. Defense contractors and other beneficiaries dominated a list of Murtha's top campaign contributors.

Murtha was an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam scandal of the 1970s, which has prompted some to support the other man seeking the House majority leader's job — Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland — as the more ethical candidate.

Hoyer, also on appropriations, sent $61.7 million to his district just outside of Washington during this Congress, the watchdog group says. That put him among the top 10% of earmarkers in the House. The earmarks frequently benefited local defense contractors.

In the 2006 defense appropriations bill, for example, Hoyer secured $2.8 million for ManTech International Corp., which has a facility in his district that is developing a military project. ManTech's executives and its political action committee have donated $49,000 to Hoyer's campaign and leadership funds since 2001.

David Sirota, a former House Appropriations Committee aide who wrote the recently published book "Hostile Takeover" decrying corporate influence on the Democratic Party, said he was concerned about the records of Murtha and Hoyer.

"In my book I wrote that a top legislative staffer to Hoyer simultaneously served as a top corporate fundraiser for Hoyer, helping raise money for his leadership PAC," he said.

"There is nothing illegal about that, but it definitely makes a joke of the idea that Hoyer is the ethics candidate in this race," said Sirota, who supports Murtha for the post.

Federal Election Commission records show Murtha also employed at least one staffer to do campaign work.

*

Cloaked in secrecy

Earmarking, and the symbiotic relationship it often creates between members of Congress and corporate and other interest groups, has become a symbol of the ethical laxity that Democrats campaigned against in last week's midterm election.

Earmarking is a form of pork-barrel spending often favored by committee chairmen, congressional leaders and other insiders. Cloaked in secrecy, it enables favored members to bypass the normal budget and appropriations process and insert narrowly drawn spending provisions into legislation.

Though not new, the practice has exploded in recent years. In the most flagrant cases, members have used the process for personal enrichment. In other cases, the spending provisions appear to have been used as a kind of quid pro quo to reward campaign contributors and other supporters.

Earmarks played a role in the Jack Abramoff scandal and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe).

They have also led to federal investigations, including an inquiry involving Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), outgoing chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Even when illegal or improper conduct was not at issue, earmarks for campaign contributors have been at the heart of the increasing role of money in politics. Murtha and Hoyer have been senior members of the House Appropriations Committee; its members are usually among the leading earmarkers and also major fundraisers for their parties.

Hoyer told a website this week that he did not favor ending the earmarks system, but said he supported reform and greater transparency so the public would know what was happening.

An aide said Hoyer supported "comprehensive earmark reform that would require full disclosure, including the sponsor. He also believes that all conference reports should be available for members to scrutinize before they are voted on, and should not have last-minute earmarks included, as has been the practice under Republicans."

*

Dealings with business

Hoyer has been a vigorous player of the traditional earmarking game.

For example, he has obtained more than $7 million in recent years for the manufacturer of Beretta firearms, which has a facility in his district and manufactures the 9-millimeter pistols used by the Marines. In effect, the earmark required the Pentagon to buy ammunition clips from Beretta USA. In an earlier purchase, the military had obtained clips from another supplier that had submitted the lowest bid; Hoyer said the cheaper clips had sometimes malfunctioned.

At least one Beretta executive has contributed to Hoyer's campaign fund.

Murtha is no stranger to ethics controversies.

Some of his largest campaign contributions came from the clients of Washington lobbying firms that represent beneficiaries of his earmarks.

Among them is a firm, Ervin Technical Associates, chaired by a former House colleague, Joseph M. McDade, who was accused in 1992 of providing earmarks in exchange for campaign contributions and gifts. He was charged with bribery and racketeering for accepting gifts and other benefits from defense interests, but was acquitted.

McDade and other principals of the firm could not be reached for comment, but an independent contractor working with the firm said the firm had the highest integrity, and defended the need for earmarks generally.

Another firm associated with Murtha, the PMA Group, is led by Paul Magliocchetti, who worked with Murtha as a senior staffer on the defense appropriations subcommittee for a decade. The PMA Group and 11 of the firm's clients rank in the top 20 contributors to Murtha, with campaign contributions totaling $274,649 in this election cycle, according to calculations by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a left-leaning watchdog group.

The 2004 defense appropriations bill provided earmarks for 10 companies represented by a lobbying firm in which his brother, Robert "Kit" Murtha, was a senior partner. The Los Angeles Times first reported in 2005 on Robert Murtha's lobbying activities for the firm, KSA Consulting.

At the time, Robert Murtha and others at KSA said he did not lobby his brother and thus saw no problem in his lobbying others.

*

A new controversy

On Tuesday, a new controversy flared up. The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call quoted Murtha as telling a group of Democrats that Pelosi's ethics reforms were "total crap."

Murtha said his remarks were misinterpreted, perhaps deliberately. He told MSNBC on Wednesday that he had been referring to illegal activities such as Abramoff's, not to the reforms.

"What Nancy is trying to do is important," he told host Chris Matthews.

"What I said was, it's total crap, the idea we have to deal with an issue like this … when we've got a war going on," Murtha said.

Murtha first gained national attention decades ago as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam investigation into congressional corruption. In a videotaped interview with the FBI agent posing as a sheik, Murtha was offered $50,000 to help the sheik.

"I'm not interested. I'm sorry," Murtha told the FBI agent, but added: "At this point. You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't."

Murtha did not respond to requests for comment, but he told MSNBC that he knew the fake sheik was trying to corrupt him, but that he led him on in hopes of luring investment to his hard-pressed district. "I deal with people like this all the time," he told Matthews.

*

DOJ_NMG_0095115

chuck.neubauer@latimes.com
tom.hamburger@latimes.com

Pelosi Faces Leadership Test With Vote (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi faces a major leadership test Thursday, barely a week into her new role, as Democrats vote on her choice for majority leader. She's supporting a lawmaker once caught up in a bribery scandal and known more recently for trading votes for pork projects.

Pelosi's prestige is on the line after endorsing longtime ally John Murtha of Pennsylvania to be the No. 2 Democrat in place of her longtime rival Steny Hoyer of Maryland.

Senate Republicans, meanwhile, rewarded Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott with their No. 2 post, four years after the White House helped push him out of his job running the Senate for making remarks interpreted as endorsing segregation. President Bush, on a trip to Russia and Asia, telephoned Lott on Wednesday with congratulations.

Pressured to step down from the Senate's top spot in 2002, Lott returned to the Republicans' second-ranking position by nosing out Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., who had made an 18-month bid for the post. Lott promised to defer to Minority Leader-to-be Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

House Republicans, finding themselves in the minority for the first time since 1994, will meet in private Thursday to hear presentations from candidates for their half-dozen leadership posts. Their election is scheduled Friday. Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois is leaving the leadership ranks. Replacing him as the House's top Republican became a two-man race Wednesday between current Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and conservative challenger Mike Pence of Indiana. Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton of Texas dropped out and endorsed Boehner.

Hoyer entered the Democratic leadership race with a substantial lead by most counts, but he has been scrambling to hold onto supporters since Pelosi's surprise intervention on Sunday. He appeared to carry a lead into Thursday's secret ballot despite Pelosi's opposition.

"I think we're in very good shape. I expect to win," Hoyer said. "I expect that we will bring the party together and become unified and move on from this."

With characteristic gruffness, Murtha said the opposite was true: "We're going to win. We got the votes," he said Wednesday afternoon on MSNBC's "Hardball."

Allies such as Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. — also a top confidant of Pelosi — have been working this week to peel away votes from Hoyer. Pelosi also has intervened more directly, making the case for Murtha in one-on-one meetings with Democratic freshmen — sessions in which the incoming lawmakers ask for all-important committee assignments.

Murtha, a former Marine who generally has supported U.S. military efforts, has gained considerable attention this year for his criticism of the administration's Iraq war policies. He steered Pelosi's winning campaign in 2001 against Hoyer for the No. 2 Democratic leadership post, and his supporters say Pelosi deserves a more loyal wingman.

But Murtha is also a controversial figure. He was investigated in 1980 as part of the Abscam bribery sting, but was the only lawmaker involved who wasn't charged criminally.

FBI agents pretending to represent an Arab sheik wanting to reside in the United States and seeking investment opportunities approached Murtha and several other lawmakers with offers of bribes.

When offered $50,000, Murtha is recorded as saying, "I'm not interested ... at this point." A grand jury declined to prosecute Murtha, and the House ethics committee issued no findings against him. On MSNBC Wednesday, Murtha said, "I told them I wanted investment in my district. They put $50,000 on the table and I said, `I'm not interested.'"

Murtha has a record of not always being a leadership loyalist, frequently supplying votes to GOP leaders who were struggling to pass bills. The none-too-subtle trade-off: Murtha and his allies would do better when home-state projects were doled out by the Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0095116

He has been criticized by ethics watchdogs such as Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, who have said he exemplifies a "pay-to-play" culture of Washington. The group says Murtha has steered defense projects to clients of KSA Consulting, a lobbying firm that until recently employed his brother Kit. Clients of the firm are generous with campaign contributions.

Hoyer claims considerable support from some liberals made uncomfortable by Murtha's opposition to abortion, gun control and changes to House ethics rules. He also is a leadership contact for many moderate "Blue Dog" Democrats.

Hoyer's backers say he has been an able lieutenant to Pelosi and has done nothing to disqualify himself from holding the same position in the majority.

He has been aggressive in lining up supporters, most of whom are sticking with him.

"One of the first things I learned around here is that when you give your commitment you honor it," said Rep. Rick Boucher, D-Va., a Hoyer supporter.

Pelosi Splits Democrats With Push For Murtha (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

A showdown over the House majority leader's post today has Democrats bitterly divided only a week after their party took control of Congress and has prompted numerous complaints that Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and her allies are using strong-arm tactics and threats to try to elect Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) to the job.

Murtha, 74, a former Marine who was among the first on Capitol Hill to call for a U.S. troop withdrawal from Iraq, may have hurt his own chances Tuesday night when he derided the Democrats' ethics and lobbying package before saying he will push for its passage anyway out of deference to Pelosi. His statement, at a gathering of conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, was cited by backers of his rival, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), as further proof that Murtha's controversial ethics record disqualifies him to lead the party in a new political era.

Pelosi's aggressive intervention on behalf of Murtha has baffled and angered many Democrats, who think she has unnecessarily put her reputation on the line out of misplaced loyalty to a friend and because of a long-standing feud with Hoyer, the minority whip. Pelosi has pushed Murtha's candidacy at social events, in private meetings and with incoming freshman Democrats; they have been called to her office to discuss committee assignments, only to hear first that she needs Murtha in order to be an effective leader.

Hoyer, 67, was heavily favored to win the race until Sunday, when Pelosi -- in a move that shocked even her staff -- openly threw her support to Murtha, despite a vow to stay neutral. She said in a letter that she was swayed by Murtha's early call for a withdrawal of U.S. troops, and that he would be best positioned to lead a new Democratic majority.

Hoyer still maintains the public support of most incoming committee chairmen, influential liberals such as Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.) and Maxine Waters (Calif.), most conservative Blue Dogs, and 21 of the 40 or so freshmen. But Murtha has a sizable contingent from the Appropriations Committee and the Pennsylvania delegation, as well as Pelosi's closest supporters. Since her endorsement, Pelosi has been unabashedly pushing Murtha.

"Have you ever seen a leader get involved in race like this? That should tell you all you need to know about her commitment," said Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Calif.), a friend of Pelosi's who is supporting Murtha.

So intense has the lobbying been that incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) -- after fielding a call from Pelosi -- said in a media report that he hadn't really endorsed Hoyer in a published interview in which he praised him.

One conservative Democrat said that a Murtha-Pelosi ally approached him on the House floor and said pointedly: "I hope you like your committee assignment, because it's the only one you're going to get."

In a phone call initiated by Murtha that same day, the lawmaker told the longtime politician that he had already signed a letter of support for Hoyer. The congressman said he was stunned when Murtha told him, "Letters don't mean anything."

Hoyer's supporters complained about such tactics.

DOJ_NMG_0095117

"Commitment is something of value in this institution," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "If you have somebody in this race saying, 'Oh, your promises don't really mean anything in a secret ballot,' that bothers me, and it should bother a lot of people."

Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the powerful Appropriations defense subcommittee, has been dogged by allegations that he has skirted ethical boundaries and has thwarted efforts to tighten rules on lobbying. Those questions were amplified yesterday after at least three attendees at the Tuesday-night meeting of Blue Dog lawmakers complained that Murtha had disparaged the Democrats' ethics and lobbying package.

"He said, 'You know, I believe it's total crap, but Nancy supports it, and I'm going to push it,' " said a senior Blue Dog Democrat and Hoyer supporter, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was divulging comments from a closed-door meeting.

Pelosi aides stressed that Murtha remains dedicated to the package's passage, but the dust-up rekindled memories of past Murtha votes. He was one of 12 Democrats to vote against campaign finance legislation written by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), and he was one of four Democrats who opposed an ethics package earlier this year that was designed to contrast the Democrats' tough stance with a weaker Republican bill. He also pushed a rules change to block outside groups from filing complaints to the House ethics committee.

The Murtha camp has accused Hoyer of a "stay the course" mentality on Iraq, which Hoyer says does not accurately reflect his call for a phased redeployment of troops.

Although the main focus has been on the nasty sniping between Murtha and Hoyer, the unspoken story is the long-simmering rivalry between Pelosi and Hoyer. The two have known each other more than 40 years -- since, as young, ambitious Maryland natives, they interned for then-Sen. Daniel B. Brewster.

At one time they were friends, but their ambitions eventually put them on a collision course. Pelosi nominated Hoyer in a 1991 House leadership race and was one of his lieutenants. But in 2001, the two ran against each other in a protracted and nasty race for minority whip. Pelosi won handily, but her allies charge that Hoyer never stopped running for the next prize and along the way tried to undercut her authority. Hoyer has said he has never been anything but supportive of Pelosi.

For the most part, lawmakers, Hill aides and some outside advisers -- even some close to her -- say they are at a loss to explain why Pelosi has held a grudge for so long, because she clearly has the upper hand as leader of the House Democrats. They suggest that part of what rankles her is that Hoyer is not beholden to her and feels no compulsion to publicly agree with her on every issue. This, allies say, she sees as a sign of disloyalty. With the number of declared votes still heavily favoring Hoyer, Murtha's supporters were hoping a plea to unify behind Pelosi would secure an upset today.

It is not clear that the pitch is working. "I'm a DA," said Hoyer supporter Michael Arcuri (D), the Oneida County district attorney just elected to represent his Upstate New York district. "I'm used to pressure."

New Congress Vows To Clean Up Act (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

The midterm elections that ended GOP control of both House and Senate turned on two overriding themes: the war in Iraq and corruption in Congress.

Now, beginning with leadership elections this week, both parties are out to show voters they got the message.

For Democrats, united in a keen desire not to slip back into the minority in 2008, a first step is the promise of a new style of leadership on Capitol Hill: open, bipartisan, and above reproach - and an agenda anchored in the needs of the average American family.

"Voters rejected the Bush agenda, but they haven't yet embraced us," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, who was elevated Tuesday to No. 3 in the Democratic leadership after chairing the party's senatorial campaign committee to a victory few of his colleagues believed would happen. "What we have here could vanish if we don't do the job."

What's missing from Democrats' ambitious early agenda, critics say, is a quick, clean, anticorruption element. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi promised last January to enact an ethics package - including a ban on all gifts from lobbyists, disclosure of earmarks, and a two-year wait before lawmakers leaving office can work as lobbyists - if Democrats took back the House. Pelosi aides say the presumptive House speaker wants an "Honest Leadership Open Government" package - details to be disclosed - to go through the committee process in the new Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0095118

Both the House and Senate later passed versions of lobby reform last spring, but GOP leaders have yet to agree on terms for a conference to work out differences between the two bills, which will die at the end of the 109th Congress in December.

Both ethics and the Iraq war are emerging as key issues in an unexpectedly bitter race for the new House majority leader, the Democrats' second in command behind Ms. Pelosi.

In what is seen as an early test of leadership, Pelosi is publicly backing Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania over her current deputy, Steny Hoyer of Maryland, for the post. Representative Murtha's call for an immediate redeployment of US troops from Iraq helped mobilize the party's antiwar base in last week's election. Murtha charges that Mr. Hoyer's views on Iraq line up with those of President Bush.

In response, Representative Hoyer's supporters are reviving accounts of Murtha's less-than-decisive rejection of a bribe in the 1980 Abscam FBI sting operation. More recently, Murtha has battled allegations that he may have accepted favors from defense contractors.

"The fight between Murtha and Hoyer is a template for Democrats on the war and corruption," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "Until this election, Murtha had an iconic status as an outspoken, truth-telling Democrat, and all of a sudden ethics has become a liability. It's an awkward position for Pelosi, whatever the outcome," he adds.

Most immediately, Murtha's opposition to ethics reform, including past brushes with ethics issues, open Pelosi to charges that she hasn't heard voters on the importance of cleaning up the culture of corruption in Washington.

House Democrats will decide between Murtha and Hoyer in a secret ballot Thursday.

"Future House Speaker Pelosi's endorsement of Representative Murtha, one of the most unethical members of Congress, shows that she may have prioritized ethics reform merely to win votes, with no real commitment to changing the culture of corruption," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a group that took a lead in criticizing former GOP majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas over corruption charges.

Among Senate Democrats, meanwhile, the mood this week was jubilant as they voted for their leaders for the 110th Congress. This slate includes majority leader Harry Reid of Nevada, majority whip Richard Durbin of Illinois, and conference secretary Patty Murray of Washington. Outgoing conference secretary Debbie Stabenow of Michigan replaces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York - a move that presidential watchers view as another signal that the former first lady is preparing for a campaign for the Oval Office.

On the Republican side, there was suspense but little controversy, as the outgoing GOP majority promoted their whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, to replace retiring Republican leader Bill Frist.

In a surprise move, Sen. Trent Lott, a former GOP Senate majority leader, won the whip race. It's the first time a Senate majority leader ran for a lower position, say Senate historians. "I'm doing the job I love the most: count the votes," Senator Lott said.

But stakes are higher - and the mood darker - among House Republicans. In a vote expected Friday, the GOP caucus chooses among John Boehner of Ohio, current majority leader, and challengers Mike Pence of Indiana and Joe Barton of Texas. Mr. Pence, a favorite of conservative commentators, says Republicans lost the majority because they forgot their principles, especially limited government.

Boehner explains the loss as "a referendum on the Bush administration and the war in Iraq," factors that are "now beyond our control." Republicans can regain the majority, he says, by holding Democrats accountable and "holding ourselves accountable" via ethics reform "with teeth."

Pelosi's First Mistake (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095119

As the new House majority caucus prepared to pick its leadership today, Democrats were trying to make the best of the inevitability of Nancy Pelosi as the party's first speaker in a dozen years. They have put out the word that she was not serious in endorsing Rep. John Murtha for majority leader. How much effort she has exerted for her longtime ally is irrelevant, but she has actively solicited votes this week.

The damage to her was irrevocable when she wrote her colleagues Sunday urging them to pick Murtha over Rep. Steny Hoyer. Close associates of Hoyer say her letter stunned him, and he was not alone. While Pelosi had made it clear that she would vote for Murtha, the public endorsement was unexpected.

Although Pelosi's apologists had stressed that this was not a public campaign, but a pro forma endorsement, she began actively campaigning for Murtha on Tuesday. Even before that, the letter itself was taken seriously within the Democratic caucus, including by Hoyer and his close associates. A speaker's written word cannot be taken lightly.

This is a no-win situation for Pelosi. If Murtha wins today, she will be accused of personal vindictiveness in derailing Hoyer, who is more popular in the caucus and better qualified for leadership. If Murtha loses, as is much more probable, she will be seen as bumbling her first attempt to lead the new Democratic majority. Pelosi could have avoided this dilemma by standing aside as Newt Gingrich, then the presumptive speaker, did when he voted for his ally Robert Walker as majority whip but did not ask members to oppose Tom DeLay.

Pelosi's mistake confirms long-standing, privately held Democratic apprehension about her abilities. Such concerns do not reflect the Republican indictment of her as a reflexive San Francisco liberal. Some of her most trenchant congressional critics are on the left wing of the party. These colleagues worry that her decision making may be distorted by personal considerations.

Hoyer is the most accomplished Democratic legislator in the House, widely respected on both sides of the aisle. He, not Pelosi, would be preparing to be speaker had he not lost to her in a 2001 contest for minority whip, thanks to nearly complete support from her huge California delegation. That put Pelosi ahead of Hoyer on the leadership escalator. While Hoyer would win a secret poll of the Democratic caucus as more qualified, Democrats cannot turn aside the first female speaker.

It was assumed that Hoyer would be given the No. 2 position of leading a Democratic majority -- until Jack Murtha announced his candidacy. Never before during his 32 low-profile years in the House could anyone have imagined Murtha seeking any leadership role. He has been a backroom distributor of federal pork who disdained public exposure, and he was in the headlines only as an unindicted co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam scandal. Murtha became an unlikely hero of the left last year when he called for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

With Pelosi and Hoyer working amicably the past two years, the speaker-to-be was expected to keep her hands off the majority leader's race. Since the Nov. 7 elections, she had exhibited restraint, in public utterances and in quietly handling the ambitions of Rahm Emanuel.

Emanuel, as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, was the architect of the 2006 victory. He coveted the third-ranking post of majority whip, but that put him on a collision course with the Congressional Black Caucus's candidate, Rep. James Clyburn. A ruinous competition was averted when Pelosi brokered a deal whereby Emanuel agreed to replace Clyburn as House Democratic Caucus chairman.

But Pelosi's personal pique was evident in her opposition to her rival diva from California, Rep. Jane Harman, as chairman of the House intelligence committee. In line to replace Harman is Rep. Alcee Hastings, who was once impeached as a federal judge on bribery charges.

For a party that effectively stressed a Republican climate of corruption in the recent campaign to consider placing Murtha and Hastings in its leadership astonishes a wide range of Democrats. They do not believe Murtha can defeat Hoyer, but the imminence of Hastings stuns them. Well-placed Democrats have told Pelosi she cannot permit this to happen. What they hesitate to contemplate is what lies ahead based on Pelosi's performance before she has taken the oath.

Same Old Congressional Hacks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095120

EVERYONE FROM President Bush to pundits of the left, right and center have acknowledged that last week's election results show that voters wanted change. So why have Democrats and Republicans in Congress apparently adopted as their theme the Who's famous line: "Meet the new boss, same as the old boss"?

On Wednesday, Senate Republicans went back to the future to choose Trent Lott of Mississippi as the soon-to-be minority whip, the No. 2 Republican in the chamber after Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Yes, the same Trent Lott who had to resign as majority leader four years ago after proclaiming that if the rest of the country had followed Mississippi's lead in voting for segregationist Strom Thurmond for president in 1948, "we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years."

And yes, the Republicans are doing this in the "year of the macaca." One of the reasons they will soon find themselves in the minority, you will recall, was Confederate aficionado and Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of the loaded term "macaca" to describe a minority staffer from his opponent's campaign.

Lott, for his part, might have survived his tasteless tribute to Thurmond, offered at the former Dixiecrat's 100th birthday, if he didn't already have a credibility problem on issues of race. For example, when the Internal Revenue Service moved in 1981 to yank the tax-exempt status of Bob Jones University because it prohibited interracial dating, Lott defended the school's position on religious freedom grounds. Other than the posthumous election of Thurmond as minority leader, it's hard to imagine a worse signal for the Republican Party to send minorities.

Democrats tempted to gloat over Lott's semi-comeback have their own "back to the future" problem. Today, the incoming majority in the House will choose its majority leader, the No. 2 Democrat in the chamber, and Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has endorsed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) for the position over Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the current Democratic whip.

The 74-year-old Murtha is an old hand in the sort of politics that voters supposedly rebelled against last week. Americans with a short memory think of Murtha as the longtime hawk turned critic of U.S. involvement in Iraq. But long before he began to channel the U.S. military's complaints about the Iraq war, Murtha was known as the consummate Washington insider.

He is an avid supporter of the special-interest appropriations known as "earmarking," which are central to the "culture of corruption" that Democrats railed against in the recent campaign. Also, as Times reporters Janet Hook and Richard Simon noted this week, in the 1980s, Murtha was investigated in connection with the Abscam bribery scandal, in which FBI agents posing as wealthy Arab sheiks tested the rectitude of members of Congress. He was cleared of wrongdoing, but his videotaped behavior — "I am not interested, at this point," he said when offered a bribe — proved highly embarrassing.

Murtha's history would seem to belie Pelosi's call for "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." But like the Republicans in the Senate, the new speaker seems willing to go only so far in satisfying the voters' appetite for change. If that disappointing pattern persists, Americans who thought they voted for change might echo the title of the Who classic we quoted above: "Won't Get Fooled Again."

Pelosi And Pork (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

We'll find out when Democrats vote today if Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi was able to push aside her long-serving deputy in favor of her antiwar friend, John Murtha, as House Democratic majority leader. But an even bigger sign of how Democrats plan to govern is whether they implement the "earmark" reform they campaigned on this fall.

House leadership races are typically inside baseball, but Ms. Pelosi's support for Mr. Murtha is notable as a message of politics as usual. The Pennsylvania Congressman first elected in 1974 was an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam probe nearly 30 years ago. As a key Appropriator, he is also a champion of earmarked spending projects and his brother was a renowned earmark lobbyist. If he wins, Democrats will be rewarding his antiwar stance over the need for a cleaner Congress.

All eyes should then turn to whether Ms. Pelosi follows through on her promise to clean up earmarks. So far, she's said the right things about greater transparency that would require every Member to disclose his support for every earmark, which have become such opportunities for corruption. Last weekend she was quoted as saying, refreshingly, that "I'd just as soon do away with all" earmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0095121

The Congressional Research Service counted some 16,500 earmarks in spending bills in 2005, at a cost of nearly $50 billion. Senator Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) says the "real cost" is "probably ten times" greater, because these goodies are the "currency" that Appropriators use to buy the votes to pass bills that might otherwise fail as too costly.

Ms. Pelosi can do something about all this by enacting earmark reform sponsored by two Democrats, Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Chris Van Hollen of Maryland. Mr. Emanuel ran the Democratic campaign committee this year and talked up his reform all over the country as a way to embarrass Republicans.

Their bill would ban any earmarks stuffed into conference reports that were not previously approved by either the House or Senate. Their reform would also make it illegal for members of Congress or their families "to personally benefit from the awarding of an earmark." And the reform would rule out of order any tax provision designed to benefit any individual or company. Good stuff.

But did Democrats mean it? Some Republicans are already questioning Ms. Pelosi's sincerity. The transparency provision she wants to enact was adopted earlier this year by the Republican House, and at the time she described that effort as a "sham" that "does not save one penny or prevent one earmark." Soon-to-be House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey also lambasted GOP earmark reforms as "a fraud," adding that "I don't care if you list the Members who sponsor earmarks" because they are often proud of their pork and because the budget savings would be "miniscule."

By the way, Republicans could also show that they heard voters last week by stripping earmarks from the nine spending bills for fiscal 2007 that they have yet to pass in this lame-duck session. GOP leaders John Boehner and Roy Blunt are seeking re-election with pledges to recommit to a reform agenda based on conservative principles. Earmarking isn't such a principle. But the real hope for reform now lies with the new Democratic majority, and whether it will follow Mr. Emanuel's example, or Mr. Murtha's.

Black Lawmakers In Line For Key Posts (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Three days after workers broke ground for the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall, the Congressional Black Caucus is preparing to break new ground of its own.

Five of its members are poised to take the helm of key House committees when Democrats assume control of Congress next year: John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of Judiciary, Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.) of intelligence, Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.) of House Administration, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) of Ways and Means, and Bennie Thompson (Miss.) of Homeland Security.

Another member, Rep. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), is slated to be named majority whip, which would make him the third-ranking Democrat in the House. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the 110th Congress, has campaigned on his behalf.

"If they accede to that much power, it would truly be the realization of the kind of dream we've been waiting for since the civil rights movement," said Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland political science professor and a former political strategist who is black.

But, said Walters, that is a big "if." The appointment of Millender-McDonald is less certain than those of some of the others, and Hastings faces a steep uphill climb in his bid for the intelligence post because of past ethics problems.

On top of all that, Black Caucus members, who tend to be more liberal, might find it hard to push their traditional social agenda. Conservative and moderate "Blue Dog" Democrats, whose numbers are nearly equal to those of Black Caucus members, have vowed to counter agendas that they deem too liberal.

Rangel, the likely chairman of Ways and Means, which he called the "most important and most powerful" committee, said conservative Democrats need not worry.

"I'm excited to participate in a kinder and gentler Congress," he said. Congress under Republican leadership "was a heavy blow . . . to me personally," he added. ". . . People not talking to each other. It was a nightmare."

For Pelosi, the decision of whether to appoint Hastings as intelligence chairman is something of a headache. Hastings is haunted by accusations that, as a judge, he accepted a $150,000 bribe in exchange for a lenient sentence in a perjury case.

DOJ_NMG_0095122

Hastings was acquitted of bribery and perjury charges by a jury in a criminal trial, but the House impeached him in 1989, and the Senate later removed him from the bench. When Hastings challenged the decision in federal court, a judge, Stanley Sporkin, ruled in his favor and remanded the case to the Senate. The removal was eventually upheld.

One political hurdle for Hastings to overcome in chairing such a sensitive panel as the intelligence committee stems from his long-standing legal debts, which, according to his most recent financial statement, amounted to between $2.1 million and $7.35 million last year. Hastings listed assets worth less than $15,000 in the statement, filed in May.

Pelosi's office declined to comment on Hastings's possible appointment, except to say that he and Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, are vying for the chairmanship. She is already under fire for her decision to support Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) as majority leader, despite ethical issues in his past.

Black Caucus Chairman Melvin Watt (D-N.C.) said the Hastings decision should be a done deal. "The leadership told us a long time ago that it was going to happen, and I believe it's going to happen," he said.

The caucus was founded in 1969 by 13 members who joined forces to address African American concerns, according to its Web site. In the recent midterm elections, its membership grew in number, to 42, and in diversity, with a Jamaican American, a Muslim and a Buddhist joining its ranks.

The coalition was at the height of its power in 1994, said David Bositis, a researcher for the Congressional Black Caucus, but Republicans seized control from Democrats that year and sank the caucus into obscurity. In recent years, it had to beg members of the Bush administration for an audience it rarely got.

Clyburn, the presumed incoming majority whip, said he will work to stamp out the racial perceptions of black Democrats, particularly among those who said -- on background -- that he is not traditionally suited for the job, which normally goes to a skilled backroom dealer and fundraiser.

"People tend to look at you and pigeonhole you based on what they see," Clyburn said, bristling. " 'I know he can't raise money because black folks can't raise money.' I think I earned this position, and I intend to claim it based on my record."

Blacks Eye Leading 5 House Committees (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

House Democrats will find out today which positions of power they will wield in the new Congress, and the magic numbers for members of the Congressional Black Caucus are five and 17.

"That sounds about right, based on seniority," said Reps. Bobby L. Rush, Illinois Democrat, and Albert R. Wynn, Maryland Democrat.

The CBC expects at least five committee chairmanships and as many as 17 subcommittee chairmanships to be led by its members in the 110th Congress after a vote by the Democratic Caucus concludes shortly after noon today. But some said the numbers might not exactly reflect seniority alone on the subcommittee seats.

"You select chairmanships based on seniority, but someone in your caucus can challenge a senior member, and they will have five minutes to explain why they should be the chair and then the committee votes on who should fill that seat," said a Democratic staffer.

And much of this could be affected by the battle between Reps. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania for majority leader.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California backs Mr. Murtha, while Mr. Hoyer has support from many CBC members. That race is becoming extremely contentious and stems from the fight between Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer for minority whip in 2001, which Mrs. Pelosi won.

"What can happen is Mrs. Pelosi can decide to throw her support to someone for a chairmanship, which would give that person a lot of sway with the committee members," said the staffer.

House committees that will be chaired by CBC members are:

•Ways and Means: Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York.

•Homeland Security: Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi.

DOJ_NMG_0095123

•Administration: Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald of California.

•Judiciary: Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan.

Mrs. Pelosi has said publicly that she would support Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, Florida Democrat, as chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, but a staffer in Mrs. Pelosi's office said a decision would not come before Congress returns from the Thanksgiving recess in early December.

"We are strongly supporting Alcee Hastings. I don't think there should be any doubt or question about that," said Rep. Melvin L. Watt, North Carolina Democrat and CBC chairman.

There is concern about Mr. Hastings' past ethics problems. He was a federal district judge in Florida before coming to Congress in 1992, but was impeached and removed from his judgeship in 1989 for bribery and perjury despite being acquitted on all charges in a criminal trial, a first in American politics.

Mr. Hastings said he has visited more than 25 intelligence posts around the world in expectation of this "opportunity" and has gotten support from Democratic members of the Florida delegation.

"People around the country are sending Mrs. Pelosi letters and e-mails on my behalf that I have not solicited, and Nancy has not spoken to me about her intentions as yet, but it is all political, and I am hoping to get the job," Mr. Hastings said.

Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, is the current ranking member, but there has been tension between her and Mrs. Pelosi, as she is a member of the more conservative Blue Dog Coalition of Democrats, that is friendly with Mr. Hoyer.

She was able to secure her position on the committee, after leaving to run for governor and then returning to Congress, through a deal in which the former ranking member on intelligence, CBC member Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr. of Georgia was eased off the committee so Mrs. Harman could take over.

Reid Plotting Agenda (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

The Senate Democratic leadership team plans a long, laborious slog for the Senate next year even as party leaders continue to formalize their legislative agenda for the 110th Congress — an agenda that already includes a couple of surprises.

At a breakfast with reporters Tuesday, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) warned that the "do-nothing" Congress, as his party has labeled recent Republican rule in the chamber, will soon be over.

Promising to "work long hours," Reid said that "we're going to work more than just Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday until noon."

Democratic leaders indicated they were keenly aware that this month's elections, in which they won a majority in both chambers for the first time in 12 years, could be just a flash in the pan if they do not deliver on their campaign promises.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) acknowledged that the 2006 elections were "largely a rejection of George Bush," and not necessarily a full embrace of Democratic policies. But he added that voters "are giving us a chance, and our job over the next two years is to close the deal."

To that end, Reid outlined some of his top legislative priorities for next year, which include an effort to "do everything we can to make elections more civil."

Principally, Reid said that would mean passing a bill to create criminal penalties for election fraud, including offenses such as voter misinformation campaigns carried out by robo-calls and misleading flyers.

Noting that such tactics were used in both the Missouri and Maryland Senate races, Schumer said, "I think the person or people who authorized that should go to jail for 10 years." Currently, civil fines usually are the most serious penalty assessed for such ploys. Schumer added that a separate unit should be created within the Justice Department to deal with cases of election fraud.

Reid said the election measure likely would be one of the first 10 bills Democrats introduce next year — an indication of the high priority the party places on the issue.

Reid also indicated that he wants to rein in independent campaign expenditure groups, known as 527s, even though many of them have helped Democrats even out the edge in hard-dollar fundraising that Republicans have typically enjoyed.

DOJ_NMG_0095124

"We're going to have to take a real close look at 527s," said Reid, acknowledging that some in his party may not like it.

As they assess the rest of their agenda — much of which they already have talked about in broad terms — Democratic Senators and aides said choices still have to be made about what specific legislation should be included under the rubric of their election-year themes of energy independence, modifying the Medicare prescription drug benefit, making college more affordable, raising the minimum wage, passing terrorism prevention measures and protecting employee pensions.

"We're going to be working on that over the next several weeks," said Sen. Patty Murray (Wash.), who was elected this week to serve as secretary of the Democratic Caucus.

Murray added that the party leadership would be consulting with all the incoming chairmen of Senate committees and would be "working with the entire Caucus to put that together."

Reid also indicated that he would be deferential to members of the Caucus, and chairmen in particular, on many legislative issues, saying, "I believe in the committee system."

On the Medicare prescription drug benefit, Democrats already have said their main concern is to give Medicare officials the ability to use the government's buying muscle to negotiate lower prices for medicines. However, Democrats may want to couple legislation to do that with bills allowing the importation of prescription drugs from Canada or eliminating the coverage gap (also known as the "doughnut hole") that some Medicare beneficiaries are experiencing with the drug benefit.

On college affordability, Democrats have been pushing to lower student-loan interest rates, but that could be attached to a proposal to expand Pell Grants, among other things.

Reid said he already had begun talks with incoming Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) about how to press forward with legislation implementing the recommendations of the 9/11 commission, which outlined ways in which the government could make the country safer following the devastating terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

But Reid acknowledged that he may not be able to secure enactment of the entire package of recommendations and noted that some have already become law.

"I'm not going to say we'll do all of them, but we certainly need to do most of them," he said. "We'll move forward as expeditiously as possible in enacting those."

While immigration and trade are unlikely to make the Democrats' top-10 list, party leaders said they would still address the issues as they crop up.

On immigration, Reid said the comprehensive approach that passed the Senate earlier this year would likely be the model for any Democratic reforms to the system.

As for trade deals, Democratic leaders indicated that such pacts would get more scrutiny under now that they are in power.

New Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) said he voted for free trade pacts, such as the North American Free Trade Agreement, but now feels "betrayed."

"We have not created enforceable agreements," Durbin said.

Meanwhile, Democrats are still looking to push a lobbying and ethics reform bill that includes a provision requiring Senators to acknowledge their pet projects, or earmarks, in spending bills, Reid said.

Reid also promised to institute strict internal budget rules, known as pay as you go, and to repeal tax breaks for major oil companies that have seen record profits in recent years.

In addition to charting the waters Democrats want to traverse, Reid also talked a bit about what Democrats won't be doing. He said talk within his party of removing Bush from office was easily quelled by the realization of who would succeed him.

"One of the things we're able to cut off pretty quickly was the 'impeach Bush'" talk, Reid said. "That was because of two words: Dick Cheney."

Time Of Testing For Harry Reid (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095125

When Virginia Sen. George Allen conceded to Jim Webb last week, giving the Democrats their 51st seat in the Senate, the responsibility for the work of the legislative branch shifted definitively -- and a potential weak point for the new majority was exposed.

Hours earlier it became clear that the Democrats had won a majority in the House of almost the same size that Republicans had enjoyed for the past two years -- a working margin large enough to support a fairly ambitious agenda. Nancy Pelosi, who will be speaker of the House, has the personal strength and political skills to hold that majority together at least as well as Dennis Hastert did in his time at the helm. House rules favor majority control, so Pelosi can be generous toward the minority without jeopardizing her chances of success.

The 51-49 Senate is a very different proposition. As Republicans learned to their chagrin in the past few years, it takes 60 votes to accomplish almost anything controversial or substantive in the Senate -- the number needed to bring debate to a close and force an up-or-down vote. That means persuading or pressuring at least nine Republicans to go along. Otherwise, Sen. Mitch McConnell, the crafty Kentuckian elected to be the Republican minority leader, will have veto power over legislation -- before it goes to the White House, where President Bush will wield a veto pen of his own.

That reality puts an enormous strain on Harry Reid, the Nevadan who has struggled these past two years to master the less arduous duties of Senate minority leader. The risk for Democrats is that Reid may not be up to the challenge.

We saw how weakness in the majority leader could hurt a party in the recent example of Sen. Bill Frist. More than once Frist was unable to hold his own troops together on big issues or to thwart Reid and the Democrats when they built roadblocks to administration bills. Now the situation is reversed, and it is Reid who will be tested.

The modern Senate is a haven for freelancers, for senators who play to national constituencies outside the Capitol and whose energies are focused on their personal ambitions. That is especially true during the presidential campaign season, which unfortunately is already upon us.

The Senate is chockablock with presidential wannabes. On the Democratic side, they include the leading contender, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, as well as Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joe Biden of Delaware, Chris Dodd of Connecticut, Barack Obama of Illinois and -- in his own mind, at least -- John Kerry of Massachusetts. On the Republican side, the potential leading candidate, John McCain of Arizona, has many friends, among them such influential and ambitious senators as Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Trent Lott of Mississippi, Lindsey Graham of South Carolina and John Sununu of New Hampshire. Another possible candidate is Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, who represents the religious right.

In addition to those egos and ambitions, Reid will have to contend with a few real mavericks and independent spirits in his caucus. Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, elected last week as an independent Democrat after losing his party's primary to Ned Lamont, has reiterated his intention to follow his own path rather than accept party discipline. He has staked out a position on Iraq -- opposing any timetable for withdrawal -- that is at odds with the prevailing inclination of the new majority.

And Webb, the man who gave the Democrats that majority, will now give their leadership anxious moments. A newcomer to elective politics and resentful of the conventions and demands of the political game, Webb is also a newcomer to the Democratic Party. His previous government experience was as Navy secretary in the Reagan administration. His campaign showed him to be a populist on economic issues and a sharp critic of U.S. involvement in Iraq -- but often unpredictable or uncertain about other questions. Most of all, he resisted being managed or directed, so Reid will have to handle him with kid gloves.

As minority leader, Reid was remarkably effective in keeping the Democratic caucus united but far less successful as a public spokesman for his party. His partisan comments were often too sharp, his television appearances less than commanding. In his new role, he will be far more exposed, and his flaws more conspicuous.

With a House majority and nominal control of the Senate, the Democrats will be expected to deliver on their promise to bring the Iraq war to some kind of conclusion and redirect domestic policy to the benefit of the middle and working classes.

That is a large order for the Senate Democrats and their tiny majority -- and their leader, Harry Reid.

Can The Democrats Deliver? (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

DOJ_NMG_0095126

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Among Washington lobbyists, policy analysts, congressional staffers and journalists, the game last week was to figure out how the Democrats' capture of Congress will refashion legislative agendas. One answer is that we won't know until the leadership sets its political strategy, canvasses its members and consults interest groups. Another answer is: Temper your expectations. Even forgetting possible vetoes by President Bush, the Democrats have less leeway to alter policy than their rhetoric implies.

Although Democrats didn't promise much -- they benefited heavily from unhappiness with the war in Iraq -- they still succumbed to exaggeration. Their sound bites ran ahead of plausible solutions. Consider three familiar themes. Bush's tax cuts for the wealthy; inaction on the minimum wage; and Republican opposition to negotiating Medicare drug prices with the pharmaceutical companies. All are of a piece: The Republicans are lackeys for the wealthy business class; they don't care much about the poor.

But what can the Democrats do? Let's see.

Â· Tax cuts for the rich. Yes, Bush and Congress cut the top two income tax rates from 39.6 percent and 36 percent under Bill Clinton to 35 and 33 percent. They also cut the top tax rate on capital gains (mostly stock profits) from 20 percent to 15 percent and the top rate on dividends to 15 percent (before, dividends were taxed as ordinary income with rates up to 39.6 percent). Because stock ownership is heavily concentrated among the rich, they benefited most from these cuts.

Suppose Democrats repealed them. The top rate would revert to 39.6 percent -- and so on. Given the Democrats' thunderous denunciation of these tax cuts, you might imagine that budget deficits would vanish and there'd be more money for health and education spending. Well, no. In fiscal 2007 and 2008, federal revenue would increase $42 billion and $63 billion, estimates the Tax Policy Center of the Urban Institute and Brookings Institution. Though big sums, they don't even cover the deficits. The Congressional Budget Office projects these at $286 billion (2007) and $273 billion (2008).

Note: Most of Bush's tax cuts expire at the end of 2010, but Democratic leaders haven't pledged to repeal the tax cuts for the rich before that -- and they have pledged to protect Bush's middle-class tax cuts. Even undoing all of Bush's tax cuts probably wouldn't eliminate budget deficits. Altogether, the tax cuts cost the government about $200 billion annually, estimates the congressional Joint Committee on Taxation.

Â· The minimum wage. It hasn't changed since Sept. 1, 1997, when it went to $5.15 an hour. Looks bad for the Republicans. Democrats say they'll increase it immediately, possibly to $7.25 in two steps by 2008. Unfortunately, the minimum wage isn't a powerful way to help the poor.

One problem: If you raise the minimum wage too much, you destroy jobs for the young and unskilled -- the people you're trying to help. Companies won't pay workers more than they're worth. Another problem: Higher wages won't help many poor families, because 40 percent have no workers and 35 percent have only part-time or part-year workers. Finally, many workers with wages around the minimum aren't poor. They're young or part-time workers from middle-class families.

Economist Jared Bernstein of the Economic Policy Institute, a liberal think tank favoring a higher minimum wage, thinks that almost 15 million workers might get a pay increase if the minimum wage went to $7.25. That would represent about 10 percent of all workers and would include those now at the minimum (1.9 million), those between the old and new minimums (4.7 million) and some just above the new minimum (8.3 million). But less than 40 percent of the wage gains would go to the poorest fifth of households.

Â· Drug prices. Democrats will move to lift the prohibition against the government negotiating directly with pharmaceutical companies over drug prices paid by Medicare. Some Democrats want to use the savings to expand benefits, but just how much could be saved is in dispute. The Department of Veterans Affairs already negotiates directly with drug companies. A study by Families USA, a liberal advocacy group, contends that the VA's prices on major drugs are 48 percent lower than Medicare's.

The administration says the comparison is misleading. The VA program serves a smaller population (4.4 million vs. 23 million for Medicare), and drug companies wouldn't provide such steep discounts for a bigger program. Moreover, the VA often gets lower prices by offering only one drug in a class -- and running a competition among suppliers. Medicare wants to provide more choice. Direct negotiations couldn't be easily grafted onto the existing drug benefit, which uses insurance companies. The insurers, the administration says, have already negotiated low prices.

DOJ_NMG_0095127

Even if more savings could be had, they shouldn't be used to expand coverage. Over the next decade, the CBO estimates that the drug program will cost $900 billion; none of that is covered by dedicated taxes. Expanding coverage could worsen budget deficits. For example, the CBO has informally estimated that closing the "doughnut hole" -- a coverage gap in many Medicare drug plans -- would cost $450 billion more over the decade.

On domestic policy, Democrats have few big opportunities. This creates a dilemma. They can either concentrate on symbolic acts (the minimum wage, the drug benefit) that sharpen their differences with Republicans. Or they can find less controversial matters, where cooperation seems possible, to advertise their fitness to govern and their credentials as centrists. It will be difficult to do both. There's only one solace -- the Republicans face the same dilemma.

Pension Deficit Narrows At PBGC (WP/AP)

By Jeannine Aversa

The Washington Post/AP, November 16, 2006

The federal agency that insures private pension plans for millions of Americans logged a deficit of $18.1 billion this year, a big improvement from last year as a new law helped to put the agency on better financial footing.

The deficit for the 2006 fiscal year reported by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. yesterday was down from a shortfall of $22.8 billion recorded in 2005 and a record $23.3 billion in 2004.

"The PBGC's financial condition appears to have stabilized for the time being," said Vincent K. Snowbarger, interim director of the agency, which insures pensions for 44 million workers and retirees.

The agency disclosed in its annual report to Congress that as of Sept. 30 it had assets of $60 billion to cover liabilities of $78.1 billion.

The PBGC attributed the shrinking deficit mainly to a provision in the new pension law that gives airlines that are in bankruptcy protection and have frozen their pension plans extra time for their pension plans to become financially whole. That led to a sharp reduction in probable liabilities on the agency's balance sheet, the agency said.

"From the individual worker's standpoint, you are still looking at a big deficit," said Greg McBride, senior financial analyst at Bankrate.com. "The message here is even if you have a pension, you still need to save on your own because the health of that pension when you go to retire could be tenuous."

The report comes as Americans are feeling anxious about their retirement security. In recent years, the number of ailing companies turning their pension liabilities over to the PBGC has exploded. The problem has been especially pronounced in industries such as steel and the airlines, which are heavily unionized.

Organized labor wants the new Democrat-controlled Congress, which will convene in January, to provide more pension protections, including for defined-benefit plans, which are increasingly being replaced by 401(k) plans.

The PBGC was created in 1974 as a government insurance program for traditional, defined-benefit pension plans. Those plans give retirees a fixed monthly amount based on salary and years of employment. Companies that sponsor these traditional pension plans pay insurance premiums to the agency. If a company can't support its pension obligations, the agency takes over the plan and pays promised benefits up to certain limits.

The maximum annual benefit for plans taken over in 2006 is $47,659 for workers who wait until 65 to retire. Workers who retire before 65 get smaller benefits.

Traditional pension plans are still underfunded but not by as much as in the past, the agency said. These pensions now are underfunded by $350 billion, compared with $450 billion last year. Higher interest rates, a better-performing stock market, improved credit ratings and better plan funding by some companies were among the factors that helped narrow the gap, economists said.

President Bush signed a bill in August to shore up funding for traditional pensions. Supporters hope the changes will help prevent a multibillion-dollar taxpayer bailout of the PBGC.

In addition to insurance premiums paid by companies, the PBGC's operations are financed by money it earns from investments and funds from pension plans it takes over. The agency is not financed through tax revenue.

Government Admits Improper Farm Payments (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0095128

By Libby Quaid, Ap Food And Farm Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

The Agriculture Department on Wednesday acknowledged making improper payments to farmers worth more than $2.8 billion last year.

Officials explained that most of the payments involved missing or incomplete paperwork.

"We take this very seriously," said Chuck Christopherson, the department's chief financial officer. "We know this is something that we can address and that we can fix."

Federal law requires agencies to track erroneous payments, such as checks sent to farmers who were not eligible for a particular program, or payments for the wrong amount of money.

The amount of improper payments in fiscal 2006 was about 11 percent of farm program payments, the department said. The fiscal year ended on Sept. 30.

Officials said nearly all of that, 10 percent, was because of missing or incomplete paperwork. As of last year, officials included in their tracking payments for which paperwork was missing or incomplete, such as a form that went unsigned.

"While I certainly take seriously our jobs to ensure that every T is crossed and every I is dotted, I believe it's noteworthy to distinguish between the two types of errors here," said Teresa Lasseter, administrator of the Farm Service Agency, which runs most farm programs.

FSA is pursuing a plan to consolidate more than 2,300 county offices in an effort to modernize a Depression-era network with too few trained employees and some computers so old they can't connect to the Internet.

The local offices are where farmers sign up for government payments and loans.

"We can't really tell you that smaller-staffed offices or larger-staffed offices fared any better" at preventing improper payments, Lasseter said. "But certainly, better-trained staff with more tools to do their jobs would help us."

The department found fewer than 1 percent of improper payments in its farm programs in 2005, but it tracked fewer programs, reviewing about $38 billion in payments, versus $65 billion in 2006.

Separately, the department found $1.6 billion in improper payments made through the food stamp program. That amount was about 5.84 percent of all payments, Christopherson said, down from 5.88 percent a year before.

In April, the department's inspector general said the agency loaned $9 million over six years to farmers who shouldn't have gotten loans. The audit followed a 1999 report by the inspector general that identified $24.1 million in improper or questionable loans.

___

On the Net:

Agriculture Department: http://www.usda.gov

Rumsfeld Adviser Leaving For Think Tank (AP)

AP, November 15, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's top international policy adviser is leaving his post, in the first announced Pentagon departure since the secretary's resignation last week.

Peter W. Rodman, the assistant secretary of defense for international security affairs, will join the Brookings Institution as a senior fellow. Rodman's move has been in the works for months and was not triggered by Rumsfeld's resignation, according to Pentagon press secretary Eric Ruff.

Rodman, who began his career in government as an assistant to Henry Kissinger, has worked in five presidential administrations, including stints at the National Security Council and the State Department.

He has served as Rumsfeld's senior adviser on security strategy and policy involving the Middle East, Asia and Europe. He traveled recently with Rumsfeld on diplomatic visits to China and southeast Asia.

Rodman will be working with the Foreign Policy Studies Program at Brookings in the new year.

No date has been set yet for Rumsfeld's departure. President Bush has chosen former CIA director Robert Gates to replace Rumsfeld, and the Senate is expected to conduct a confirmation hearing as soon as next month.

DOJ_NMG_0095129

Pentagon's Travel System Is Hardly Used (AP)

By Larry Margasak

AP, November 15, 2006

The Defense Department's computerized travel reservation system has turned into a half-billion-dollar fiasco, so flawed that only 17 percent of the travelers are using it as intended, Senate investigators say.

The system was designed as the Pentagon's version of an Internet travel site, where flights, hotels and rental cars can be booked without the need for fee-based travel agents.

The Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, in checks this year of 41 military installations and the Pentagon, found that 83 percent of travelers have been contacting professional travel agents first — and then using the new system to book the travel afterward.

At the Pentagon, less than 20 percent of travelers used the Defense Travel System as intended. Virtually no travelers used the system at Dugway Proving Grounds in Utah, and Fort Leavenworth, Kan., investigators found.

Once the computer system is activated at an installation, the travelers must use it to make their reservations, the Pentagon said.

Travel agents told the subcommittee they could have booked everything in five minutes. Investigators said using the two-tiered method could take a half-hour, adding that the new system is missing flight and hotel information and does not always provide the cheapest options.

The investigators and Congress' Government Accountability Office are now questioning the Pentagon estimates of how much it saved by replacing the old paper form system with the expensive computerized one.

A senator plans legislation to force the Pentagon to use travel agents, saying military staff is wasting too much time using the cumbersome new system and therefore erasing any cost savings.

Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn., chairman of the investigative panel, said the Pentagon's idea of eliminating travel agents "would be the same as directing all DoD personnel to speak Arabic in order to save money on translation services. DoD is claiming the savings from reduced travel agent fees without considering the cost of having the troops do the work."

Pentagon officials insist the new system is working fine.

"If my boss said I had to leave in a couple of hours, I could do that," said Marine Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman. "The future is in Internet booking. The system is effective, it's efficient, it gives you options on airlines, rental car agencies and hotels. We're very impressed."

For 2006, the Pentagon estimated savings at between $13.9 million and $33.4 million. After 2007, the savings would range between $56 million and $177 million annually, with recent estimates supporting the higher figure, the Pentagon said.

But the cost of the Defense Travel System has skyrocketed, from an initial estimate of $263 million to $474 million.

The subcommittee investigated about 755,000 trips from January through September this year. Besides failing to find all the necessary flight and hotel information, the system is unable to process two-dozen categories of temporary travel, including trips by National Guard and Reserves troops, the subcommittee found.

Coleman said further efforts to save the computer system are a waste. "I am appalled that DoD did not pull the plug on the travel function" of the new system long before now, he said.

The contract was awarded in 1998 to a company that is now part of Northrop Grumman Mission Systems.

Detroit And Bush (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Auto executives from the Big Three finally got their sit-down with President Bush this week, where they (surprise!) pleaded for federal relief. The press billed it as a meeting between the President and "American" car makers, which is true as far as it goes. But what does it mean to be a domestic auto manufacturer today, and do Ford, General Motors and DaimlerChrysler alone still speak for the industry?

The Big Three still dominate U.S. auto production, but foreign makers continue to gain market share, currently accounting for some 40% of all passenger cars and light trucks sold in the U.S. Foreign auto makers also continue to invest and expand their presence stateside. In 2004 foreign-owned plants in the U.S. accounted for nearly 29% of all vehicles produced domestically; in 1984 it was less than 3%. Auto imports are rising, but they remain lower than they were at their peak in the 1980s.

DOJ_NMG_0095130

In a study published earlier this year, the Cato Institute's Daniel Griswold and Daniel Ikenson report that each of the top 10 selling cars and trucks in the first half of 2006 is produced at U.S. facilities. "Toyota Camry, Honda Accord, Chevy Impala (GM), Ford Taurus, Nissan Altima, Ford Explorer, Chrysler Town & Country, and other models that round off the most popular 20, regardless of the location of company headquarters, are produced in U.S. plants by American workers who contribute to the local, state, and national economies through their employment, expenditures, and taxes," the authors note.

All of which suggests that the U.S. auto industry as a whole is healthy and that the troubles of GM, Ford and Chrysler are by and large unique to those Detroit players. This is an important distinction, because the auto executives who met with Mr. Bush are keen to present their current woes as industry-wide. And the Big Three are counting on Michigan's Democrats in Congress, who now find themselves in the majority, to help make the case.

GM posted a $10.6 billion loss last year and has closed plants and offered union-worker buyouts. Ford is downsizing its workforce in the wake of weak sales. Both companies are responding to self-inflicted wounds that result from weak product lines, plus labor deals with the United Auto Workers that include generous benefits and pensions, as well as GM's notorious Jobs Bank that pays thousands of workers for not working. GM is paying for the health care of more retired workers (and their dependents) than of active employees.

These legacy costs, which don't burden foreign competitors, are gobbling up cash at the Big Three and explain their eagerness to seek political benediction. Mr. Bush had been resisting their overtures and appears to be standing his ground, agreeing to little more after this week's meeting than a "continuing dialogue." But with Michigan Democrats Carl Levin and John Dingell filling leadership posts, there's likely to be increased pressure for some kind of government aid. And if these Democrats have their way, that will involve some taxpayer assumption of legacy costs.

The President's inconsistency on bailouts won't help matters. The airlines have received between $15 billion and $20 billion in cash to help keep them afloat in the wake of 9/11. And in 2002 the Bush Administration enacted steel tariffs, even as large bankrupt steel firms dumped their own legacy costs on the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation.

Detroit auto makers are angling for a similar deal, but it would only retard the necessary if painful transformation that is currently taking place at the Big Three. It would also reward bad management decisions -- and union intransigence -- by allowing car companies to toss health care costs over to taxpayers.

Claims that U.S. auto manufacturers are at a competitive disadvantage due to an undervalued Japanese yen also don't hold up. Last year, both the Treasury and Federal Reserve looked into accusations of currency manipulation and found no evidence that it was taking place. Over the past three years the Japanese yen has appreciated against the dollar by about 12%. In any case, the value of the yen has nothing to do with GM competing with the Hondas made in Marysville, Ohio.

With respect to Korea, a huge country with a closely protected auto market, the Big Three have a trade point. But the proper government response is to urge Korea to open its markets more, not to reply in kind. And, by the way, the car makers are also right about U.S. anti-dumping trade laws, which steel makers and their lawyers have used to raise domestic steel prices. How about Democrats and Mr. Bush calling for the repeal of those laws?

GM, Ford, Chrysler and their enablers in the new Congress would have you believe otherwise, but outside of Michigan the U.S. remains a great place to produce vehicles. Consumers have more choices in what to drive and better quality than ever. And prices are competitive. Government intervention in a market this healthy can only increase the chances that it won't stay that way.

OTHER NEWS:

Fed Points To Soft Landing For Economy (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Michael Mackenzie

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Federal Reserve policymakers are becoming a little more confident about their ability to engineer a soft landing for the US economy, minutes published on Wednesday reveal.

DOJ_NMG_0095131

The minutes, from the last Fed policy meeting on October 25, show that most Fed policymakers thought the downside risks to growth had "diminished a little" since the previous meeting, while some thought the upside risks to inflation had also declined, though "only slightly".

However, the outlook for both inflation and growth remains very uncertain.

Policymakers underscored that – not withstanding weak third quarter growth – they are still focused on the risks to inflation, sounding, if anything, more hawkish than in the previous minutes for September.

All members of the committee "expressed concern about the outlook for inflation" and all "agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of the greatest concern."

They talked openly about the need to assess whether they should be raising rates at the next policy meeting in December.

Stocks rallied after the minutes were released, while the futures market priced in a reduced probability that the Fed would cut interest rates early next year.

"They are telling us that they are certainly not leaning that way right now," said Peter Hooper, chief economist at Deutsche Bank Securities.

Tom Di Galoma, head of trading at Jefferies & Co, said the Fed's tough talk would "up the ante" ahead of today's consumer price inflation report.

The minutes show that Fed policymakers viewed the weakness in the third quarter "broadly as anticipated."

While growth had slowed a bit more abruptly than they expected, they attributed this to "temporary influences" that would not have an ongoing effect on economic activity.

Many Fed policymakers "drew some comfort" from recent housing market data. With retail spending "relatively robust" the housing slowdown "also did not seem to be spilling over into consumer spending."

Most expected core inflation to "edge lower" as pressure from past increases in energy prices waned, shelter costs slowed and pressure on overall levels of resource utilisation eased a little.

The committee noted that "recent changes in core prices had declined slightly from earlier in the year."

However, the labour market was "tight" and presented an upside risk to inflation.

There were hints that the patience of some committee members is being stretched.

Fed Keeps Policy Attention Firmly On Inflation (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal Reserve officials remain firmly focused on inflation, minutes of their last policy meeting show, suggesting that a near-term cut in interest rates remains unlikely. Since the Oct. 24-25 meeting, markets have begun to see a greater probability of a rate cut by May, in part because of softer-than-expected data on wholesale prices, manufacturing activity and retail sales.

Still, the meeting minutes, released yesterday with the usual three-week lag, suggest the central bank is sufficiently preoccupied with inflation that the latest data would have little effect on its rate intentions.

Lou Crandall, chief economist at Wrightson Associates, said the pattern in recent months has been for investors to mark up the odds of a rate cut on economic data, then mark them down on commentary from the Fed, such as speeches or statements. Investors, he said, are "overreacting to the bond-friendly news and underreacting to the unfriendly news."

Bond-friendly news is news that suggests lower interest rates.

At the October meeting, the policy-making Federal Open Market Committee left its target for short-term interest rates at 5.25%, where it has stood since late June.

At that meeting, "most" committee members felt "downside risks to economic activity had diminished a little, and likewise some members felt that the upside risks to inflation had declined, though only slightly," the minutes said. "All members agreed that the risks to achieving the anticipated reduction in inflation remained of greatest concern."

They noted that a lot of economic data would be released before the next meeting, on Dec. 12, to help decide "whether any additional firming was needed to address those risks." Even though another rate increase appears unlikely, the fact that officials see their choice as between an increase or no change suggests that odds of a near-term rate cut are remote. Thus, the Fed could stay on hold for some months to come.

DOJ_NMG_0095132

Even though monthly core inflation rates, which exclude food and energy, have moderated from earlier this year, inflation is still higher than what most Fed officials would define as "price stability." Some define price stability as inflation of about 2%, some as 1% to 2% and some wouldn't put a number on it.

Nonetheless, "nearly all participants viewed the current rates of core inflation" -- between 2.4% and 2.9%, depending on the price index used -- "as uncomfortably high and stressed the importance of further moderation."

The minutes said FOMC members expect core inflation to decline, as the indirect effects of the retreat in energy prices feed through to other goods and services, and the cost of housing ceases to be a source of upward pressure. They also said the decline in housing activity is unfolding as expected and that the "risk of an even larger contraction in this sector had ebbed." Some, however, fretted that it could yet spill over to other areas of consumer spending.

While the October meeting was lengthened to two days to discuss improving its communications with the public, little progress was made on that front. Members debated the merits of an explicit numerical objective for inflation -- what they used to call an inflation target -- but selecting such an objective "raised a number of complex and interrelated issues that required considerable further discussion."

Fed insiders have said setting an inflation objective raises questions about what number to use, whether to pick a single number or a range, what time period, if any, in which to commit to achieving that number, and how to update the public on progress toward that objective, such as through a forecast.

Write to Greg Ip at greg.ip@wsj.com2

Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Investors and others hoping for an interest rate cut from the Federal Reserve early next year may be disappointed.

Minutes from the Fed's meeting three weeks ago show that “all” of the central bankers were concerned about inflation and said the risks that price pressures would not diminish were “of greatest concern.”

That, along with fading concern among Fed members about a softening in economic activity, suggest the Fed is nowhere near cutting interest rates, Lehman Bros. chief U.S. economist Ethan Harris says.

“We're a long way from an ease based on what the Fed is saying,” says Harris, who anticipates the Fed will actually raise rates in the first quarter in order to stem inflation pressures.

Recent data on prices have suggested that inflation pressures have eased in recent months. That has led to increased expectations that the Fed would be cutting interest rates early in 2007.

Expectations for a rate cut in the first quarter of 2007 peaked Oct. 4. Investors in a market in which participants bet on future Fed moves at that time were pricing in a nearly 80% chance that the Fed would cut rates in March, the second meeting in 2007, according to Moody's Economy.com.

But those expectations have eased. The odds of a rate cut in March fell to 18% following release of the Fed minutes Wednesday, down from 28% earlier in the day.

Stock prices gave back some of their earlier gains after the minutes were issued midafternoon Wednesday as expectations of a rate cut eased.

The Fed in particular noted that a tight labor market could lead to a “sustained increase in wage pressure,” and thus inflation. Although high profit margins meant some companies could absorb the added wage costs, rather than raise prices, that was by no means a given.

“All meeting participants expressed concern about the outlook for inflation,” the minutes said. “Participants were concerned that inflation expectations could begin to drift upwards if core (excluding food and energy) inflation remained elevated for a protracted period.”

DOJ_NMG_0095133

Although “most” of the Fed officials expected inflation to ease, “they were quite uncertain as to the likely pace and extent of that moderation,” the minutes said.

Economists at Moody's Economy.com still expect the Fed will cut rates twice in the first half of 2007. A softening economy will lead to a weaker job market and a reduction in inflationary pressures, says Dan Jester, associate economist at the economic consulting firm.

The Fed left its target for short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, steady at its meeting last month, marking the third-consecutive meeting without any changes. Fed officials previously raised interest rates at 17 consecutive meetings. The current target, at 5.25%, is the highest in nearly six years.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues next meet to discuss interest rates on Dec. 12. Investors are expecting the Fed will keep rates unchanged next month, as well as at the following meeting in January.

What Slowdown? Stocks March On To Fresh Highs (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Investors bid stocks to fresh highs, their hopes for a less-than-traumatic economic slowdown buoyed by newly released comments by Federal Reserve policymakers.

Minutes from Fed officials' October meeting showed that the central bank's rate setters still are concerned about whether inflation will indeed slow in the months ahead as they have projected. But the minutes also portrayed the housing market's slowdown as orderly, saying the risk of a steeper downturn had "ebbed."

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied 33.70 points, or 0.3%, to a record 12251.71, up 14.3% on the year. Shares in Altria Group, one of the blue-chip average's largest individual components, rose 1.3% after Goldman Sachs upgraded its rating on the company to "buy" from "hold."

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index crossed 1400 for the first time in more than six years but finished shy of that psychologically important number. The index ended 0.2% higher, up 3.35 points at 1396.57, its highest close since Nov. 9, 2000, and up 11.9% on the year. It still would have to rise more than 9% to top its record set in early 2000.

The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index rose 0.5%, or 12.09 points, to 2442.75, up 10.8% on the year. It was the best close since Feb. 15, 2001, though the index would have to more than double to reach a new record.

"We're seeing a self-fulfilling prophecy take place in the market right now," said S&P strategist Sam Stovall. "You have money managers saying, 'I don't want to be left behind,' " while their competitors rack up big year-end gains.

An $8 billion offer by US Airways Group to acquire Delta Air Lines also helped the market, especially the transportation sector. But on a downbeat note, crude-oil prices rose on supply concerns.

Contracts for December delivery rose 48 cents, or 0.8%, to $58.76 a barrel, still off 2.8% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

In other economic news, the Fed's New York branch released results of this month's Empire State Manufacturing survey, which showed surprisingly strong industrial activity in the state. Contrary to analysts' expectations for a monthly drop in the survey index, it rose this month to 26.66, the highest reading since June.

Today, the market will receive fresh data on inflation at the consumer level, which could set off another round of heated speculation about the Fed's next move. Analysts expect the government's Consumer Price Index to show a 0.2% increase in October, not including volatile food and energy prices.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1 and bond prices fell2: The 10-year note fell 11/32 point, or $3.44 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.619%. The 30-year bond fell 16/32 to yield 4.697%.

The dollar was mixed3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 118.04 yen, compared to 117.51. The euro rose to $1.2826, compared to $1.2822.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com4

In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0095134

By Dale Russakoff

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

COULTERVILLE, Ill. -- Billy Vandom was 220 feet underground, but to him, it was the top of the world. He is a coal miner, a species of well-paid American worker that was on the verge of extinction in these parts for more than a decade.

Now global economic forces have realigned, and coal mining is back. And a new generation of miners is living the good life not seen here since coal was king.

"I was able to buy me a new truck and I got my wife a new car," said Vandom, 22, from the helm of an enormous ram car, hauling tons of freshly mined coal through the low-lit darkness of the Gateway Mine here. "We have a new baby boy, and we moved into a new apartment and we fixed up a nice room for him."

Vandom has gone from struggling to pay bills with two low-wage jobs -- cooking at the Elks club and changing oil at the local Pennzoil -- to making $20 an hour plus benefits.

Those are union wages, but there is no union here. As the industry withered east of the Mississippi River, so did the United Mine Workers of America -- from 167,000 active members in 1980 to 16,000 today. The shift is profound in Southern Illinois, where being a miner used to begin with pledging allegiance to the UMWA for leading miners into the middle class.

Now the union is trying to come back, too, beginning with an organizing campaign targeting Peabody Energy Corp., owner of the Gateway Mine and the world's largest coal company.

It is proving to be a tough slog, and not just because the weakened union is up against a multibillion-dollar company. The UMWA is struggling to bridge a gap between young workers like Vandom, giddy over high wages in this long-depressed region, and older ones focused on pensions and gold-plated health care in retirement.

It is the same generational divide that defines the national debate over Social Security, but it is starker here because there is no one in the middle. As Midwestern coal production crashed in the 1980s and 1990s, young workers fled. People here refer to a "lost generation of miners." At Gateway, as at mines throughout the area, almost everyone is over 50 or under 30.

It falls to UMWA organizer Ron Huff to try to straddle the generation gap. He said he is making headway with middle-aged miners but very little with younger ones.

"All they can see is the money," he said. "I was the same way when I was their age."A Generation Gap

The miners here come not only from different generations but different worlds. Those in their 50s mostly began mining as union men from union families, following grandfathers, fathers and uncles.

Their towns erected memorials to men who died in mine accidents alongside memorials for fallen soldiers. They relied on the union to protect them in a dangerous workplace and were raised to revere John L. Lewis, the longtime UMWA president.

"I have three pictures side by side in my house: John L. Lewis, Franklin Delano Roosevelt and Jesus," said Jack McReynolds, 70, a retired miner eating lunch recently at Lola's Uptown Restaurant in West Frankfort, once home to seven coal mines, all now closed. "I draw Social Security on account of FDR. I draw a pension on account of John L. Lewis, and I'm going to Heaven because of Jesus."

Minutes later, in walked an embodiment of the rupture in the union culture. Carl "Bubba" Vincelette, 27, another Gateway miner, was in grade school as mines closed and once-proud union men clamored to be janitors. His father never mined coal. "A lot of the young guys see all these places were union before and they all closed, so it's all part of what went wrong," he said.

If older miners say the union made them middle class, Vincelette credits Peabody, which he sees as a progressive firm that pays four times what he made at his previous job and invests heavily in safety and training. In two of the past three years, Peabody mines have won the Mine Safety and Health Administration's top award for safety.

Bobby Townsend, 46, one of the youngest union supporters at Wildcat Hills, a strip mine 80 miles southeast of here, sees Peabody very differently. He speaks with outrage about a company whose stock soared with energy prices and rewarded its departing chief executive with $46 million last year but won't pay for the health insurance of miners like him when they retire.

"It's out of balance between the corporate world and the workers, and we have to make a stand," he said. "We work ourselves to the bone and they go to a gym to get exercise. They look 50 when they're 70. We look 70 when we're 50. We spend our life making these people millions of dollars; we ought to at least have pension and medical."Not Quite Golden

DOJ_NMG_0095135

A dozen men in miners' boots filed into a meeting hall in Harrisburg, Ill., after their 10 1/2 -hour shift at Wildcat Hills. All had publicly pledged to support the UMWA, and all were over 50 but Townsend, his dark hair a striking exception among the gray and the bald.

"Nobody younger than me is up for the union," Townsend said. "They're buying houses and motorcycles. They think it'll run forever."

"It won't," said Larry Robbins, a miner for 26 years. His last union mine closed in the 1990s, three months before he would have logged a golden 20 years -- golden because that's when union miners qualify for lifetime retiree health insurance. Every year worked in a UMWA mine counts toward the 20. Time in a nonunion mine does not.

Around the room, one after another miner said he needed only a year or two or three of union time to hit the 20-year mark. All had voted as young men to limit wage increases in favor of retiree benefits -- only to see the clock stop before their time came.

Gary Wheeler, 53, had 17 years when his mine closed in 1994. Danny Droit, 59, said he had "roughly" 20, but worried that his total time would fall just short of the mark. Dick Bearden had 17 years.

"That medical card is worth its weight in gold," Townsend said. "My father-in-law retired with it, and he didn't have to worry what the doctor or the medicine cost. My father is in construction and is still working at age 76 to pay for health insurance."

The former union miners were among thousands east of the Mississippi River whose mines closed after Congress mandated acid rain controls in 1990, shattering demand for high-sulfur coal. To comply, utilities switched en masse to low-sulfur coal from the vast Powder River Basin in Montana and Wyoming.

The shift effectively broke the union. Mines closed or went bankrupt across the Midwest and northern Appalachia, where the union was dominant, and opened throughout the nonunion West.

Court rulings hastened the union's decline. Gateway, for example, was for decades a union mine doing business as Zeigler 11. But its previous owner won the right in bankruptcy court to shed its union contracts in 2004. Peabody bought the mine out of bankruptcy, changed its name and reopened it in 2005 under a nonunion subsidiary, Black Beauty Coal Co.

Eighty percent of Peabody's miners were unionized in the 1980s. With its operations now mostly in the West, chief executive Gregory Boyce reported this year to shareholders that 85 percent of Peabody's coal comes from "union-free operations."'I Just Want the Cash Now'

Coal's rebound here is a direct result of soaring U.S. demand for electricity, half of which currently comes from coal. The Bush administration is promoting coal as a "freedom fuel" -- in contrast to foreign oil -- and utilities are on a coal binge, with 154 new coal-fired plants on the drawing board. New plants must have scrubbers that remove sulfur before it reaches the atmosphere, so high-sulfur coal is back in the game. Meanwhile, coal states and the industry are investing heavily in technologies to convert coal into liquid fuel to power cars and jet planes.

The Illinois Office of Coal Development forecasts 3,000 new mining jobs statewide in the next three years, and another 2,000 as older miners retire, but that is just a shadow of the roughly 20,000 coal mining jobs that were here before the crash. And other high-paying production jobs are vanishing; a nearby Maytag plant with 942 workers is closing next month.

Younger workers interviewed throughout the area said they felt they had little leverage to complain about long hours or difficult working conditions because so many people were waiting in line for jobs that pay well. Gateway had 1,300 applicants for its 200 jobs, according to operations manager Thomas A. Benner.

Aaron Wright, 37, a son and nephew of union miners, said he would happily work without a union if he could get a coal-mining job.

"I'm tired of making $8 to $9 an hour, not enough to support myself, not enough to support my kids," Wright said. "I just want the cash now."

Middle-aged union supporters say younger workers are naive to think they won't face supervisors who underestimate danger or play favorites in assigning work, or try to deny their rights if they are injured or lay them off without explanation. They say they've seen all this and more.

But Vic Svec, Peabody's senior vice president for communications, said the company works hard to show workers they don't need a union. Peabody pegs its wage scale to match or exceed the UMWA's, he said. It also provides a 401(k) with a generous company match, and pays bonuses at mines that meet productivity and safety targets. Vandom said he gets a $700 to $800 bonus about every three months.

DOJ_NMG_0095136

"Our strategy is to have the best possible relationship with employees," Svec said. "We don't feel it benefits our employees or our operations to have third parties involved."Thinking Long Term

With so many miners nearing retirement age, Peabody also has a major financial interest in keeping the union at bay: Retired miners have much higher than average medical costs, according to a union study.

This was easy to believe from the collective ailments of UMWA pensioners who gathered on a recent morning at the Knights of Columbus hall in Pinckneyville. Robert McCrary, 72, who retired from Arch Coal Inc. after 36 years, said he has black lung disease, and heart disease that has required multiple stents, a defibrillator and a pacemaker. He said he takes 16 prescription drugs.

Larry Bruns, 63, who retired from Peabody after more than 37 years, said he has had hip replacements, a hernia, carpal tunnel syndrome, arthritis, high blood pressure and an enlarged prostate -- "and I'm just a young pup."

With so few active union miners, many retirees say they worry the UMWA will have trouble defending their increasingly costly health care at the bargaining table. Retiree medical care is negotiated in each union contract.

"If they take the insurance away, they'll just need enough to bury me," said Rick Harrison, another Zeigler retiree, who has had three open-heart surgeries and is due for a fourth.

Back at Lola's Uptown Restaurant, Vincelette recalled that he had listened with an open mind when a UMWA organizer visited him recently. The organizer said union coal miners elect safety committees that have authority to shut a mine if they judge it unsafe. But Vincelette said he trusted Peabody to be vigilant about safety.

The organizer also said that with 20 years in a union mine, Vincelette would get retiree health insurance for life. But 20 years sounded like an eternity.

"The way everything's going -- wars and stuff like that -- it's hard to think long term," he said.

McReynolds, the retired UMWA miner with John L. Lewis's picture in his living room, listened from across the table in pained silence.

When the young miner left, McReynolds rose slowly from his chair and straightened his Mason's hat bearing a UMWA pensioners' emblem and a gold pick-and-shovel pin the union gave him. "That young man has no idea what he's talking about," he said.

Most Students In Big Cities Lag Badly In Basic Science (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — A least half of eighth graders tested in science failed to demonstrate even a basic understanding of the subject in 9 of 10 major cities, and fourth graders, the only other group tested, fared little better, according to results released here Wednesday.

The outcome of those tests, part of the National Assessment of Educational Progress, often called the nation's report card, showed that student performance in urban public schools was not only poor but also far short of science scores in the nation as a whole.

Half or a little more of the eighth-grade students in Charlotte, San Diego and Boston lacked a basic grasp of science.

In six of the other cities — New York, Houston, Chicago, Cleveland, Los Angeles and Atlanta — the share of eighth graders without that knowledge was even higher, ranging from about three-fifths in New York to about four-fifths in Atlanta. By comparison, the corresponding share for the nation as a whole was 43 percent.

Among the 10 cities, only in Austin were the eighth graders who lacked a basic understanding in the minority, and just barely there.

"It's a national disgrace," said Rodger W. Bybee, director of the Biological Sciences Curriculum Study, which develops and evaluates science curriculums and promotes the teaching of science. "We as a nation should be able to do better than that."

DOJ_NMG_0095137

At the fourth-grade level, a majority of students in all the 10 cities except Austin, Charlotte and San Diego failed to demonstrate basic understanding in science, compared with 34 percent nationwide. According to a report accompanying the scores, this meant they lacked the skills and reasoning needed to learn science, and could not read simple charts or follow elementary experiments. A similar definition, though with expectations of a higher level of skill, applied to eighth graders.

Students in New York were on a par with those in other large cities, though white students there scored lower than whites in other cities and in the nation. The scores of blacks and Latinos in New York were not significantly different from those of similar students in the other cities.

New York's schools chancellor, Joel I. Klein, pointed out in a statement that low-income students there had done better than those in most other cities, but added, "We, like the rest of the country, have a lot more work to do in this critical area" of teaching science to the poor.

He noted that beginning with the next academic year, the city would begin testing students annually in science in Grades 3 to 8. Another innovation for the 2007-8 school year is that under the No Child Left Behind Act, public schools across the country must begin testing students in science at least once from Grades 3 to 8. But the results of these tests, like those of New York's, will not determine whether schools have made sufficient progress under the law, which counts only reading and math to determine a school's standing.

While states use a hodgepodge of tests to measure student achievement, the national assessment is the only exam given to students nationwide. The science test — in earth, physical and life sciences — was given in early 2005 to 280,000 students, including an extra 30,000 at public schools in the 10 cities, which had volunteered so that they could get a comparative snapshot of performance. The scores were grouped in four categories, from below basic to advanced.

The results prompted the Council of the Great City Schools, which represents the nation's largest school districts, to call for national standards in science, and in reading and math as well.

Michael Casserly, the group's executive director, acknowledged that political resistance to national standards was strong in a nation that generally considers education a prerogative of localities. But Mr. Casserly said such standards would lend clarity to efforts to improve achievement.

The fourth-grade national assessment, he said, tests students in subjects like electrical circuitry, the difference between plant and animal cells, and the formation of rocks. "But some state standards," he continued, "don't teach them until the fifth grade. It is not clear, then, what our teachers are supposed to teach when."

Gerald Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teachers Association, who wrote some of the questions asked on the national assessment, said he found the test results "extremely disappointing."

"There's no way these kids are going to be able to survive in our technological society," Dr. Wheeler said.

With the exception of fourth graders in Austin, low-income students in urban schools performed significantly below the average for low-income students nationwide. "Student poverty, parent education, home resources, English-language proficiency and other factors outside our control work in tandem like a perfect storm to dampen our results in ways that few others have to contend with," Mr. Casserly said.

But the results suggested that performance was influenced more by the disparities associated with race and income than by whether students attended school in cities or in other settings, said Darvin M. Winick, chairman of the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees the test.

For example, while Atlanta was below the median in the ranking of urban performance, its white fourth graders not only did better on the exam than did 86 percent of fourth graders across the country but also outperformed the nation's white fourth graders as a whole, who reached only the 62nd percentile. At the same time, the city's black fourth graders were in the bottom 22 percent of fourth graders nationwide — two points below the national average for blacks.

Only in Austin, Houston and Charlotte did black and Latino fourth graders score higher than similar students in the nation as a whole. Still, their scores were in the bottom 25 percent to 32 percent of all students taking the exam.

Urban Students Perform Worse At Science (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095138

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Children in major U.S. cities perform worse than other students around the country on science tests given in elementary and middle school, a snapshot released by the government Wednesday shows.

Ten urban school districts volunteered to take the tests and have their scores compared to public school students nationwide for the first time.

Fourth-graders in nine of the 10 city districts had lower average scores than public school students nationally. The only exception was Austin, Texas, where they performed at the national average.

In eighth grade, all 10 urban districts had average scores below the national average.

The science scores are from the 2005 National Assessment of Educational Progress, a test given nationwide periodically on a range of subjects. It is viewed as the best way to compare student achievement across state and district lines.

Besides Austin, the urban districts that participated in the comparative look were: Atlanta; Boston; Charlotte, N.C.; Chicago; Cleveland; Houston; Los Angeles; New York and San Diego.

The districts enroll a disproportionately large share of minorities, children who have limited English ability, and children from low-income families. Taking this into account, the results showed minorities in the city schools often performed similarly to students with the same backgrounds in the national sample.

The topics covered on the tests include earth science, physics, chemistry and biology.

The new scores emphasize how much room for improvement remains across a range of urban districts -- just as is the case for most of the nation's schools.

Nationally, for example, just a little more than a quarter of students in both grades could handle challenging subject matter -- a skill level educators call "proficient".

Among the city schools, only Austin had about that proportion of students testing at that level in both grades, with Charlotte not far behind.

Cleveland had the smallest percentage of fourth- and eighth-grade students who were proficient -- no more than 6 percent.

Fourth-graders working at a proficient level can relate the relative amount of time a candle burns to the amount of air available. Proficient eighth-graders can identify the energy conversions that occur in an electric fan.

Nationally, 34 percent of fourth-graders fell into the bottom achievement category, unable to perform at even a "basic" level. That category also applied to 43 percent of eighth-graders.

The urban districts all had more students in the lowest-scoring category than the nationwide sample.

Chicago and Los Angeles had the most fourth-graders in that group, with 65 percent falling below basic levels.

Atlanta fared the worst among eighth-graders, with 78 percent of students recording below basic scores.

Gerry Wheeler, executive director of the National Science Teacher Association, called the report discouraging.

"There's no way these young adults are going to be able to survive in this scientific and technological society," Wheeler said. He cited high teacher turnover and a lack of emphasis on teacher training as problems in urban school districts.

The government could not point to specific trends for the urban group, since this was the first time those cities have volunteered to have their scores put under a microscope.

The national science scores were released earlier this year and showed improvements among elementary school children nationwide in science since 2000, but not among middle and high school students.

"We need to devote more time and energy to science instruction, not just in the cities but nationwide, because nobody has much bragging rights on science performance anywhere in the country," said Michael Casserly, executive director of the Council of the Great City Schools -- a coalition of urban public school systems.

Casserly said the test results demonstrate a need for national standards in science to clarify what students are expected to know. The group also is advocating national standards for reading and math.

Urban students generally also scored lower than students nationwide in reading and math on national tests given last year.

The No Child Left Behind law, which Congress passed in 2001, requires states to administer their own assessments in math and reading, with penalties for schools that fail to improve.

State science testing under the law will begin in the 2007-08 school year, although schools will not face consequences for their performance -- something President Bush wants Congress to change.

DOJ_NMG_0095139

The new report of lackluster performance underscores a deep concern among political and business executives who see eroding science achievement as a threat to the U.S. economy.

KBR Becomes Separate Stock (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, November 16, 2006

The investor on the street is about to get a chance to own a piece of Iraq Inc. The question is, will he want to?

Today, KBR, which runs almost every aspect of the Iraq war except the fighting, will trade as a separate stock after an initial public offering. It raised $473.3 million Wednesday, after pricing the 27.8 million shares it's selling at $17 a share.

KBR isn't a household name, but it's the unit of Halliburton that handles everything in Iraq ranging from operating cafeterias for soldiers to providing fuel, laundry and other services. Vice President Cheney used to be CEO of Halliburton, a fact that was a political lightning rod in the 2004 election.

And that's the problem. With Democrats in control of Congress, largely due to voters' displeasure with Iraq, KBR must persuade investors to take part of its IPO.

For investors, "KBR is the demon spawn of Halliburton," says Ben Holmes, publisher of MorningNotes.com, a market and IPO research firm. "That will have some effect."

•Revenue at risk. KBR gets 56% of its revenue from its efforts in Iraq and Afghanistan, says William Smith, CEO of Renaissance Capital.

Last year, 65% of KBR's $10.1 billion in revenue came from U.S. government contracts. With Democrats in charge, the windfall will likely dwindle. "The Iraq situation has been a financial plus for this organization," Smith says. KBR "isn't picking up arms, but it's picking up everything else."

The company says in a regulatory filing that a "decrease in the magnitude of work we perform for the United States government in Iraq" would have a "material adverse effect on our business."

•Potential for investigations. A Democratic Congress may further investigate the company, already at the center of several probes, Holmes says.

In June 2005, the Defense Contract Management Agency recommended withholding $55 million until KBR further documented billings for housing soldiers. Another $95 million in bills have been questioned regarding dining facilities in Iraq. KBR's procurement matters are being investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice and an assistant U.S. Attorney in Illinois.

But KBR has been broadening its business outside Iraq, says Francis Gaskins of IPOdesktop. Its backlog of business jumped 42% from last year to September, largely on non-Iraq jobs. The backlog is the salvation of a company that normally would struggle to win over investors. But it's unclear how profitable it is and whether investors are willing to pay up. "When investors really analyze the valuation, they aren't going to like it," he says.

Dems May Expand Senate Majority In '08 (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Democrats will have a wider field of possibilities and probably more open seats available to expand their majority in 2008, though Senate Republicans will have several chances to pick off red-state Democrats.

Of the 33 seats up for election two years from now, 21 are held by Republicans. Eight of those 21 were elected with 55 percent of the vote or less in 2002, and in seven of them the incumbent is a freshman. The party also faces several retirement questions.

Democrats might not lose any incumbents to retirement now that they are in the majority — a crucial first step to maintaining and growing that majority.

Two big Democratic retirement risks, 82-year-old Sen. Frank Lautenberg (N.J.) and 69-year-old Sen. Jay Rockefeller (W.Va.), intend to run again in 2008, according to their offices. Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), who turns 67 on Sunday, could announce whether he will run for a fifth term by the end of the week, his office said.

DOJ_NMG_0095140

Harkin, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), 72, who has not decided, and Sen. Max Baucus (D-Mont.), 64, who did not respond to inquiries, may be re-energized by capturing prized committee chairmanships. Levin will lead the Armed Services Committee, Baucus will run the Finance Committee and Harkin will head the Agriculture Committee.

All five of those seats would be attractive to Republicans if they were open, though Harkin has never garnered more than 55 percent of the vote in his four campaigns, and his seat will draw Republican attention regardless of whether he stays or goes.

Lautenberg's decision to run again is particularly important for Democrats because he already retired once, in 2000, only to run again in 2002; does not have a chairmanship because his seniority was not restored; and could face tough opposition from Tom Kean Jr., the Republican candidate this year, who ran strongly even though he was defeated.

Jennifer Duffy of the Cook Political Report expects Democrats to skate into 2008 with all five of these potential retirees. "Given that Democrats have the majority, I don't expect anybody to retire," Duffy said. "I think Harkin was thinking about it, but now that he has Ag, what's his incentive to retire? Maybe Rockefeller was thinking about it, but now he's got Intelligence, so what's his incentive?"

On the Republican side, Sens. Pat Roberts (Kan.), 70, Pete Domenici (N.M.), 74, and Ted Stevens (Alaska), who turns 83 on Saturday, have all told The Hill they intend to seek reelection. But speculation is rampant about Sens. John Warner (Va.), 79, and Wayne Allard (Colo.), who is at the tail end of a two-term-limit pledge.

Warner spokesman John Ullyot said the senator generally decides whether to run about a year and a half before an election. Allard, who has raised the least and has the second-least cashonhand ($120,000) of the 33 senators up for reelection in 2008, will wait until after the New Year to decide, spokeswoman Laura Condeluci said.

Both states would be prime pickup territory for Democrats, who will hold the other Senate seat in each come January. Allard's seat is a target whether he runs or not, and Democrats already have a strong candidate in Rep. Mark Udall, who declared for the race in March 2005 and had more than $1 million on hand as of October.

In purple Virginia, former Gov. Mark Warner (D), who decided against a presidential bid recently, would be a strong candidate to replace Republican Sen. John Warner.

The most vulnerable incumbents are Allard, Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) and Sen. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), according to the Cook Political Report. No races are yet listed as tossups.

Along with Landrieu, Baucus and Sens. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) give Republicans four possible red-state pickups. Landrieu, who intends to run for a third term, is listed as "lean Democratic," while the latter three and Harkin are "likely Democratic."

But Republicans failed to field strong challengers against red-state Democrats Ben Nelson (Neb.), Kent Conrad (N.D.) and Robert Byrd (W.Va.) this year, drawing their biggest recruiting successes in blue states Maryland and New Jersey. They did not pick up any Democratic seats.

For Democrats, Allard and Coleman are listed as "lean Republican," while four other Republicans — Susan Collins (R-Maine), John Sununu (R-N.H.), Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), and James Inhofe (R-Okla.) — are listed as "likely Republican."

Dole, a 70-year-old freshman and outgoing head of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, intends to run again, according to her office. Inhofe, who turns 72 on Friday, did not respond to requests for comment but has talked about assuming the Armed Services chairmanship in 2009, suggesting he expects to be around after 2008.

Roberts, 70, intends to seek reelection, according to his office, and Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.), 68, will make a decision a year from now, spokeswoman Jenny Manley said. Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), 60, has not decided, but has expressed interest in running for president.

Two Democratic senators, Joseph Biden Jr. (Del.) and John Kerry (Mass.), may retire and run for the White House. Biden's office said he is taking the necessary steps to run for Senate, and Kerry's presidential prospects took a hit this month when his "botched joke" appeared to insult the intelligence and education of soldiers in Iraq. Kerry later apologized.

Republican Rep. Mike Castle (Del.), who just won statewide reelection by 18 points in his at-large House seat, would have a strong shot at succeeding Biden, but both Delaware and Massachusetts are blue states.

Biden will lead the Foreign Relations Committee, and Kerry will lead the Small Business Committee. Another blue-state Democrat, Sen. Dick Durbin (Ill.), who didn't face a strong challenge in 2002, will be assistant majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0095141

Early retirements within the realm of possibility include: Hawaii, where Democratic Sens. Daniel Inouye and Daniel Akaka will both be 84 on Election Day; Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Arlen Specter, 76, has battled Hodgkin's disease; and Wyoming, where Republican Sen. Craig Thomas, 73, last week revealed he has leukemia. Thomas and Akaka were both reelected last week, and Akaka will now chair the Veterans Affairs Committee.

Amy Sherman and Madeleine Scinto contributed to this report.

Family-friendly Agenda Urged (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

Democrats closed a so-called "parent gap" in this month's election and should seize the moment by pushing family-friendly legislation, analysts told a Capitol Hill briefing yesterday.

Married parents -- especially married mothers -- have voted Republican in recent years, partly because of a perception that Democrats don't care about family issues, said Michele Stockwell, a social policy analyst with the Progressive Policy Institute.

This month's election results show that Democrats "closed this parent gap, at least temporarily," she said. But the gap needs to be closed permanently by addressing families' concerns.

Sen. Blanche Lincoln, Arkansas Democrat, told those at the briefing that Democrats are up to the task, even though they need to be "a little more expressive" about it.

"Getting results is the most important thing we can do in leadership," she said, citing employee flextime, easier access to health care, more trained health care workers in geriatrics and more Internet safety tools to protect children as important legislative goals.

Some family advocates, however, expressed dismay at the lack of attention to family issues in Democratic platforms. For instance, the House Democrats' "Six for '06" agenda laid out goals for changing Iraq policy, raising the minimum wage, making college tuition a permanent tax deduction, lowering gas prices, promoting stem-cell research and blocking partial privatization of Social Security.

But expanded paid sick leave for workers? A Democratic Senate staffer recently said an issue like that wouldn't be considered for "several years," said one audience member.

Pollster Anna Greenberg of Greenberg Quinlan Rosner told the Progressive Policy Institute event that the war in Iraq and the economy were voters' top issues, but political leaders -- especially the new Democratic majority -- shouldn't let those issues obscure the "underlying discontent" that most voters feel about their personal finances.

Polls find that "the biggest source of stress is work [and] the biggest source of stress about work is how much you make," said Ms. Greenberg, adding that both low-income and middle-income families are feeling "squeezed" as expenses outstrip incomes.

In many households, both parents are working to get ahead, but this only feeds into another huge concern, which is "not having enough time with their kids," Ms. Greenberg said.

"And this is not just the problem of married parents," she added. "This is the No. 1 concern of single parents, especially single moms. They are the least likely to feel they have control over what their kids are doing."

Democrats have a huge opportunity to act on these issues, especially by working with Republicans and finding common ground, said Shelley Waters Boots, a policy leader at the Parents Action for Children, a parents' advocacy group founded by actor-director Rob Reiner.

These "shouldn't be one-party issues," she said. "These issues are ripe for the taking."

Stan Greenberg And James Carville (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

Sweet as it was to win control of the House and the Senate in the 2006 election, some Democratic operatives think their victory could have been bigger if national party chairman Howard Dean had been willing to spend more in districts where races were close.

DOJ_NMG_0095142

According to Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg, "there were two dozen seats in which Republicans got 51 percent or less....There is a very big difference between defending these seats as incumbents or still trying to pick these up while they are being protected by Republicans."

James Carville, who along with Greenberg co-founded Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group, told a Monitor breakfast on Wednesday, "We beat the hell out of them at the committees, at the congressional [campaign] committees. The DNC [Democratic National Committee] left the money on the table."

Carville said DNC Chairman Howard Dean should be dumped. Carville added that Dean "should be held accountable" and described his leadership as "Rumsfeldian in its competence."

Chairman Dean has been investing in a strategy of rebuilding the party in all 50 states and hiring local operatives to help with that task. DNC member Don Fowler sent fellow DNC members a message on Tuesday saying that talk of replacing Dean was "nonsense. The 50-state strategy is exactly what the Democratic Party needed and continues to need. Why do the Washington people think that they have a special prerogative to dictate what the Democratic Party needs?"

While saying he has no problem with the 50-state strategy, Carville quipped that, "the point of a political party is not to hire people, it is to elect people."

Beyond the question of party leadership, both Republicans and Democrats face dangers as they turn their attention to the 2008 presidential election. "The big Republican problem going into '08 is Bush. I mean, he is just unpopular," Carville said. "Unless he has a really good two years, which maybe he does, he is in danger of being a complete albatross on the Republican Party."

"The biggest danger for Democrats is that we do what we kind of do sometimes [and] fracture ...if it looks like we are kind of fighting and incapable and don't get anything done, that is our biggest danger," Carville said.

Flush Of Victory Past, Democrats Revert To Finger-Pointing (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — One would think that after their biggest electoral triumph in about a decade, Democrats would finally break their usual postelection syndrome — a November loss followed by recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting.

Well, think again.

The Democrats are celebrating their big victory of Nov. 7 with recriminations, finger-pointing and infighting, no matter that they won control of the Senate and the House for the first time since 1994.

State Democratic leaders are saying Howard Dean, the party chairman, is not receiving the credit he deserves for the triumph.

Offering a rather different view, two leading party strategists rebuked Mr. Dean on Wednesday, saying the Democrats could have captured 40 House seats rather than 29 had Mr. Dean bowed to demands by Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, leader of the effort to recapture the House, to put more money into Congressional races.

“I would describe his leadership as Rumsfeldian in its incompetence,” one strategist, James Carville, said of Mr. Dean.

Liberal bloggers say they are not receiving the credit they deserve and are chafing at how what they call the mainstream media has showered too much credit on Mr. Emanuel and his Senate counterpart, Charles E. Schumer of New York, for the sweep.

“Rahm won everything” was the headline on a sarcastic post on MyDD, a liberal Web site.

On Capitol Hill, soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California has waded into a leadership fight that has divided her caucus, providing the public — in its first glimpse of the incoming Congress — with a reminder of just how much Democrats like to rumble. Democrats, if grimacing, sought to put the best face on the latest episode of that familiar Washington series, Democrats in Disarray.

“We are a diverse party,” said Donald Fowler, a veteran South Carolina Democratic leader. “We have different people from different backgrounds, and we see things differently both in terms of style and issues.”

Mr. Fowler sighed before letting out: “We’re nuts! We’re all nuts!”

DOJ_NMG_0095143

Larry Gates, the Democratic chairman in Kansas, where Democrats stunned Republicans by capturing a once very-red seat, said: "This is what we Democrats do. A little bit of success, and we start to fight."

So it was that Stan Greenberg, the Democratic pollster, and Mr. Carville used the forum of a Monitor Breakfast, a gathering of newsmakers and reporters, to say Mr. Dean wasted an opportunity to make historic gains by refusing to take resources out of his effort to build up parties in all 50 states and put them into Congressional races.

Mr. Greenberg said that Republicans held 14 seats by a single percentage point and that a small investment by Mr. Dean could have put Democrats into a commanding position for the rest of the decade.

"There was a missed opportunity here," he said. "I've sat down with Republican pollsters to discuss this race: They believe we left 10 to 20 seats on the table."

Mr. Carville, whose close ties to former President Bill Clinton and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York have prompted speculation that he is attacking Mr. Dean on their behalf, said the Democratic National Committee had taken out a $10 million line of credit and used barely half of it.

"They left money on the table," he said.

Asked whether Mr. Dean should step down, he responded, loudly, in the affirmative. "He should be held accountable," Mr. Carville said.

In an interview later, he asked, "Do we want to go into '08 with a C minus general at the D.N.C.?"

Aides to Mr. and Mrs. Clinton said Mr. Carville had not cleared his attacks on Mr. Dean with them.

The attacks set off recriminations in Mr. Dean's base, state parties that have benefited from his decision to channel millions of dollars to them.

"Asking Dean to step down now, after last week, is equivalent to asking Eisenhower to resign after the Normandy invasion," Mr. Fowler said. "It's just nonsense.

"Carville and Greenberg — those people are my friends — they are just dead wrong. They wanted all that money to go to Washington consultants and speechwriters and pollsters. This kind of nonsense is destructive of the party."

The Democratic chairman in Michigan, Mark Brewer, said party money had allowed Michigan to re-elect its Democratic governor and senator.

"This is a zero-sum game," Mr. Brewer said. "That money would have had to come from somewhere. We should be looking forward to future endeavors, and not attacking at this moment of great triumph."

Mr. Dean was traveling and not available for comment, aides said.

At Democratic National Committee headquarters, the communications director, Karen Finney, insisted that Mr. Dean had spent money on House races through the final hours, notwithstanding his announcement in the campaign that his top priority was rebuilding state parties, even in longtime Republican states.

Ms. Finney expressed incredulity that Democrats would be going after Democrats in this of all weeks.

"Did he not see that we won?" she said of Mr. Carville. "Did he not read the results? If James and Stan are interested in knowing what the D.N.C. is doing and has done, they can pick up the telephone and give me a call."

Mr. Emanuel warred with Mr. Dean over his refusal to provide as much money as Mr. Emanuel said he needed.

He said Wednesday that a favored candidate, Tammy Duckworth, the severely injured Iraq war veteran running for an open Republican seat in Illinois, had lost because the Republicans had spent $1 million on negative advertisements against her in the final weekend and that he did not have the money to respond.

Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg have been close to Mr. Emanuel since they worked in the Clinton White House in 1992. Asked about the criticism of the two, Mr. Emanuel said he would offer precisely these two sentences: "More resources brings more seats into play. Full stop."

There was also some lesser blame passing. Mr. Emanuel suggested that Democrats had fallen just short of picking up the seat held by Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, because Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, a registered Democrat, had sought re-election on an independent line after losing the Democratic primary. That brought out more Republican votes.

DOJ_NMG_0095144

Mr. Greenberg fumbled when asked in a two-part question whether he agreed with some Democrats that a botched joke by Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and the White House attack on it might have made the difference in very close races where Democrats lost, like the effort to defeat Representative Heather A. Wilson in New Mexico.

"Bah-bah-bah-bah, let me go to the first question," Mr. Greenberg said haltingly before returning, with prompting, to the original question, allowing that the Kerry episode might have "moved the needle a little bit."

Carville Says Dems Should Dump Dean Over "Rumsfeldian" Incompetence (AAS)

By Scott Shepard

Austin American Statesman, November 16, 2006

Democratic strategist James Carville says his party should dump Howard Dean as chairman of the Democratic Party because of incompetence.

Carville, during coffee and rolls with political reporters today, said Democrats could have picked up as many as 50 House seats, instead of the nearly 30 they have so far.

The reason they didn't, he said, is the Democratic National Committee did not spend some $6 million it could have put into so-called "third tier" House races against vulnerable Republicans.

Carville said the other Democratic campaign committees had borrowed to the hilt.

He said he tried to meet with Dean to argue for additional spending for Democrats in the final days of the campaign, but Dean declined and gave no reason why.

Asked by a reporter whether Dean should be dumped, Carville replied, "In a word, do I think? Yes."

He added, "I think he should be held accountable." He added, "I would describe his leadership as Rumsfeldian in its competence."

Carville likened the Democratic takeover of Congress to the civil war battle at Gettysburg, which the Union army won but failed to pursue the Confederate army when it retreated.

"We should have chased them down," Carville said. There was no immediate response from Dean or the DNC.

GOP's Simmons Concedes Conn. House Race (AP-Y)

By Susan Haigh, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

More than a week after Election Day, Republican U.S. Rep. Rob Simmons conceded to Democrat Joe Courtney on Wednesday, but did not rule out running again in two years.

Simmons spoke to supporters — some tearful — who packed his headquarters Wednesday afternoon, a few hours after Secretary of the State Susan Bysiewicz confirmed that Courtney had won by 91 of nearly 250,000 votes cast.

"Unfortunately, the tide was against us," said Simmons, who sought a fourth term in what had been the nation's most heavily Democratic-leaning district represented by a Republican.

On Election Day, Courtney, who lost to Simmons in 2002, led by 167 votes. But recounts in the district's 65 towns uncovered some flaws, including a 100-vote mistake in the small town of Lebanon that lowered the margin to 66 votes at one point.

Courtney, speaking at a press conference in Washington, D.C., thanked Simmons for what he called a "gracious statement by a very tough opponent" and said he looks forward to getting started.

"I'm going to fly home without a plane, I'm so excited," he said.

The deadline to file any legal challenges is Nov. 21, but Simmons said he does not want a repeat of the unease he sensed in the district in 1994, the last time there was a recount in the 2nd District. Then-Democratic Rep. Sam Gejdenson defeated Republican Ed Munster by 21 votes in a race that dragged on for five months. Simmons first won the seat in 2000 by ousting Gejdenson.

State Republican Party Chairman George Gallo said Simmons made the right choice by not contesting the election. But he said the party was considering filing a complaint after receiving tips that a handful of college students may have voted twice. Even if proven, it did not appear the complaint would significantly change the results.

DOJ_NMG_0095145

Both Courtney and Murphy are in Washington, D.C., this week for orientation. Courtney learned of the final recount results from speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi on Tuesday night.

The recount was automatically triggered because Courtney's unofficial victory margin was less than half of 1 percent of the votes cast.

Simmons Concedes Defeat To Courtney In Connecticut 2 (CQ)

By Marie Horrigan

Congressional Quarterly, November 16, 2006

Three-term Republican Rep. Rob Simmons officially conceded the race for Connecticut's 2nd District Wednesday afternoon, just hours after state officials announced Democrat Joe Courtney had clinched a razor-thin victory in a recanvass of the district's vote.

"I'm disappointed by the outcome, but not by the effort," Simmons told supporters in his Mystic, Conn., campaign headquarters Wednesday afternoon after conceding the race, the Norwich Bulletin reported.

Courtney's victory ensures him a place in the large and historic Democratic freshman Class of 2006 — and almost certainly a place near the top of the Republican Party's initial target list for the 2008 battle to control the House. Courtney won by just a 90-vote margin, with 121,247 votes to 121,157 votes for Simmons, according to the Connecticut Secretary of State's office on Wednesday.

The Courtney-Simmons contest was the closest of many tight races in a midterm election cycle that boosted Democrats to control of both chambers of Congress. Many of the Democratic takeovers came in districts held by moderate Republicans such as Simmons; a similarly positioned Connecticut Republican, 12-term incumbent Nancy L. Johnson, was unseated in the 5th District by Democratic state Sen. Chris Murphy.

Courtney had declared victory on Election Night, when returns indicated he led Simmons by 167 votes. He has been in Washington this week, attending freshman orientation.

The narrow victory margin, less than one-half of one percent of the vote, triggered an automatic recount that began Nov. 8 and wrapped up Tuesday night.

This was the second face-off between Simmons and Courtney. Simmons won his second term in 2002 with an 8 percentage-point edge, 54 percent to 46 percent, over Courtney.

Voter turnout was higher this year than four years ago: 242,000 people cast a ballot in the 2006 rematch, versus 217,000 in the candidates' first showdown.

One difference this election cycle was the the difficult national political atmosphere for Republicans, with voters expressing disapproval of congressional scandals, the war in Iraq and President Bush.

Democrats, including Courtney, argued that while their Republican opponents — particularly centrists like Simmons — might not be directly responsible for ethical scandals and troubles in Iraq, their re-elections would effectively endorse Bush's conduct and empower Republicans to continue to pursue their agenda.

In a statement Tuesday night, Courtney announced the recanvass had confirmed his victory and said he would focus on demanding accountability from the White House on the Iraq war, as well as improving the prescription drug benefit program provided to seniors through Medicare.

Connecticut's 2nd District also hosted an extremely tight race during the last election that saw both chambers of Congress change hands — the 1994 Republican landslide. That year, however, the incumbent prevailed: Democrat Sam Gejdenson defeated his Republican opponent by 21 votes.

2 Incumbent Dems Keep House Seats In Ga. (AP-Y)

By Shannon Mccaffrey, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Reps. John Barrow and Jim Marshall were certified the winners of their respective races Wednesday, all but ending GOP hopes of knocking off at least one Democratic incumbent in the Nov. 7 congressional races.

DOJ_NMG_0095146

Barrow defeated Republican Max Burns in eastern Georgia's 12th District by just 864 votes out of 142,438 cast, according to the final tallies released by Secretary of State Cathy Cox. In middle Georgia's 8th District, Marshall defeated Republican Mac Collins by 1,752 votes out of 159,568 cast.

Both GOP challengers are former congressmen who had been considered among Republicans' best chances to counter what became a Democratic landslide last week.

Neither had conceded defeat as of Wednesday afternoon, but only Burns could demand a recount because he lost by less than 1 percent of the vote. He has two business days to do so, under state law.

"As of right this second, we do not know if we're going to ask for a recount or not," Burns' campaign manager, Tim Baker, said Wednesday.

Barrow and Marshall had previously claimed victory, and political experts said that in the age of electronic voting, it would be unlikely for a recount to alter the result.

Two Democrats Win In Georgia (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

ATLANTA, Nov. 15 — Georgia officials certified the votes on Wednesday in two extremely close Congressional races, putting the Democratic incumbents, Jim Marshall of Macon and John Barrow of Savannah, officially in the winners' column.

Neither of the Republican challengers had conceded, and Mr. Barrow, who won by 864 votes, could face a recount if his opponent, Max Burns, requests one. Georgia law allows a recount if the margin of victory is less than 1 percent of the votes cast.

Mr. Marshall won his race against his Republican challenger, Mac Collins, by more than 1 percent, 1,752 votes. "I know who each and every one of them are, and I've sent them all cards," said his spokesman, Doug Moore.

The incumbents, the only white Democrats in the Georgia delegation, faced an uphill battle because their districts had been redrawn to include more Republicans and their challengers were former congressmen. Democratic turnout in the state was low, and President Bush campaigned twice in each district for the challengers.

Tim Baker, Mr. Burns's campaign manager, said the campaign would announce on Thursday whether a recount would be requested.

Grading The Pollsters (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Political polling has come a long way since "Dewey Defeats Truman."

Pollsters earned high marks in last week's elections: Surveys correctly predicted that the Democrats would win control of the House of Representatives, that the Senate would be closely contested and that Democratic gubernatorial candidates would sweep into statehouses.

That doesn't mean that some pollsters didn't do better than others, however, and firms haven't hesitated to trumpet their results. "Rasmussen Reports is the winner in polling accuracy!" read a news release from the Asbury Park, N.J., polling firm. The headline from a Zogby International release1 said the Utica, N.Y., pollster batted "10 for 10" in its telephone polls of competitive Senate races, and asserted the results from its online polls showed its "interactive polling model shines."

I crunched the results from pollsters on dozens of races, and found that some did indeed appear to be more accurate than others. I'll share my results later in the column, but before I do, I want to explain why I'm more reluctant to crown a winner than some of the polling firms were in their PR. The science of evaluating polls remains very much a work in progress.

"A small cottage industry has looked at these issues, but not a large number of people have bothered with it," said Charles Franklin, a professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin who blogs about polls at Political Arithmetik2.

Until recently, measuring poll accuracy was time consuming, and analyses often followed long after the election. Jay H. Leve, founder and chief executive of Verona, N.J.-based SurveyUSA -- one of the companies I evaluated -- said it took seven employees of his firm a full month to analyze the 2004 polls.

But two months ago, the Web site Pollster.com5 launched, compiling public reports from several polling firms. Some individual firms have also been quicker to post their own results on their Web sites.

While data are now easier to obtain, there remains disagreement about how to calculate accuracy. Is picking the winner enough? Most experts agree it isn't, and focus instead on measuring how close the predictions were to the actual spread -- the difference in percentage points between the two candidates. But what if a poll accurately predicts an election will be decided within a one-percentage-point margin, but incorrectly identified the victor?

Today's preferred methods haven't changed much since political polling's nadir, in 1948, when erroneous pre-election surveys were relied on by the credulous press to predict a victory for Republican Thomas Dewey over Harry Truman. In one of its editions printed on election night, the Chicago Daily Tribune ran the infamous headline, "Dewey Defeats Truman."6

To assess what went wrong and to regain credibility, the nonprofit Social Science Research Council7 outlined ways to measure poll accuracy. Among eight methods the researchers considered, they chose to measure the difference between the predicted percentage vote for the leading candidate, and the actual share for that candidate. However, this method doesn't spot big errors in predicted victory margins, and can be skewed by independent candidates. As it happens, in 1948, Strom Thurmond and Henry Wallace influenced both the polls and President Truman's victory.

More recently, a study8 of 2002 polls by Prof. Franklin showed that the holder of a five-point lead in a poll won only 60% to 65% of the time, and polls showing the leader ahead by 10 points or more were dead wrong 10% of the time.

Pollsters expected a rout by incumbent Bill Clinton in the 1996 presidential election, but he beat Republican Bob Dole by just 8.5 percentage points in the popular vote. Political scientist Everett Carll Ladd Jr. criticized the polls in the press, calling them worse than the 1948 fiasco, and prompting veteran pollster Warren Mitofsky to analyze the results.

Mr. Mitofsky found that "no standard metric for gauging poll accuracy had been adopted by the polling community." So he went back to the SSRC's work after the 1948 election, and found another method he preferred: comparing the predicted victory margin to the actual margin, or the error on the margin. If a poll finds Candidate A ahead by three points and he wins by 10 points, that's an error on the margin of seven points. If Candidate B wins by five points, that's an error of eight points. There's no penalty for picking the wrong winner; pollsters are graded only on their error margin. (Mr. Mitofsky, a pioneer of exit polling and a helpful source for my Numbers Guy columns, died Sept. 1 at age 71. He was remembered online by several9 polling10 organizations11.)

I opted to use Mr. Mitofsky's method in my own number crunching. I looked at five pollsters that were among the most prolific: Rasmussen, SurveyUSA, Zogby (which releases separate telephone and online polls) and Washington, D.C.-based Mason-Dixon. For all but the latter, I used the numbers posted on the organizations' own Web sites. For Mason-Dixon, which keeps some of its poll data behind a subscriber wall, I used Pollster.com to find polls from the two weeks before the election. I checked the results against vote counts as of this Tuesday.

(I chose the firms because they were active in many statewide elections. More familiar names such as Gallup and CBS News/New York Times polled in fewer races, focusing more on national attitudes such as approval ratings for Congress.)

There were some interesting trends: Phone polls tended to be better than online surveys, and companies that used recorded voices rather than live humans in their surveys were standouts. Nearly everyone had some big misses, though, such as predicting that races would be too close to call when in fact they were won by healthy margins. Also, I found that being loyal to a particular polling outfit may not be wise. Taking an average of the five most recent polls for a given state, regardless of the author -- a measure compiled by Pollster.com -- yielded a higher accuracy rate than most individual pollsters.

On to the results: In the Senate races, the average error on the margin of victory was tightly bunched for all the phone polls. Rasmussen (25 races) and Mason-Dixon (15) each were off by an average of fewer than four points on the margin. Zogby's phone polls (10) and SurveyUSA (18) each missed by slightly more than four points. Just four of the 68 phone polls missed by 10 points or more, with the widest miss at 18 points.

But the performance of Zogby Interactive, the unit that conducts surveys online, demonstrates the dubious value of judging polls only by whether they pick winners correctly. As Zogby noted in a press release, its online polls identified 18 of 19 Senate winners correctly. But its predictions missed by an average of 8.6 percentage points in those polls -- at least twice the average miss of four other polling operations I examined. Zogby predicted a nine-point win for Democrat Herb Kohl in Wisconsin; he won by 37 points. Democrat Maria Cantwell was expected to win by four points in Washington; she won by 17. (Zogby cooperated with WSJ.com on an online polling project that tracked some Senate and gubernatorial races.)

DOJ_NMG_0095148

The picture was similar in the gubernatorial races (where Zogby polled only online, not by phone). Mason-Dixon's average error was under 3.4 points in 14 races. Rasmussen missed by an average of 3.8 points in 30 races; SurveyUSA was off by 4.4 points, on average, in 18 races. But Zogby's online poll missed by an average of 8.3 points, erring on six races by more than 15 points.

Zogby's online polls "just blew it" in Colorado and Arkansas governor races, Chief Executive John Zogby told me. (See Zogby's scorecard.12) In other races, such as the two Senate races I mentioned, "we had the right direction but a closer race than the final." One explanation, he said, may be that Zogby's final online polls collected responses one to two weeks before the election, whereas other polling firms were active until the final week. "We have more work to do" to improve online polling, Mr. Zogby said, but he added, "we believe it's not only the wave of the future, but the future is very close to now."

"I don't think there's anyone out there who did better than us," Rasmussen Reports President Scott Rasmussen told me. (Read its own scorecard for its Senate13 and gubernatorial14 polls.)

Larry Harris, a principal with Mason-Dixon, said of his firm's numbers: "We had another good year."

Meanwhile, SurveyUSA has posted a detailed scorecard15 on its Web site, listing how its results compared with those of competitors in different states. "We won't be satisfied until we have an error of zero across our entire body of work," Mr. Leve said. "We're obviously proud of what we did. But I don't think any pollster whose error is greater than zero should be bragging, and we're not."

Remember, my analysis didn't penalize pollsters for picking the wrong winner, which happened nine times, though that's something that other evaluators might take into account. I ignored it partly because some races were decided by a few points or less -- a gap smaller than the statistical margin of error on these polls. For example, Rasmussen's final poll in the Minnesota governor's election showed Democrat Mike Hatch leading Republican incumbent Tim Pawlenty by two points. Mr. Pawlenty won by one point. Rasmussen also missed the Missouri Senate race by a small margin, with the loser, Republican Jim Talent, leading by one point in its final poll. * * *

Thanks to everyone who posted to the most recent forum16 about my column17 on lotteries and sweepstakes. I'll be reading, and responding to, your comments about polls in a new forum18 this week. And please remember to use your full name with posts. (If you have a comment or suggestion unrelated to this week's column, please email me directly at numbersguy@wsj.com19.)

Putting Faith Before Politics (NYT)

By David Kuo

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

SINCE 1992, every national Republican electoral defeat has been accompanied by an obituary for the religious right. Every one of these obituaries has been premature — after these losses, the religious right only grew stronger. After the defeat of President George H. W. Bush in 1992, the conventional wisdom held that Christian evangelicals would be chastened. As one major magazine put it, Mr. Bush's defeat meant that "time had run out on their crusade to create a Christian America." Yet in the next two years, the Christian Coalition grew by leaps and bounds; in 1994, it helped usher in the Gingrich revolution.

In 1996, after Bill Clinton defeated Bob Dole, Margaret Tutwiler, a Republican strategist, declared that in order for Republicans to win, "We're going to have to take on the religious nuts." Two years later, after Republicans failed to gain any ground on Democrats — despite Mr. Clinton's impeachment — John Zogby, the pollster, concluded that "Christian absolutism" scared voters. Wrong again. Those same Christian "absolutists" helped sweep George W. Bush into office in 2000.

Jesus was resurrected only once. The religious right has been resurrected at least twice in just the past 15 years.

The conventional wisdom about the Democratic thumping of Republicans last week says something a little different about the religious right — that its members are beginning to migrate to the Democratic Party. The statistic that is exciting Democrats the most is that nearly 30 percent of white evangelicals, the true Republican base, voted Democratic. In addition, the red-blue split of weekly churchgoers has narrowed. Commentators are atwitter about the shrinking "God gap."

Once again, the conventional wisdom is wrong. Yes, it is true that almost 30 percent of white evangelicals voted for the Democrats, up from the 22 percent Senator John Kerry received in the 2004 presidential race. But that 2004 number was aberrantly low. More typical were exit polls from the 1996 Congressional election, where 25 percent of white evangelicals voted for Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0095149

So before rearranging their public policy agenda in hopes of attracting evangelicals, the Democrats would be wise to think twice. There has been a radical change in the attitudes of evangelicals — it's just not one that will automatically be in the Democrats' favor.

You see, evangelicals aren't re-examining their political priorities nearly as much as they are re-examining their spiritual priorities. That could be bad news for both political parties.

John W. Whitehead of the Rutherford Institute, the conservative Christian organization that gained notoriety during the 1990s when it represented Paula Jones in her sexual harassment suit against Bill Clinton, wrote this after the elections: "Modern Christianity, having lost sight of Christ's teachings, has been co-opted by legalism, materialism and politics. Simply put, it has lost its spirituality."

He went on, "Whereas Christianity was once synonymous with charity, compassion and love for one's neighbor, today it is more often equated with partisan politics, anti-homosexual rhetoric and affluent mega-churches."

Mr. Whitehead is hardly alone. Just before the elections, Gordon MacDonald, an evangelical leader, wrote that he was concerned that some evangelical personalities had been seduced and used by the White House. He worried that the movement might "fragment because it is more identified by a political agenda that seems to be failing and less identified by a commitment to Jesus and his kingdom."

Certainly, the White House showed the heartlessness of politics in Ted Haggard's fall. Mr. Haggard had once been welcomed at the White House, relied on to rally other evangelicals and invited to pray with the president.

Yet his downfall provoked only this reaction from a low-level White House spokesman: "He had been on a couple of calls, but was not a weekly participant in those calls. I believe he's been to the White House one or two times." To evangelicals who know that this statement was misleading, and know from the Bible what being kicked to the curb looks like, it was a revealing moment about the unchristian behavior politics inspires.

Perhaps that's why a rift appears to be growing in what was once a strong alliance. Beliefnet.com's post-election online survey of more than 2,000 people revealed that nearly 40 percent of evangelicals support the idea of a two-year Christian "fast" from intense political activism. Instead of directing their energies toward campaigns, evangelicals would spend their time helping the poor.

Why might such an idea get traction among evangelicals? For practical reasons as well as spiritual ones. Evangelicals are beginning to see the effect of their political involvement on those with whom they hope to share Jesus' eternal message: non-evangelicals. Tellingly, Beliefnet's poll showed that nearly 60 percent of non-evangelicals have a more negative view of Jesus because of Christian political involvement; almost 40 percent believe that George W. Bush's faith has had a negative impact on his presidency.

There is also the matter of the record, which I saw being shaped during my time in the White House. Conservative Christians (like me) were promised that having an evangelical like Mr. Bush in office was a dream come true. Well, it wasn't. Not by a long shot. The administration accomplished little that evangelicals really cared about.

Nowhere was this clearer than on the issue of abortion. Despite strong Republican majorities, and his own pro-life stands, Mr. Bush settled for the largely symbolic partial-birth abortion restriction rather than pursuing more substantial change. Then there were the forgotten commitments to give faith-based charities the resources they needed to care for the poor. Evangelicals are not likely to fall for such promises in the future.

Don't expect conservative Christians in politics to start to disappear, of course. There are those who find the moral force of issues like abortion and gay marriage equal to that of the abolition of slavery — worth pursuing no matter what the risks of politics are for the soul. But the advocates working these special interests may, I think, be far fewer in coming years than in years past. Gay marriage was a less mobilizing force in 2006 than it was in 2004. In Arizona the ballot measure to outlaw it was defeated. The South Dakota abortion ban failed.

We will have to wait until 2008 to see just how deep this evangelical spiritual re-examination goes, and how seductive politics will continue to be to committed Christians. Meanwhile, evangelicals aren't flocking to the Democratic Party. If anything, they are becoming more truly conservative in their recognition of the negative spiritual consequences of political obsession and of the limitations of government power.

DOJ_NMG_0095150

C. S. Lewis once warned that any Christian who uses his faith as a means to a political end would corrupt both his faith and the faith writ large. A lot of Christians are reading C. S. Lewis these days.

Alabama Lazarus Act (WSJ)

By Quin Hillyer

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. -- In Birmingham they love the governor. And in Mobile and Huntsville, too.

As Republicans coast to coast were burying their many political dead, a Republican governor once given up for dead was enjoying a landslide victory. Alabama Gov. Bob Riley was re-elected last week, beating long-popular Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley with more than 58% of the vote, including an impressive 20% of the black vote. His victory was not simply the result of Alabama being a Republican state: Democrats won the two next most prominent statewide races, those for lieutenant governor and Supreme Court chief justice. In Alabama as elsewhere, this was a Democratic year -- with the notable exception of Mr. Riley, a conservative reformer in cowboy boots, with a cheerful, Reagan-like demeanor.

Three years ago, few observers believed that he could ever win again. A businessman who began his post-college career by selling eggs door-to-door (literally), later to sell his hens and build a business of car dealerships and a trucking company, Mr. Riley was a relatively obscure three-term congressman when he ran for governor in 2002. In that race, he barely squeaked past scandal-plagued Democratic incumbent Don Siegelman by a lawsuit-challenged 3,120 votes.

During his first year in office, Mr. Riley pushed an ambitious, complicated tax-reform proposal that was part of a multiyear plan to shift revenues to under-funded departments such as law enforcement while relieving the tax burden on low-income workers. Derided (a bit misleadingly) by opponents as a huge tax increase -- although far more people would have enjoyed a tax cut than endured a tax hike under the proposal -- the initiative was destroyed in a statewide referendum, receiving only 32.5% of the vote. Pundits immediately pronounced the governor a total goner.

How, then, did Mr. Riley recover from such political disaster to win re-election so resoundingly? Not just Mr. Riley but editorial writers across the state will readily identify his successes in the "Three Es": economic development, education and, not least, ethics. Consider the statistics: An unemployment rate that dropped to an astonishingly low (especially for Alabama) 3.3% from 5.3%; school test scores rising, especially in reading proficiency in at-risk schools blessed with the Riley-backed (and nationally copied) Alabama Reading Initiative; and public standards of ethics combined with radically open government records, along with measurable performance standards imposed on every department of state government.

These accomplishments stand in marked contrast to the record of Mr. Siegelman, who presided over a budget crisis and now stands convicted of bribery and other infractions.

In his Birmingham hotel suite an hour before the polls closed Nov. 7, during a lengthy conversation sandwiched around a friendly phone call from Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Mr. Riley explained with great depth and detail -- not to mention a guileless enthusiasm -- how it was that his administration so impressed the voters.

"I think people appreciated that after [the tax reform initiative] failed, we turned around and did exactly what the people told us to do. We cut half a billion dollars out of [an already tight] budget . . . We put a new economic model together for Alabama, and it has been remarkably successful . . . We found a way to cut taxes anyway [chiefly by raising the earnings threshold below which workers pay no income tax], and we got really good grades when the hurricanes came through."

Alabama has been ravaged by three hurricanes during Mr. Riley's tenure, and the state's response each time was a model of effectiveness. Listen to Howard Shell, since 1986 the mayor of Atmore (pop. 8,000): "Ivan and Dennis both hit us hard. . . . For the city of Atmore, Gov. Riley was really responsive when we really needed it. Just one phone call to him, and he began to make things happen. He got us extra law enforcement right away, he got forestry experts, he got all the state agencies to help in every way. . . . He's one of the most proactive governors we have had, the best we've had since I've been here."

Mr. Riley's particular genius, meanwhile, has been evident in his efforts at business development. He consolidated nine different state agencies charged with economic development into just one, hired top-notch administrators and used federal grants more wisely by paying attention to small details such as re-routing small roads, building water tanks and improving the state's job-training agencies so that they provide what he calls "job-specific, product-specific, even company-specific training."

DOJ_NMG_0095151

For four years running, Southern Business and Development Magazine has named Alabama its "state of the year." Site Selection magazine ranked the Alabama Development Office as the top such agency in the nation. And even in the state's rural, long-impoverished "Black Belt" (so named for the color of its loamy soil), unemployment has dropped to 7.7% from many years in the double digits, largely due to initiatives by the Riley-created Black Belt Action Commission.

Elsewhere, Mayor Harold Crouch of Chatom (pop. 1,204), a self-described political ticket-splitter, tells of how Mr. Riley has made the state capitol "acceptable to rural Alabama again." Just by helping with infrastructure such as water service and a little paving and earth-moving, Mr. Riley's team made it possible for Chatom to land a plant of A.C. Manufacturing, a garment company, with 152 jobs. "It would not have occurred if the governor had not personally stepped in to help," Mr. Crouch said.

Thus did Mr. Riley run for re-election as a genial, tax-cutting, budget-cutting, crisis-handling, job-creating, education-boosting, utterly scandal-free reformer. Every major newspaper in the state -- conservative, moderate and liberal alike -- endorsed him for another term. Interesting how that works.

In his victory speech on election night, Bob Riley put himself on the line by urging the people of the state to "demand a higher level of excellence from state government than you have ever demanded before." Judging from the election results, Alabamians think that type of excellence already is housed in their governor's mansion.

McCain Committee Lays Groundwork For '08 Bid (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Arizona Sen. John McCain, a leading White House prospect, today is forming a presidential exploratory committee in order to start amassing money for the 2008 Republican nomination contest.

The committee, to be registered with the Federal Election Commission, will allow McCain to promote a potential candidacy before he officially enters the race. He says he'll make a final decision with his family over the Christmas holidays.

McCain, 70, was a prisoner of war in Vietnam. He showed appeal to moderates and independents in his bid for the 2000 GOP nomination against George W. Bush.

Since then, McCain has made overtures to conservatives and built a national network of activists and fundraisers. He appeared at 346 events and raised $10.5 million for GOP candidates this year.

McCain's new committee will file quarterly reports to the FEC. It already has a website — www.exploremccain.com — that will do a live webcast of a major speech McCain is giving today to GOPAC, a group that fosters Republican candidates at the state and local level.

“We are not under the radar,” said Rick Davis, director of the committee. “We wanted to get people paying attention to the speech.”

Asked to choose a presidential nominee in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll in the past week, 26% of Republicans and independents who lean toward the GOP picked McCain. Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, who formed an exploratory committee last week, was first at 28%.

Another Republican, former Wisconsin governor Tommy Thompson, said he will create an exploratory committee after Jan. 1, the Associated Press reported Wednesday. Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, a Democrat, has done so already.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton leads potential Democratic nominees in polls. Among Democrats and independents who lean toward the Democrats surveyed, 31% supported Clinton.

If Clinton runs, she would start with millions of dollars left from her Senate race this year. McCain could put about $1 million toward a bid.

Primaries begin in January 2008, so candidates must raise most of their money in 2007. They can get federal help if they limit primary-season spending, but major candidates ignored the limits in 2004. Bush raised about $270 million before he was nominated; Democrat John Kerry raised $235 million.

McCain Takes Step Toward White House Bid (AP-Y)

DOJ_NMG_0095152

AP, November 16, 2006

Republican Sen. John McCain will file paperwork with the Federal Election Commission on Thursday to create a presidential exploratory committee, his aides said Wednesday.

The Arizona senator also launched a Web site — http://www.exploremccain.com — that allows supporters to donate and join his effort. His speech before the conservative group GOPAC on Thursday will be broadcast on the site.

The move was expected — the senator discussed it Sunday on national television. McCain insists he won't make a final decision about running for president until after the Christmas holidays.

McCain, a former Navy pilot who was a prisoner of war in Vietnam, ran for president against George W. Bush in 2000 and lost in a bitter two-way race.

If McCain were to run again, he would turn 72 on Aug. 29, 2008, at the height of the campaign. Only President Reagan was older — 73 at the start of his second term.

McCain Moves Toward '08 Presidential Run (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Striding through the wreckage of the midterm election, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) will take a major step today toward a 2008 presidential bid by announcing he has established a committee to formally explore a campaign and making two major speeches laying out his vision for the future of the GOP.

McCain has been considered the front-runner for the Republican nomination in a field that changed rapidly after the tumultuous midterms.

In response to the party's big losses, McCain has been moving to make a fresh appeal to the surly voters who helped end GOP control of the House and the Senate — Republicans and independents angry about government corruption and excessive spending.

That anger contributed to Democratic gains in 2006, but it may open a political opportunity for McCain in 2008 by highlighting concerns about lax ethics and pork-barrel spending — his signature issues.

"For years he's been on a one-man crusade against wasteful spending in Washington," says a biography of McCain on http://www.exploremccain.com , the website launched Wednesday by his exploratory committee. "Because of his crackdown on waste in government, he's been nicknamed 'The Sheriff.' "

But the midterms underscore a growing risk for McCain on another front: Polls show that a majority of voters disapprove of the war in Iraq and want at least some troops withdrawn, and McCain is almost alone in calling for a larger deployment. He reinforced that position Wednesday when, at a Senate hearing, he upbraided military leaders for not calling for more troops.

"I'm of course disappointed that basically you're advocating the status quo here today, which I think the American people in the last election said … is not an acceptable condition," he said.

Other potential White House contenders are jockeying for position as well. On Wednesday, former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy G. Thompson, secretary of Health and Human Services in President Bush's first term, said he intended to form a presidential exploratory committee.

Earlier this week, former New York Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani also took a step in that direction. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is courting evangelical Republicans. Rep. Duncan Hunter (R-El Cajon) has announced a longshot White House bid.

But allies of McCain, whose maverick streak is thought to have cross-party appeal, say he is in the best position to thrive in the aftermath of election results that illustrated the GOP's weakness among independents.

"John is probably emboldened to run for president because our party is adrift in areas where I think he has a lot to offer," said Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), a McCain ally.

McCain has said he will make no decision about running until he and his family discuss it over the Christmas holiday. But rarely does a person set up an exploratory committee and decide not to run. Having such a committee allows potential candidates to raise money and begin establishing a political organization while they are testing the waters for a formal run.

DOJ_NMG_0095153

McCain's speech today to GOPAC, a conservative political group, is intended as his first broad assessment of the state of the GOP and how he would lead it. A source familiar with the speech said McCain aspired to fill the post-midterm political vacuum in the same way Ronald Reagan did in a fabled speech after the GOP lost the White House in 1976.

McCain has been arguing that Republicans lost ground this year because the party strayed from its conservative principles of fiscal restraint and political reform with a spate of scandals, the creation of expensive programs like the Medicare drug benefit and the proliferation of pork-barrel spending.

"We Republicans have lost our way," McCain has said. "We came to Washington to change government, and government changed us."

McCain also will speak today to the Federalist Society, an organization of conservative lawyers that has been at the heart of bitter Senate debates over confirmation of Bush's judicial nominees. That faction of the party was furious with McCain and others in a bipartisan group of senators, nicknamed the Gang of 14, who last year blocked a bid by GOP leaders to deny Democrats the right to filibuster judicial nominations.

Conservative lawyers aren't the only ones in the GOP base who view McCain with suspicion. He alienated social conservatives with a 2000 speech harshly critical of the influence of evangelical leaders in the GOP. His support for giving illegal immigrants a path to citizenship, his concern about global warming and his opposition to Bush's tax cuts have earned him ire from many on the right.

On the war, McCain risks alienating another constituency — the majority of Americans who said in exit polls that they wanted U.S. troop strength in Iraq reduced. McCain has been one of Bush's most stalwart supporters of the mission in Iraq, although he has been critical of the way the administration has prosecuted the war.

He has argued that ending instability in Iraq requires a larger U.S. military presence. His advisors contend that whatever political risk McCain runs by taking that position, he would take a bigger risk of looking like a political opportunist if he reversed field and called for withdrawal.

"It's classic McCain," said Mark McKinnon, one of his advisors. "He's always willing to do the unpopular thing. Even people who disagree with him about the troops will feel, 'At least he's being straight with us.' "

But his critics say that because voters' emotions about Iraq run so deep, his views on the war will probably undercut his appeal to independents.

"Independents are concerned and angry about the war in Iraq, and John McCain has consistently said that we should stay the course," said Stacie Paxton, a spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee. "If John McCain's political strategy is to appeal to independents, his position on the Iraq war is a serious problem for him."

*

janet.hook@latimes.com

Ex-Bush Aide To Explore Presidential Run (AP-Y)

By Mike Glover, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Former Wisconsin Gov. Tommy Thompson, who served as Health and Human Services Secretary in President Bush's first term, said Wednesday he intends to form a committee to explore a possible run for the White House in 2008.

"I intend to do so after the first of the year," the Republican said in reference to establishing an exploratory committee.

Thompson made the comments in Iowa, where he met with about 100 members of a group called Iowans for Wellness and Prevention. The state holds the first votes of the presidential nominating process.

Thompson, who will turn 65 on Sunday, spent nearly four decades in politics and government, including 14 years as governor. He resigned as HHS secretary in December 2004 shortly after Bush won a second term. His tenure at HHS was marked by anthrax attacks, a flu vaccine shortage and passage of the Medicare prescription law.

"We touched the third rail of politics and delivered on our promise to modernize Medicare with prescription drug coverage," Thompson said.

DOJ_NMG_0095154

During his stop in Iowa, Thompson argued that his background as a Midwest governor and HHS secretary would appeal to voters.

"The three big issues in 2008 are going to be health, energy independence and the war in Iraq," he said.

Thompson faces a daunting task in what's expected to be a crowded field of Republican presidential candidates. Front-runner Sen. John McCain planned to file the paperwork for an exploratory committee on Thursday and former New York City mayor Rudy Giuliani recently took the first step in his bid.

Other potential candidates include Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist, Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee and New York Gov. George Pataki. California Rep. Duncan Hunter also has announced a presidential bid.

Thompson said more than 90 percent of spending on health care — roughly 16 percent of the gross national product — is for treating disease, while only about 8 percent is spent on prevention.

"To me that's just backwards," he said. "I want to try and transpose that."

Thompson had been the state's longest-serving governor when Bush named him to lead the department. He made his mark as governor by pushing for an overhaul of Wisconsin welfare laws, well before Congress and President Clinton took up the issue on the national level.

But a month after the Sept. 11 attacks, the nation faced its first case of bioterrorism in the form of anthrax attacks against government and media targets in Washington, Florida and New York.

Thompson generally escaped criticism, but lawmakers complained that the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention reacted slowly to the crisis.

In 2004, similar criticism was leveled at the Food and Drug Administration for its reaction to the loss of half the U.S. supply of flu vaccine because of contamination at a manufacturing plant in England.

The FDA also has come under fire for its handling of safety concerns about Merck & Co.'s Vioxx painkiller.

Thompson, meanwhile, was a key player in President Bush's AIDS initiative, a commitment of $15 billion over 5 years for treatment and prevention of the scourge overseas.

He traveled frequently to Africa. Thompson also used his AIDS role to trumpet his idea of medical diplomacy, investing in health care and medical facilities around the world.

Born in Elroy, Wis., Thompson prided himself on his small-town roots as he won an unprecedented four terms as Wisconsin's governor. His father was a grocer. Thompson introduced himself to voters during his first gubernatorial campaign in 1986 as a proud son of Elroy — "located between Kendall and Union Center, north of Wonewoc and south of Hustler."

During his tenure, Thompson pushed the Milwaukee School Choice program, in which religious and private schools received up to $5,000 per pupil from the state to cover tuition for low-income Milwaukee students who otherwise would attend public schools.

Thompson occasionally flirted with the idea of going to Washington. He ran for Congress in 1979 but lost in the Republican primary and considered briefly running for president in 2000 but dropped the idea, saying he didn't have the necessary financial backing or support.

Analysis: Clinton Undecided On '08 Run (AP-Y)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's professed indecision about a presidential bid seems a bit disingenuous. After all, she has millions in the bank, a national network of supporters and an unrivaled team of political strategists. Not to be trumped by other potential candidates/authors, the former first lady plans to rerelease her best-selling book, "It Takes a Village."

Fresh off her landslide Senate re-election victory, the New York lawmaker has been inundated with questions about her political future. Although polls show her the front-runner for her party's 2008 presidential nomination, Clinton insists she's just starting the process of making a final decision.

"I will look at the possibilities, but I ... haven't really had the time to talk to people about it," Clinton said in New York earlier this week — the latest non-answer to the question that's dogged her incessantly since the midterm elections.

DOJ_NMG_0095155

Clinton is under less pressure to disclose her intentions early thanks to money and her standing in several polls that put her ahead. An Associated Press-AOL News poll in late October found that, among registered Democrats, she essentially was tied with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama as the person they would most like to see elected president in 2008. The other White House hopefuls were in single digits.

Among registered black Democrats, she led Obama 29 percent to 10 percent on the same question in an AP-AOL Black Voices poll.

She has as much as $13 million remaining from her Senate run that can be used in a presidential bid, far more than lesser known candidates such as Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, who recently formed a campaign committee.

Advisers also insist it's Clinton's nature to deliberate, reaching out to activists, donors and operatives — particularly in states with key early contests such as Iowa and New Hampshire — before reaching a final decision.

As a roadmap, they point to her decision to run for the Senate in New York in 2000, when she was still first lady. Then, she spent months seeking counsel from numerous friends and advisers and went on a "listening tour" of the state.

Clinton's inner circle continues to operate in a virtual cone of silence, divulging little information and letting no stray words escape that could be seized upon or misinterpreted. Among those most knowledgeable about her plans are longtime political director, Patti Solis Doyle; communications director Howard Wolfson; strategist Ann Lewis; pollster Mark Penn, media adviser Mandy Grunwald; and former Democratic National Committee chairman Terry McAuliffe.

"The people who know what's going on aren't saying anything, and the ones who are talking don't know what's going on," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for another confidante — former President Clinton.

While Bill Clinton has been one of the biggest boosters of his wife's presumed presidential ambitions, even he has said publicly — as recently as last weekend — that he doesn't know what her final decision will be. He leaves shortly after Thanksgiving for a two-week tour of Asia on behalf of his foundation, suggesting a major announcement about Sen. Clinton's political future won't come anytime soon.

"Senator Clinton made it clear that she will begin focusing on this decision after the election, and she will," Wolfson said.

In the coming weeks, Hillary Clinton's best-selling book on raising children, "It Takes a Village," will be rereleased by Simon and Schuster. She has penned a new introduction describing how the "village" has changed in the 10 years since the book was first published. An audio version, with Clinton reading the book, also will be released.

In 1996, the book sold 700,000 copies and a year later, Clinton captured a Grammy award for her audio version.

This time, she will be competing with Obama's "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream," which recently vaulted to No. 1 on The New York Times best-seller list. John Edwards, the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, has embarked on a book tour to promote "Home: The Blueprints of Our Lives," a coffee-table collection of mini-memoirs that he edited.

One factor influencing Clinton as she contemplates a presidential bid is the shift of power on Capitol Hill. Not only is Clinton poised to be part of a new Democratic majority, she likely will chair the Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Fisheries, Wildlife and Water. The job will give her a platform on environmental issues, which former vice president Al Gore has largely claimed.

One New York Democrat familiar with Clinton's thinking said people have underestimated her desire to be a senator and the impact of the newfound majority status. Those factors may work against a presidential bid.

Still, many skeptics laugh off any suggestion Clinton might not run.

Dick Morris, a longtime political strategist for both Clintons who has become a vehement critic in recent years, said she has made a pretense of indecision because she didn't want to risk her re-election to the Senate. He calls her current process of deliberation "a charade."

Morris puts it this way: "If I were still an adviser of hers, and I called her up and said 'Hillary, I think you should run for president in 2008,' I would be laughed off the phone. It would be like saying, 'I think you should breathe.'"

Political Lessons (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095156

THERE ARE lessons for both political parties in the conduct and outcome of the U.S. Senate race in Maryland this year. Republicans, whose Senate candidate was an African American man, discovered that identity politics and fraudulent campaign literature are not enough to drive African American voters into jettisoning their loyalty to the Democratic Party en masse. Democrats, who nominated white candidates for the Senate and every other marquee statewide race, were put on notice not to take their indispensable core constituency, African Americans, for granted. Both parties might profit from treating black voters, who account for between 20 and 25 percent of the state's electorate, with more respect.

In nominating Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele to run for the Senate, the Republicans clearly hoped that his race would win black votes. Mr. Steele campaigned heavily in Prince George's County, where he lives, trying to drive a wedge between the county's largely black voting population and the Democratic Party. But his appeal was dimmed by his insistent fuzziness on matters of substance, coupled with an economic platform based on tax giveaways to the rich. At the same time, he used a sleek, gimmicky advertising campaign that sought to substitute personality for policy. It didn't work. Just 23 percent of Prince Georgians who voted, and a quarter of all African Americans in Maryland, cast ballots for Mr. Steele.

It is true that Mr. Steele attracted more black votes than Republican candidates generally do in Maryland. But even that was tainted by a crude, eleventh-hour trick engineered by Republicans: the distribution of pamphlets in Prince George's blurring Mr. Steele's Republican affiliation and falsely suggesting that key black Democrats were supporting him. The pamphlet took Prince George's African American voters -- among the nation's best-educated -- for fools. Little wonder that many of them reacted with indignation and hostility. If Republicans are truly interested in wresting African American voters from the Democratic Party, they should try nominating candidates who campaign on substance, not symbols, and who treat all voters with equal respect.

The Democrats, who swept the statewide races, may feel they have less cause for introspection. That would be a mistake, because clearly some African American Democrats in Maryland feel the party has taken them for granted, despite the successful candidacy of the lieutenant governor-elect, Del. Anthony G. Brown, a rising star who is black. The Democrats' troubles began last year when the entrance of Kweisi Mfume into the Senate race was greeted with a profound silence by many in the party's hierarchy. Party elders, notably Rep. Steny H. Hoyer and state Senate President Thomas V. Mike Miller Jr., rushed to endorse Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, the eventual winner, for the job. That was their right; after all, Mr. Cardin has been a leading political figure in Maryland for decades. But Mr. Mfume -- who had served on the Baltimore City Council, as a member of the House of Representatives and as president of the NAACP -- thought it unseemly that he received so little consideration from the party, and some black party stalwarts agreed. They have sent the party a message that its leadership would be wise to heed.

Bush's Asia Trip To Focus On Trade, Terrorism (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE — President Bush arrived here today to begin an Asian tour knitting together the twin issues of economic security and counter-terrorism that are at the center of his agenda for the final two years of his presidency.

Over five days, the trip will take Bush from Singapore to Hanoi, for a Pacific Rim economic summit, and to Ho Chi Minh City and Indonesia, where he will seek cooperation in the campaign against terrorism.

Bush, who left Washington on Tuesday, spent two nights aboard Air Force One, flying by way of Moscow.

During a refueling stop Wednesday at Vnukovo II International Airport, the president and First Lady Laura Bush spent about 90 minutes with Russian President Vladimir V. Putin, and his wife, Lyudmila, lunching on Kamchatka crab, pancakes with red and black caviar, and other Russian delicacies.

The Russian news media said the presidents discussed efforts to persuade Iran to freeze its nuclear enrichment program and Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization, which will probably get a boost in Hanoi.

Bush's trip is centered on a three-day visit to Vietnam, his first and the second by a U.S. president since the end of the Vietnam War. President Clinton visited in November 2000, two months before leaving office.

Although the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit is focused on economic and trade issues, it takes place against the backdrop of the anti-terrorism campaign, the rise of China as an economic and diplomatic presence, and the loss of Republican Party foreign policy dominance after the congressional election.

DOJ_NMG_0095157

"All Asian friends will be watching initially President Bush and his team in terms of his body language, his statements, to see whether he will be weakened or committed to going forward with a broad and purposeful agenda in Asia as a whole," said Kurt Campbell, a former senior Pentagon official and senior vice president of the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank.

One of the first tests of Bush's ability to move forward is the challenge posed by North Korea's explosion of a nuclear device on Oct. 9. It will probably be a central topic on the sidelines of the summit.

Speaking with reporters last week, Stephen Hadley, Bush's national security advisor, said there was a possibility that the government in Pyongyang "would take some action" during the summit to demonstrate its belligerence.

As the place where the foreign policy of several U.S. presidents went awry, Vietnam will prove a challenge for Bush.

Critics may find it easy to draw parallels between the war in Iraq and the war in Vietnam: fighting with no sign that the administration's political goals are being met; a steady drain on the U.S. military; daily casualty reports in the news media; popular opinion in the United States and beyond turning against the president; and growing evidence of civil war.

For Vietnam, Bush's visit is part of a diplomatic coming-out party more than 31 years after the communists' victory led to the country's unification.

The 21-member Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum is being held in Vietnam for the first time, lending legitimacy to the Hanoi government and recognition to its powerful economic engine.

Vietnam's economy has grown dramatically after the introduction of market reforms. Last year, it grew at a rate of 8.4%, although per-capita income was a meager $638.

The annual meeting of the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, which was established in 1989, brings together leaders from the Pacific Rim with the goal of advancing economic growth, opening trade and promoting trade-related security.

The participating countries account for 40% of the world's population, 56% of its economic output and 48% of world trade.

For Bush, Singapore is an appropriate launching point for a trip linking economic, diplomatic and security concerns.

The country has been a historic center of Southeast Asian trade, has maintained close ties with the United States, particularly to Republican presidents, and is an ally of the administration in the U.S.-declared war on terrorism.

With connections throughout the region, Singapore also offers Bush perspectives on China's growth and conditions in Indonesia, the most populous Muslim nation, said Campbell, the think tank analyst. Bush's final stop there Monday has been limited to about six hours because of security concerns.

The president scheduled a series of meetings with Singaporean leaders today, followed by a speech at the National University of Singapore that is expected to focus on economic security and the fight against terrorism, disease and poverty.

Before the afternoon meetings, the president was expected to tour the Asian Civilizations Museum, which features 1,300 artifacts of Chinese, Southeast Asian, South Asian and West Asian Islamic cultures.

*

james.gerstenzang@latimes.com

Times staff writer David Holley in Moscow contributed to this report.

Asians Ask How Elections Affect Trade (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE — As President Bush sorts out his relationship with the incoming Democratic Congress, some Asian leaders wonder whether last week's elections were a vote against free trade and their countries' economic opportunities.

The new Democratic majority in the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate, including members who say free trade leads to American job losses, makes trade a timely topic for Bush's visits this week to Singapore, Indonesia and an economic conference in Vietnam.

“I know people in various governments around the region who are concerned,” said Edmund Sim, a Singapore attorney who has worked on trade agreements.

DOJ_NMG_0095158

In Indonesia, Foreign Minister Hassan Wirajuda told reporters that "like some other countries that are currently discussing free-trade areas, we are very worried."

The United States had a $373 billion trade deficit with Asian countries in 2005, representing nearly half of its overall $767 billion trade deficit. The red ink was led by a $202 billion deficit with China.

The United States had small trade surpluses with a few Asian nations, including Hong Kong and Singapore.

Bush arrived this morning (local time) in Singapore, a gleaming city synonymous with international barter since Britain's Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles established a trading post here in 1819.

As Air Force One refueled in Moscow, Bush had lunch with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The two leaders discussed the nuclear ambitions of Iran and North Korea.

Tonight, Bush delivers a major speech on U.S.-Asian relations that will include a renewed commitment to what national security adviser Stephen Hadley called "trade liberalization."

Delegates to the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum, to be held this weekend in Hanoi, will assess Bush's political strength in light of the election victories by the Democrats.

"They're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback," said Michael Green, a former member of Bush's National Security Council.

Though the Iraq war dominated the midterm elections, some successful Democrats argued that American companies have used lower trade barriers to move jobs overseas.

Rep. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, who defeated Republican Sen. Mike DeWine, called for "renegotiating job-killing trade agreements." Brown wrote a book called, Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed.

Sim, a native of Louisiana who has worked in Singapore for nearly a decade, says, "American consumers benefit tremendously from free trade," in terms of lower prices and product variety.

In what may be a preview of debates to come, the House failed Monday to muster the two-thirds vote necessary to approve normal trade relations with Vietnam, something Bush wants before the APEC summit. Ninety-four Democrats voted against the trade deal, along with 66 Republicans. The House may try again in December.

Another test will come next summer, when the new Congress decides whether to continue giving presidents the power to negotiate trade agreements that cannot be amended and require only an up-or-down vote. This is known as "fast track" authority.

Democrats plan to seek greater oversight and enforcement capabilities to protect U.S. jobs. Sen. Max Baucus, D-Mont., in line to be chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, wants to create a chief enforcement officer in the U.S. trade representative's office.

"Moving forward on aggressive trade initiatives requires that we tackle — with equal vigor — their domestic consequences," Baucus said recently.

Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., who will be the top Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, says the trend away from unfettered free trade has been building for some time. He notes the coalition that supported President Clinton's effort on the North American Free Trade Agreement between the United States, Canada and Mexico has shrunk.

Simon Tay, chairman of the Singapore Institute of International Affairs, notes the Bush administration has discussed an overall "free-trade area" for Asian nations, an idea to be reviewed at the economic forum in Vietnam. Tay said a Democratic Congress and the "looming end of fast-track approval" puts a lot of "pressure" against that concept.

Paul Rosenthal, an international trade lawyer in Washington, predicted Democrats will probably seek restrictive trade agreements that would include requirements that trading partners abide by international labor and environmental standards.

"I don't think there will be an end to free-trade negotiations," Rosenthal said. "But I do think there's going to be a lot closer scrutiny."

Bush Seeks To Reassure Allies On Trade (AP-Y)

By Terence Hunt, Ap White House Correspondent

AP, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095159

President Bush is seeking to reassure nervous Asian allies that the United States will remain a reliable partner in liberalizing trade, confronting North Korea's nuclear threat and fighting terrorism after an election upheaval back home.

In Bush's first overseas trip since Republicans lost the House and Senate, world leaders are looking for any sign of change since the election repudiation of his Iraq policy.

In an early embarrassment for Bush, the House failed to approve normalized trade relations with Vietnam — a move Bush wanted completed this week. Instead, Congress probably will consider it in December.

Bush's eight-day journey takes him to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. A week later, he will be in Europe for a summit of NATO leaders. The two trips will take him away from Washington at a crucial time when the postelection, lame-duck Congress is dealing with issues the White House has deemed vital.

The president planned to outline the themes of his trip with a speech in Singapore on Thursday, emphasizing how the United States and Asian nations can work together.

"The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language," said Mike Green, who until earlier this year was senior director for Asia at the National Security Council. "They know he's the commander in chief. They know that he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

En route to Singapore, Air Force One stopped in Moscow for refueling. Russian President Vladimir Putin and his wife, Lyudmila, came out to the airport to greet Bush and his wife, Laura, on a red carpet. Bush's stop was a pointed gesture of friendship toward Putin, whose support Bush needs in dealing with North Korea and Iran. Typically, U.S. presidents heading for Asia fly west, not east, and refuel in Alaska.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley, talking to reporters aboard Air Force One after Bush left, said the presidents "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea.

Russian news agencies quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as confirming that a bilateral agreement on Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization was being readied for signing in Hanoi.

While the Republican election defeat was cheered by many in Europe, where Bush is highly unpopular, it is a different story in Asia. Many Asian nations are nervous about the rise of China and look to the United States to be a force of strength and continuity. They will be watching for Bush for possible signals.

Along with trade and regional security, the trip will deal with issues such as avian flu, the battle against government corruption, the promotion of freedom and curbing of poverty. Southeast Asia also is an area with active al-Qaida-linked terrorists.

On Friday Bush will travel to Vietnam for the annual summit of 21 Pacific Rim leaders.

On the summit's sidelines, Bush will meet individually with his partners in talks aimed at persuading a defiant North Korea to abandon its nuclear weapons program. He will meet on Saturday with Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, and South Korea President Roh Moo-hyun and on Sunday with Putin and Chinese President Hu Jintao.

The leaders will explore how to proceed in the start-and-stop talks on North Korean disarmament. After testing a nuclear bomb Oct. 9, North Korea declared its willingness to return to the negotiations; no date has been set.

Worried about angering Pyongyang, South Korea has balked at Washington's demand that it fully join a U.S.-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the North's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

Meanwhile, this week's setback on normal trade relations with Vietnam could portend tough times for other trade legislation when the Democrats take over Congress in January. Many Democrats see trade liberalizing legislation as a threat to American jobs. Bush's authority to negotiate a "fast-track" agreement that can be submitted to Congress for a simple yes-or-no vote without amendments is due to expire on July 1, 2007.

Regarding congressional inaction on Vietnam trade relations, Hadley said, "It is unfortunate that it could not have been done before the president arrived, but I think the message for the Vietnamese people will be, 'This is going to get done.'"

After 3 1/2 days in Vietnam, Bush will visit Indonesia, the world's largest Muslim-majority nation. The president will stop in Hawaii on his way back to the United States and have breakfast Tuesday morning with troops at Hickam Air Force Base before returning to Washington.

Blow To Bush As Vietnam Trading Bill Rejected (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0095160

By Alan Beattie And Amy Kazmin

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

The administration of President George W. Bush scrambled on Wednesday to play down the significance of the US House of Representatives defeating a motion to treat Vietnam as a full trading partner.

The leadership of the House, which remains in Republican hands until the newly elected Democrat-controlled Congress takes over in January, decided on Tuesday night not to call for another vote on the bill to grant Vietnam so-called "permanent normal trade relations" after it failed to get the requisite two-thirds majority on Monday.

Though the bill is very likely to pass when Congress reconvenes in December, the timing of the vote, days before Mr Bush attends the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) forum in Vietnam is highly unfortunate for the White House.

Susan Schwab, US trade representative, used a press conference in Hanoi on Wednesday to argue that the defeat arose from procedural problems, not fear of Vietnam or rejection of trade deals.

"You have to be a student of our congressional system to understand the vote," she said. "The fact is that there was strong bipartisan support in favour of permanent normal trade relations for Vietnam in the House of Representatives."

The House of Representatives voted 228 to 161 to pass the bill. But it failed to reach the two-thirds majority required under the expedited procedures used.

The bill commits the US to giving Vietnam the same privileges as any other member of the World Trade Organisation, which Vietnam is due to join next year. It is largely symbolic but observers said Hanoi may not quickly forget the diplomatic embarrassment the US has caused it at a moment when it is under intense global scrutiny as the host of an important regional economic forum.

"What a screw-up," said Fred Burke, a partner at the law firm Baker & McKenzie in Ho Chi Minh City. "It's a disaster. It undermines so much of the goodwill and co-operative atmosphere that is really strong right now."

The failure to pass the bill caused irritation within the administration about Republican mismanagement of the House. But there was also dissent from the party that will make it harder to form a bipartisan majority on trade. Ted Poe, a Texas congressman, said he and other Republicans would continue to vote against the pact and might challenge future bilateral deals, such as the free trade agreement with Peru.

Adam Sitkoff, executive director of the America Chamber of Commerce in Hanoi, said he was disappointed the vote would be delayed but confident it would pass in December. "There is strong bipartisan support and the new Democrat leadership voted in favour of this bill," he said.

Trade Bills Now Face Tough Odds (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — The Bush administration says it has no higher global economic priority than to combat rising protectionism. This week the challenge became harder and more complicated.

Like a lightning bolt that illuminates a dark landscape, the failure by the House to pass what should have been a routine measure sought by President Bush to extend normal trade relations with Vietnam shows how much harder it will be to win approval of trade bills from now on.

Administration officials said Wednesday that they still hoped the Vietnam trade bill would be approved by the end of the year in the lame-duck Congressional session that continues to be led by Republicans. They said the same for other bills that would grant trade preferences to poor countries in Asia, Africa and Latin America.

But after an election in which many winning Democrats ran on promises to look more skeptically at trade measures, Democratic leaders and trade lobbyists agreed that, at least next year, the administration is going to have to adjust to a new environment and make concessions in order to get such bills through a Democratic-controlled Congress.

Among the concessions might be greater efforts to get trading partners to crack down on sweatshops and labor abuses and to respect environmental standards and other types of regulations in their countries. Trade deals may also have to address what sorts of goods the American government can procure from overseas.

DOJ_NMG_0095161

"The election was a reaffirmation of public skepticism on trade deals," said Lori Wallach, director of Public Citizen's Global Trade Watch, a group founded by Ralph Nader. "There's going to be a majority for trade deals, but it's going to be a different majority than the one we're used to. The skeptics are going to have a say."

This was also the view of groups advocating trade agreements representing big business.

"We're optimistic about working with the new Congress, but we're going to have to show some flexibility," said Christopher Wenk, director of international trade policy at the National Association of Manufacturers. "Labor is going to have to play a more prevalent role, and environmental issues are going to have to be addressed."

The Vietnam bill passed by a majority, but it fell short of the two-thirds majority needed under special rules invoked to speed its consideration on the eve of Mr. Bush's trip to Hanoi, his first visit to the country with which the United States fought a war a generation ago.

The result was an embarrassment for the White House, suddenly deprived of a tangible way to prove that relations with Vietnam were improving under Mr. Bush. Even administration officials said they were not sure why the bill failed and seemed ready to blame Republicans as well as Democrats.

A day after Republican leaders decided not to even try to pass the bill before Mr. Bush's visit, new details of the inner workings of the House bill were emerging. Legislative aides said Republican skeptics of the bill were furious with their leaders that it was being scheduled so soon after an election in which trade was an issue.

More than 60 Republican voted against the measure, an unusually high number for a party that stands for free trade. Misgivings about improving relations with Vietnam three decades after the war were cited as a factor in their dissent.

So was a general feeling of resentment toward Representative Bill Thomas, the California Republican who is outgoing chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, whose style of running the committee is criticized by Republicans and Democrats as autocratic and doctrinaire.

On the Democratic side, the issue was complicated as well. Democratic leaders like Representatives Nancy Pelosi, set to become House speaker, and Charles B. Rangel, the expected chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, supported the Vietnam bill. Their offices noted that more than 90 Democrats voted for it.

Mr. Rangel said he would handle trade legislation differently from Mr. Thomas and consult lawmakers about their ideas before the vote. He said trade actually offered more of a prospect for bipartisan cooperation than other issues like taxes, Social Security and Medicare.

"With all the other big-ticket items we're facing, trade is one issue that could be more easily dealt with in a bipartisan way," Mr. Rangel said in an interview. "In the past, Republicans never welcomed working with us, except to tell our trading partners that it was the Democrats who were holding up trade deals."

Mr. Rangel said, however, that he did not think trading partners would object to the kinds of concerns on labor, environment and other issues that Democrats would be raising. "I have not heard one representative of any government objecting to any suggestions by Democrats," he said.

Trade officials say that dictating labor, environmental and regulatory standards of American trading partners is not as easy as Mr. Rangel and the Democrats assert in the current environment as European, Latin American and Asian countries are making trade deals with each other that could freeze out the United States.

"We do not have the luxury of standing on the sidelines," said an administration trade official, asking not to be identified discussing tactics in Congress. "We have got to be in the game. We have to get preferential access."

The Vietnam deal was especially upsetting to the American textile industry, which has been reeling from a succession of trade deals with Mexico, the Caribbean and China over the last 10 years. Some worried that the Vietnam arrangement might allow cheating by China to circumvent curbs on its exports by going through that country.

Democrats denied Republican claims that they were under pressure from their labor supporters to vote against the Vietnam deal. They said the vote on Monday evening demonstrated that, while about half the Democrats in Congress might vote against future accords — and indeed most Democrats opposed trade deals even under President Bill Clinton — there should be enough Democrats to join with Republicans to pass some measures. Whatever happens on Vietnam and the pending deals with poor countries, the vote this week was not seen as good news for a future global trade accord, which is hung up on the issue of farm subsidies and tariffs.

DOJ_NMG_0095162

The Bush administration has made it clear that it cannot offer to reduce its current level of $20 billion in farm subsidies in return for modest access to European, Indian, Indonesian and Brazilian markets for American goods. Such access seems not to be in the offing, and therefore many trade experts are pessimistic about getting a global deal.

Bad Start For Bipartisanship On Trade Issues (FT)

By Alan Beattie And Eoin Callan

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Never mind the Democrats: it's those Capitol Hill Republicans you need to watch out for. That was the conclusion of frustrated Bush administration officials as they blamed the ineptitude of the Republican leadership of the House of Representatives for trying and failing to rush through the Vietnam trade bill on Monday.

As one frustrated official put it on Wednesday: "The bottom line is that we can't blame this one on the Democrats." While some Democrats have been warning that they will scrutinise trade agreements much more closely when they take over the House and Senate in January, the Democrat vote on Monday divided almost evenly for and against – more favourable than for many trade bills. It was the failure of some Republicans to turn up, along with 66 who voted against, that did for the bill. Some speculated that the votes against might have reflected congressional Rep-ublican resentment towards the White House after the heavy defeats of the mid-term elections.

"If they had not used the suspension calendar, this would probably have been seen as a huge bipartisan victory," the administration official said. The official was referring to the accelerated "suspension" process chosen by the House Republican leadership to push the vote through before this weekend's Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation (Apec) meeting in Hanoi. Though the bill will very probably be passed when it comes up again early next month, it is a bad start for the administration's attempts to achieve cross-party support for trade liberalisation on Capitol Hill.

The White House will face a tough challenge selling any new trade deals to a House and Senate both controlled by Democrats. In particular, it looks ever more quixotic to attempt to turn the Apec forum, which meets this weekend in Hanoi, into a giant free trade agreement of Asia-Pacific (FTAAP), as suggested by some.

The Apec heads of government will call for feasibility studies of the possibility of melding the 21 members of Apec into a trade pact. But since such a deal would involve the US promising even more trade liberalisation with China, a key member of the bloc, it looks to most like a non-starter. Even some Democrats promising bipartisanship on trade issues balk at going any further with China until they are happy it is playing by the rules it has already signed up to.

Barack Obama, a contender for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, said frustration over relations with Beijing had emerged as a hot-button issue for "congressmen from states that have been hit by job losses in manufacturing". "There are a number of incoming congressmen that want a new approach to engagement with China," he said.

Even so-called "Blue Dog" Democrats – those with centrist pro-business policies – declare the first order of business on China is addressing outstanding differences over global imbalances, monetary policy, and enforcement of existing trade obligations.

"Democrats are anxious to start by sitting down with the Bush administration and hammering out these issues," said an aide to John Tanner, a leading Blue Dog in the House of Representatives.

US business groups also rejected suggestions of a regional FTA, saying the Doha round of trade talks remained the best hope. "We need to press China for results on unmet obligations," said Myron Brilliant, of the US Chamber of Commerce. And when even the fervently pro-trade hosts don't think a deal is a runner in the near future, it seems unlikely many will dissent. "Establishment of the Free Trade Area in Asia-Pacific cannot be realised in the near future," Tran Thu Hang, deputy director-general of the Vietnamese trade ministry's multilateral section, told the state-controlled Vietnam News. "The orientation of the current free trade agreements are such that it would require major changes in Apec's mechanism."

Bush, In Asia, Faces A Test Of Diplomatic Muscle (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

DOJ_NMG_0095163

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

SINGAPORE, Thursday, Nov. 16 — President Bush arrived here Thursday morning in one of Asia's most prosperous corners, opening a five-day visit that will test whether the Republican defeat last week diminished his influence as he presses other nations to confront Iran and North Korea.

Stopping Wednesday in Moscow for refueling, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, had a 90-minute visit with President Vladimir V. Putin, which the White House described as largely social.

But it included some exchanges on efforts to get Russia to join a resolution imposing United Nations sanctions on Iran for its continued defiance regarding its nuclear program.

On the way here, Mr. Bush's national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, acknowledged that the two countries were still well apart on such sanctions.

"The issue is just what should be in the resolution," Mr. Hadley said after talking to his counterpart, Igor Ivanoff, in Moscow. "It's a little bit like sausage making — it's not pretty, and a lot of it spills out into the public. But I think the international community has held together on this issue, and I think we will again."

Russia has deep economic ties to Iran's nuclear power program — it is the supplier of nuclear reactors now under construction — and it has been the most reluctant to impose sanctions, saying they would undercut efforts to reach a negotiated settlement. Administration officials make little secret of their frustration that the year is coming to a close and Iran is continuing to enrich uranium.

Asked about seeking Iran's help with ending violence in Iraq while pressing the nuclear issue, Mr. Hadley said the administration had no intention of letting up the pressure to win Iran's help. "There's not a tradeoff between the two," he said. "Iran ought to have an interest in having a unified and stable Iraq."

In Moscow the Kremlin's spokesman, Dmitry S. Peskov, described the meeting of the presidents and their wives as brief but "very positive." He said that among the subjects they took up was an agreement, already announced, for Russia to enter the World Trade Organization.

When Mr. Bush arrives Friday in Hanoi, the Vietnamese capital, for an annual Asian summit meeting, he will face a more difficult trade issue: Congress balked at final passage of normal trade relations with Vietnam.

Mr. Bush had intended to bring news of the approval with him, but Mr. Hadley said that instead, he would tell Hanoi that he believed the problems in Congress — some with Mr. Bush's own Republican allies — would soon be resolved.

In Hanoi, Mr. Bush is also likely to have a testy encounter with President Roh Moo-hyun of South Korea. Mr. Roh has been critical of what he has called a one-sided American approach to North Korea, and earlier this week, he announced only weak sanctions against North Korea in response to its nuclear test on Oct. 9.

So far South Korea has declined to take part directly in the American-led effort to detect and seize illicit weapons shipments. Many North Korean ships pass through South Korean waters. American officials say that Mr. Roh, in a visit to Washington before the nuclear test, had indicated that if North Korea detonated a nuclear test, it would "change everything" in relations between North and South.

One of Mr. Bush's senior national security aides, speaking in Washington before the president left, but declining to talk on the record about the friction between Washington and Seoul, said, "It seems to have changed almost nothing."

Bush, Putin Discuss Iran, Korea (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

HANOI -- President Bush stopped off in Moscow yesterday to talk with Russian President Vladimir Putin about the nuclear proliferation efforts by North Korea and Iran before proceeding to Southeast Asia for an eight-day trade and economic trip.

Russian officials said the two leaders agreed to sign a deal next week that would help Russia join the World Trade Organization.

National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley said he and his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, talked and said there is still general agreement on passing a United Nations resolution with consequences if Iran continues to pursue its nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0095164

"We need a resolution, we need to show that there's some consequences, we also need to keep the door open to negotiations if the Iranians are willing to come and suspend" their program, said Mr. Hadley.

Taking leave of Washington -- a city he lost to the Democrats one week ago -- Mr. Bush arrived in Singapore today on a trip that will be long on economic and trade talks and short on U.S. politics -- even though his forthcoming stay in Vietnam will prompt comparisons to the flagging war in Iraq.

The White House said the president plans to focus his trip to Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia on encouraging free trade and praising economic expansion in the ascendant nations. In a speech he will deliver today, the president will utter little of his usual rhetoric on foreign trips, when he often urges nations to step up in the fight against terrorism.

"In his remarks, the president will highlight the importance of Asia in the world and will discuss the ways in which the United States and Asian nations are partnering together to face the challenges of poverty, disease, terrorism, and energy security," said Mr. Hadley.

While Mr. Bush will be president for another two years, his loss of Congress considerably weakens his clout at home. One former White House adviser said the strong hand he held when he bucked the international community and invaded Iraq may be all but played out.

"The Asian leaders will be looking at President Bush's body language," said Mike Green, who is now an Asia specialist at the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "They know he has two years left, but they're going to be all looking to see how he plays the game after this political setback."

After two nights in Singapore, including one on which the president and first lady will attend a dinner with the prime minister, Mr. Bush will visit Vietnam for three nights. His first stop is Hanoi, where he will attend the 21-nation Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation, a summit of Pacific Rim leaders and others seeking to open trade throughout the world.

At the annual summit, Mr. Bush will hold bilateral talks with leaders from South Korea, China and Japan, along with Mr. Putin, whom he met briefly during the red-carpet refueling stop yesterday. The four nations are part of six-party talks with North Korea, which has become increasingly bellicose, test-firing missiles on July 4 and detonating what specialists say was a nuclear device in October.

The talks, which include the United States and North Korea, have been stalled for a year, but aides to the communist nation's President Kim Jong-il last month said the leader is open to restarting negotiations over its nuclear ambitions.

Also in Hanoi, Mr. Bush will tour the Joint POW-MIA Accounting Command, where he will be briefed on efforts to locate or account for all of the nearly 1,800 U.S. service members still missing from the Vietnam War.

On Monday, Mr. Bush will spend a day in Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon, where he will tour the stock exchange and attend a meeting on bird flu, which has killed more than 100 people in Southeast Asia.

Bush's Visit To Vietnam Sparks Hope In Little Saigon (LAT)

By Mai Tran

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

In the streets and marketplaces of Little Saigon, the talk is of optimism and new freedoms for a country many fled decades ago.

President Bush's visit to Vietnam today is seen in the nation's largest Vietnamese American community as a heartening, profoundly important event. For some, there is even the hope that the president will find a way to champion reform in a country that still evokes bitterness and memories of terrible times.

"I've been waiting for this day," said Kimberly Ta, 61, of Anaheim, shopping with her father and friends at the Asian Garden Mall in Westminster. "I am hoping that his visit will make life better for the people of Vietnam."

Bush will attend the Asian Pacific Economic Cooperation summit in Hanoi as part of an eight-day tour. He is the second president to visit the Southeast Asian country since the former country of South Vietnam fell to the communists in 1975.

Many in Little Saigon, a bustling Vietnamese American community that sprawls through parts of Westminster, Garden Grove and Santa Ana, say it's the perfect time for Bush to voice their concerns.

DOJ_NMG_0095165

"I just hope that President Bush tells Vietnam that human rights is important," said Janet Nguyen, a Garden Grove councilwoman. Bush "comes from a country that represents freedom and democracy; he needs to remind Vietnam that if they want to benefit from the free-trade market, they have to abide by the human rights laws."

Others suggested that Bush should be cautious in dealing with the Vietnamese government. Activists from San Jose have gathered outside the White House in recent weeks, asking Bush to demand that the communist nation embrace democracy before trade with the United States is normalized.

"It's only fair," said Ta, a homemaker who immigrated to the United States in 1981 under an Amerasian sponsorship program. She visits relatives in Vietnam every year and hopes Bush's visit will "somehow make it easier for the Vietnamese to travel abroad" so her family can visit her.

Many Vietnamese Americans still have family in Vietnam.

Thuong Dinh, a cashier at Pho Vien Huong Dakao restaurant in Westminster, visits Vietnam twice a year to see family. There have been vast improvements in basic freedoms and growing prosperity, but more needs to be done, he said.

"It's getting better," said Dinh, 45, of Westminster, who fled by boat in 1979. "It's 2006 already, not like it was 25 to 30 years ago, but of course we want to see more freedom."

Vietnam was on the brink of becoming the 150th member of the World Trade Organization but its membership failed to pass in the House this week. A decision could be made in December.

The membership would be only a gesture, many said, because trade is already taking place. In Little Saigon, food, clothing, furniture, music and pottery are imported and sold at local stores. Many businesspeople travel to Vietnam but keep their dealings secret, fearing a backlash from anticommunist activists. Anticommunist feelings run deep in Little Saigon.

For Thuy Reed, a 53-year-old San Pedro resident, the trade vote is nothing more than procedural.

Even without any restrictions, Bush should push for Vietnam to trade, supporters say.

Sitting in front of a boba drink shop in the popular two-story Asian Garden Mall, Reed said that "99.9% of the stores here are already getting their products from Vietnam. At least opening trade to Vietnam would give so many people opportunities and jobs. You can't punish the laypeople of Vietnam for the work of the communist government."

Nguyen, the Garden Grove councilwoman, said her opposition to the Vietnamese government had kept her from visiting her native country. She's tracking Bush's trip, hoping that somehow it will speed reform.

"If they open up and the political dynamics change, maybe one day, I'll get to visit my homeland."

mai.tran@latimes.com

Rice Backs Trying To Restart Trade Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, November 16, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice endorsed an attempt to restart global trade talks that collapsed over the summer, telling Asian trade partners on Thursday that a new trade agreement is "critical to global prosperity and security."

Rice pledged $1 million in new U.S. funding for an Asian trade development initiative and unveiled a U.S. program allowing expedited visas and other services for approved business travelers from nations in the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation forum.

"We need to make it easier to do business in the region," Rice told an opening session of the 21-nation forum.

According to a draft of a statement Pacific Rim leaders plan to issue later in the annual summit, the leaders agreed to return to the current round of world trade talks, launched in Doha, Qatar, in 2001. The talks collapsed in July amid an impasse over farm trade concessions and other issues.

"Both as a trade issue and a foreign policy issue, the success of the Doha round is critical to global prosperity and security," Rice said.

APEC trade and economic ministers held talks in Hanoi on Wednesday hoping to get negotiations on a global agreement to slash trade barriers back on track. Fast action is needed if the World Trade Organization is to strike a deal before President Bush's authority to reach a trade deal that can be submitted to Congress for a simple yes-or-no vote without amendments expires in mid-2007.

DOJ_NMG_0095166

Also Thursday, Rice and other delegates at the forum conferred on the North Korean nuclear issue. The informal gathering was a substitute for a smaller and more structured session that the United States and Japan had hoped to hold on the sidelines of the APEC meeting.

China, which chairs six-nation talks aimed at shuttering Pyongyang's nuclear program, strongly opposed holding a session that excluded the North, which does not participate in APEC.

The United States, South Korea, China, Japan and Russia have offered impoverished North Korea a package of economic, political and energy incentives if it gives up its nuclear weapons. The North agreed to the deal in September 2005, but then backed away.

The six-nation talks have been mothballed for a year, during which North Korea test-fired a long-range missile and conducted an underground nuclear explosion that unnerved Asia and the West.

The North agreed in principle to return to the arms control negotiations after its nuclear test Oct. 9, and host China had hoped to schedule the session before the end of the year.

Before arriving in Hanoi, Rice suggested that the new round of talks may not come quickly.

"We need to take our time this time and make sure when we go to the table at the six-party talks there is a reasonable chance of a successful outcome," Rice told reporters.

Legwork is under way to make sure new talks are tightly structured and produce a result, Rice said. Two top State Department officials recently returned from planning meetings in Asia, and Rice predicted there will be more such visits. Rice herself will meet separately with the foreign ministers of China and South Korea during her stay in the Vietnamese capital.

"I'm a veteran of arms-control negotiations," said Rice, a specialist on the former Soviet Union. "It's not at all unusual that you have a lot of preparatory work in advance of any round of getting the actual negotiators together."

The draft APEC statement shows apparent differences among members on the appropriate way to deal with the threat of weapons of mass destruction. Two sentences about WMD are enclosed in brackets, meaning some members wanted that material deleted.

The draft does not mention North Korea, although the issue was high on the summit agenda. Envoys from South Korea, Japan and the United States were to meet Wednesday in Hanoi to hammer out a common strategy ahead of six-way nuclear talks that include North Korea.

The document does stress the importance of ensuring security to advance prosperity in the region, saying the leaders are "determined to continue efforts to combat terrorism."

In the Vietnamese capital, Christopher Hill, the top U.S. nuclear envoy, said Wednesday that talks with North Korea on its nuclear program won't succeed unless the communist regime lives up to commitments to abandon nuclear weapons in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

"I think we've all made very clear that we don't accept North Korea as a nuclear state," Hill said.

South Korean nuclear envoy Chun Yung-woo earlier called for real progress in the talks.

"If we do not make substantial progress, the future for the six-party talks will be very unclear," he said late Tuesday after arriving in Hanoi from Seoul. "There should not be talks for the sake of talks."

The comments were some of the strongest Chun has made about the North.

Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

HANOI -- Vietnam's ruling Communist Party is turning to the ideology and social teachings of its founder, Ho Chi Minh, in an uphill battle against rampant corruption that has resulted in the dismissal of thousands of officials in recent years.

The Politburo instructed the party's local branches this week to begin a campaign "to encourage party members and the general public to study and follow [Ho's] virtuous personality."

By doing this, it said, "the party believes people will be able to effectively push back social evils" such as "corruption, waste and individualism," a reference to the diminished role of the individual in communist ideology.

DOJ_NMG_0095167

"The party's offices and organizations will set up standards on virtue and lifestyle for cadres, party members and state employees," said the new directive, which was published by the official Vietnam News Agency.

All Vietnamese read Ho's teachings in school, but the party is worried that they either forget them as they grow older or give in to the vices of a modern and evermore developed economy, officials said yesterday.

The party has been embarrassed by the lengths to which some of its most senior members have gone for personal profit, one official said. "Thousands have been fired for corruption, embezzlement and graft."

Some of those sacked include vice ministers and even the country's anti-corruption chief. According to press reports, Luong Cao Khai received money and land from oil and gas officials and secured jobs in the energy sector for his relatives.

Last year, several oil and gas officials received sentences ranging from four years to life in prison for causing losses to the state worth millions of dollars.

Earlier this year, a betting scandal prompted the party leader, Nong Duc Manh, to say that corruption "threatens the survival of our system."

Bets on soccer games worth $7 million were reportedly placed by the head of a government agency that handles hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign development aid for construction projects. According to local press reports, he lost $320,000 on a single match in Britain between Manchester United and Arsenal on Jan. 3.

Even Vo Nguyen Giap, the retired general who is revered for Vietnam's victories over both the French and the Americans, felt compelled to remark: "The party has become a shield for corrupt officials."

Another reason for the party's appeal for its members to revisit Ho's teachings is that ideology and traditional values are far from the minds of most young Vietnamese, officials said.

Vietnam has made impressive strides in the past decade in its quest to turn its previously planned system into a modern market economy.

It joined the World Trade Organization last week and is hosting the annual Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit with 21 heads of state, including President Bush, this weekend.

But the United States, which is eager to fully normalize trade relations with Vietnam, is critical of the slow pace of political reforms. The Communist Party's rule remains unchallenged, and democracy and human rights activists are regularly harassed.

Two decades ago, the Vietnamese Communist Party, faced with a faltering central-planning economy, formally abandoned Marxist approaches and began introducing market elements as part of a broad reform package called "Doi Moi," translated as either "Renewal" or "Renovation."

Foreign Students Trickling Back To US (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

A modest rise in new enrollees from abroad begins to stem the post-9/11 drop-off, a report finds.

WASHINGTON

Karian Antoine, an elementary school teacher from the Caribbean island nation of St. Lucia, had long wanted to go beyond her two-year college degree. But the idea of furthering her education in the United States had never attracted her - especially, she says, after the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Now, though, the Grade 4 teacher at a Catholic school for boys is working her way toward a degree from Virginia's Lynchburg College. She enrolled in Lynchburg's program to train special-education teachers, which the college set up in St. Lucia, and is now one of 23 foreign students at the small liberal arts school.

Antoine is part of a modest rise in the number of new foreign students in the US, the first increase after several years of declines after the 9/11 attacks. While educators hope it signals a return to America's status as a magnet for international education, they acknowledge that getting more students like Antoine to study in the US will take a more coordinated effort from the government and higher-ed institutions.

With just under 565,000 foreign students, the US remains the world's most popular destination for students looking to further their education in another country. But that number is still below the high point of 584,000 foreign students set in 2002-03. US government efforts to streamline the visa process for foreign students, after a post-9/11 tightening of access, is one factor in a return to a rising number in the 2005-06 school year, experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0095168

But a global market for foreign students means that American colleges and universities face more competition today - in particular from countries like Britain, Australia, and Japan.

"The fact is that we are in a different place now in the international student market," says Victor Johnson, public policy director for the Association of International Educators in Washington. "Competition from other countries has increased, which means the US is actually getting a smaller share of the market."

The hotter competition helps explain why Education Secretary Margaret Spellings is in China, Korea, and Japan this week with a group of university presidents - a first-of-its-kind mission - to tout the virtues of American higher education.

One reason to fire up more foreigners about US study: their impact on the economy. International students pumped about $13.5 billion into the economy last year, notes the Institute of International Education, whose annual "Open Doors" survey this week reported the increase in foreigners studying in the US. That makes higher education the fifth-highest service-sector export, according to the Department of Commerce.

As important as that is, officials say a broader national interest - one driven home by 9/11 - is the international understanding they believe results from international education. "The amount of money international students spend here is astounding, but [beyond that] are the benefits of increased contact ... between Americans and people [elsewhere]," says Paul Hiemstra, director of global education programs at the State Department. "Those direct contacts counter the stereotypes and misperceptions."

As part of an expanded effort to improve America's image abroad, the State Department is putting more emphasis on international exchanges in both directions, all under the stewardship of presidential adviser Karen Hughes. The effort includes streamlining the student visa process, making more information available to prospective students, and increasing contacts between US institutions of higher education and foreign governments, Mr. Hiemstra says.

These efforts are explained by a growing realization that the advent of a globalized world has forever changed the role of international education, experts say. "Higher education is beginning to say that without the international dimension, you just aren't educated," says Allan Goodman, president of the Institute of International Education.

New international realities will keep expanding the two-way street of international education, with high growth in the US, Mr. Goodman says. A separate survey showed the number of Americans studying abroad grew 8 percent last year, to more than 200,000. Forecasts anticipate that the number of students going outside their own country for part of their education will grow from 2.5 million today to 7 million in five to six years.

The International Educators' Mr. Johnson says the US share of that pie will grow only if the US learns from its international competitors and develops a public-private marketing plan.

Some American schools are already making such efforts. Yerlan Shildibekov, one of 30 Kazakhstani students at the Rochester Institute of Technology in New York, is benefiting from an agreement between his new school and Kazakhstan's government. He has a government scholarship but also financial benefits from RIT.

The anticipated outcome? "In a year I'll go home with a master's in electrical engineering," Mr. Shildibekov says. "But I'm living here with American roommates, so I hope to increase the understanding between America and my country."

Open Campuses (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

WHEN IT COMES to attracting the best minds to America's universities and colleges, geography should not matter. So it is welcome news that after two years of decline, students from foreign countries are steadily coming back to U.S. college campuses. It's a trend that should be encouraged even more.

Foreign student enrollment was among the casualties of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Concerns about homeland security and new restrictions on student visas resulted in long, unpredictable waits for entry into the United States. Students from other countries, believing America no longer welcomed them, went elsewhere. In the 2005-06 school year, though, according to a survey released Monday by the Institute of International Education, the number held steady at 564,766, and new enrollments were up about 8 percent. Credit goes to the State Department, which made foreign students a priority, adding workers to streamline the visa process and starting new recruiting and scholarship programs. Credit also goes to the educational institutions that put new energy into recruitment efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0095169

This is a world of increasing competition and collaboration, and immeasurable good is achieved when barriers are torn down. Some of the students who come here today will lead their countries tomorrow, and even those who won't be leaders will leave with a better understanding and appreciation of America. While they are here, they make important contributions, such as teaching this country something about its international neighbors as well as helping the local economy. Consider, for instance, that the 7,600 international students in Washington end up pumping more dollars into the region than, say, the Washington Redskins.

Any doubt about the benefits of attracting foreign students should be erased when weighed against the fact that other countries have started their own programs to aggressively recruit these same smart students. This week a delegation of college presidents, led by education and State Department officials, is in Asia on a mission to recruit foreign scholars. America can't afford not to put out the welcome mat.

President Visits Briefly With Putin On Way To Asia (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, November 16, 2006

MOSCOW, Nov. 15 -- President Bush, eager for Russian help in nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, tended to the sometimes frosty Washington-Moscow relationship Wednesday by paying a quick call on President Vladimir Putin.

Bush paused to visit the Russian leader for an hour and a half during an airport stopover on his way to Asia for a week-long trip that includes stays in Singapore, Vietnam and Indonesia. Bush has meetings scheduled with several important allies, including Putin, on the sidelines of a summit of Pacific Rim leaders in Hanoi this week. But only Putin rated a social call as well.

Russian news agencies quoted Kremlin spokesman Alexei Gromov as saying the two presidents discussed the Iranian nuclear program, the situation in the Middle East and nuclear nonproliferation.

Gromov also confirmed that a U.S.-Russian agreement on Russia's accession to the World Trade Organization was being readied for signing in Hanoi.

National security adviser Stephen J. Hadley, talking to reporters aboard Air Force One after Bush left, said the president's get-together with Putin "was a social meeting, as we said it would be. This was a refueling stop."

But Hadley also said the two men "talked a little bit about proliferation generally" with regard to Iran and North Korea. He also said he had spoken with his Russian counterpart, Igor Ivanov, about efforts to reach agreement on a new U.N. security resolution on Iran.

When Bush and his wife, Laura, landed, they were greeted on a red carpet on the tarmac by Putin and his wife, Lyudmila. The Russian president presented Laura Bush with a bouquet of yellow, orange and red flowers, and the four exchanged kisses.

Bush And Putin To Sign WTO Deal In Hanoi (FT)

By Neil Buckley

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US president George W. Bush held an unusual airport meeting with Russia's Vladimir Putin during a refuelling stop in Moscow, where they confirmed the two countries would this weekend sign a bilateral accord on Russian entry to the World Trade Organisation.

Mr Bush was on his way to Hanoi for the Asia-Pacific Economic Co-operation summit, where he will hold more detailed talks with Mr Putin. Kremlin officials called Wednesday's 90-minute meeting "extraordinarily positive and friendly", saying the two leaders had discussed Iran's nuclear programme, proliferation issues and the Middle East.

Analysts said the gesture by Mr Putin to travel to the airport – accompanied by his wife Lyudmila – may have reflected a desire to ease relations between Moscow and Washington, currently seen as at their poorest since the Soviet Union collapsed in 1991. While Moscow has opposed the Iraq war, Russian officials and commentators have not welcomed last week's Democratic victory in Congressional elections, warning it could lead to even more of what they say is an unwarranted focus on Russia's democratic record.

DOJ_NMG_0095170

The presidents "confirmed that the signing of a protocol on Russia's accession to the WTO is now being prepared for Hanoi," Alexei Gromov said, after the two men met at a Moscow airport.

Putin and Bush will meet in Hanoi at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation summit on November 18 and 19.

Democrats Blast Bush Policy On N. Korea (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration came under fierce attack yesterday from Democrats for its North Korea policy, with the incoming chairman of the House International Relations Committee saying that change is "long overdue" and that the United States should allow its chief nuclear arms negotiator to visit Pyongyang, North Korea's capital.

Meanwhile, a group of experts returning from talks with top North Korean officials offered a pessimistic report on the prospects of reaching a deal when the long-stalled six-nation talks resume later this year. North Korean officials told the experts that they would take a much tougher stance when Pyongyang returns to the negotiating table, believing it is on "equal footing" with the United States now that it has tested a nuclear weapon.

Charles L. "Jack" Pritchard, a former top State Department negotiator on North Korea, said that country's officials seem more interested in returning to the talks to make short-term gains, such as relief from a U.S. campaign to end North Korean counterfeiting of U.S. dollars or to patch up a damaged relationship with China. "They're not in this to give up their nuclear weapons," said Pritchard, now president of the Korean Economic Institute.

North Korea conducted its first nuclear test Oct. 9, after refusing to return to the talks for nearly a year. The U.N. Security Council quickly condemned the test and imposed sanctions, and on Oct. 31 Pyongyang announced that it would return to the talks after the United States agreed to address its concerns about the financial crackdown.

At a hearing yesterday on the administration's preparation for the talks, Rep. Tom Lantos (D-Calif.) faulted the administration's exclusive reliance on the six-nation negotiating framework, arguing that substantial bilateral contacts are necessary to reach any deal.

China, Japan, Russia and South Korea also participate in the talks, a format that some experts have said is cumbersome for difficult negotiations.

In the aftermath of the test, "it is now abundantly clear to the world that our current policies have failed," said Lantos, who will wield the gavel when the new Congress convenes in January. "I look forward to leading the efforts in Congress to keep North Korea on the front burner and to pushing the administration to resolve the feuds within its own ranks which have hobbled North Korea policy."

Lantos charged that Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill has been undercut in his diplomacy by "hard-liners lodged in the office of the Vice President and the Defense Department." Hill had lobbied to travel to Pyongyang to meet with North Korean officials shortly after North Korea agreed in principle in September 2005 to dismantle its nuclear programs. But the trip never took place, and then the talks stalled over the Treasury Department action.

"Ambassador Hill must also make a stopover in Pyongyang on his way back from the six-party talks, not to negotiate a new and separate deal, but rather to demonstrate to Pyongyang our peaceful intent," Lantos said. "The administration's refusal to allow visits by American diplomats to North Korea must end, and it must end now."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns noted that U.S. officials, including Hill, have met bilaterally with North Korean officials in Beijing and New York. "Some people are insisting that the United States should negotiate with North Korea solely on a bilateral basis," he said. "But the North Korean problem, especially its pursuit of nuclear weapons, is a regional problem, it's not just a bilateral issue, because this problem poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

Lantos won support for his position from several other Democrats, as well as from Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who lost his reelection bid.

DOJ_NMG_0095171

"I believe you set up a bit of a straw-man argument," Leach told Burns. "I know of no serious commentator or observer of North Korea that favors solely bilateral discussions, which is the way you phrased it." But, he said, the problem with the administration's approach is that Hill can meet only with North Korean diplomats who are not really the decision-makers.

Democrats Urge N. Korea Nuclear Talks (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, November 16, 2006

Congressional Democrats, demanding a bold new approach to end a diplomatic standoff, urged the Bush administration on Wednesday to send the top U.S. negotiator to North Korea and press for an end to its nuclear weapons program.

Such a mission by Christopher Hill would demonstrate "our peaceful intent," said California Rep. Tom Lantos, the top Democrat on the House International Relations Committee. Panel members quizzed Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns about the so-far futile effort to halt North Korea's nuclear weapons and missiles programs.

Talks involving the U.S., North Korea, South Korea, China, Japan and Russia are expected to resume next month after a suspension of more than a year. Burns said it was not possible yet to announce a precise date.

The U.S. has held sporadic, occasional talks with North Korea in New York and in Beijing. But the administration insists on a six-nation negotiations format in an effort to intensify pressure on the insular communist government.

"The North Korean problem is a regional problem," Burns said. "It poses a threat to all of its neighbors."

But Lantos, the prospective new chairman of the committee when the Democrats take control of Congress in January, said, "the administration's refusal to permit visits (by U.S. diplomats) to North Korea must end and must end now."

Supported by several Democrats on the committee and one Republican, Rep. Jim Leach of Iowa, Lantos said, "The White House must try a new and bold approach to the vexing North Korean problem."

"I don't understand why it is in the United States' interest to keep them isolated," Leach said.

On the Democratic side, Rep. Brad Sherman of California proposed that the United States offer North Korea a nonaggression pact as part of a deal in which the North Koreans permanently and verifiably give up their nuclear weapons.

Rep. Gary Ackerman, D-N.Y., accused the administration of "dithering" and said the U.S. was placing too much reliance on China to stop North Korea's programs. China played a leading diplomatic role in persuading North Korea to end its boycott of negotiations.

GOP Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida cautioned against concessions or any acts of "appeasement."

Meanwhile, an American nuclear scientist who toured North Korea this month said he believed the North had enough fuel for as many as nine nuclear weapons and the capacity to make about one bomb's worth of fuel a year.

Siegfried Hecker, a former director of the Los Alamos Nuclear Laboratory, met with chief North Korean nuclear scientists during his Oct. 31-Nov. 4 visit. Hecker said that while he learned no technical details about the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test, officials indicated the test was "fully successful."

He said he and the small group of former U.S. officials who made the trip noticed a palpable sense of national pride about the test among the North Koreans they met.

Hecker based his observations on meetings with the director of the North's five-megawatt Yongbyon nuclear facility and with nuclear specialists in China. He said the North Korean nuclear test was most likely "at least partially successful," but the country probably was "still a long way from having a missile-capable nuclear design."

Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown In NKorea Allusion (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has urged Asia-Pacific nations to crack down on illicit financial activities by "weapons proliferators", in an indirect reference to North Korea.

"Confronting the threats posed by terrorism, proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, natural disaster and pandemic disease is inextricably tied to the prosperity of the region," Rice told APEC ministers meeting in Hanoi.

"We also hope that APEC members will take all necessary actions to prevent the abuse of their financial systems by weapons proliferators."

DOJ_NMG_0095172

North Korea's nuclear ambition, put on display last month when Pyongyang carried out its first atomic bomb test, is one of the key issues on the agenda at this week's Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) gathering.

The United States is one of five nations involved in disarmament talks with North Korea. A breakthrough came in September 2005, when Pyongyang agreed to scrap its nuclear program in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees.

But the North walked out of the talks a year ago after Washington effectively froze 24 million dollars in North Korean funds by blacklisting a bank in Macau.

The United States said the funds were the suspected proceeds of counterfeiting US dollar "supernotes" and other illicit activities by the regime of Kim Jong-Il.

North Korea boycotted the six-party talks for a year in protest at Washington's freeze and a larger crackdown on accounts elsewhere in Asia.

The APEC meeting comes two weeks after North Korea agreed in secret negotiations in Beijing to return to the six-nation talks, which involve the two Koreas, China, Japan, Russia and the United States.

North Korean Officials Proud Of Their Nuclear Test, U.S. Experts Say (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - North Korean officials are proud of their country's nuclear test and are unlikely to be persuaded easily to give up their nuclear weapons, a group of Korea experts said Wednesday after a visit to the reclusive communist nation.

The experts, who visited North Korea's capital of Pyongyang from Oct. 31 to Nov. 4, just weeks after the Oct. 9 test, said they were surprised by conditions in the city, where streets were crowded with cars and, something new this year, motorcycles.

"There were also well-dressed people on the streets like I hadn't seen before," said Robert Carlin, a former U.S. intelligence analyst making his 26th visit to North Korea.

Carlin said he saw trucks laden with cabbages, new buildings going up and others freshly painted, and a well-stocked free market whose parking lot was jammed with cars.

Siegfried S. Hecker, a nuclear scientist and former director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, said he and the others met with the head of North Korea's Yongbyon nuclear center, Ri Hong Sop, but weren't allowed to visit the center. They also spoke with high-ranking officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the army and the government.

The delegation was led by John W. Lewis, a Chinese politics and North Korea expert at Stanford University.

Hecker said that North Korean officials said they remained committed to a Sept. 19, 2005, agreement with the United States that would end the nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and energy benefits. But Hecker said he concluded it would be harder now to persuade the North Koreans to do so.

Delegation member Charles L. Pritchard, the U.S. special envoy for negotiations with North Korea from 2001 to 2003, said he also believed that the North Koreans would be tougher negotiators.

"A few years ago I'd say it was possible to negotiate an end of the crisis. Now I'm not so sure," Pritchard said. The North Koreans are feeling confident and, in their words, "on an equal footing" with the United States, the former negotiator said.

The group met with Li Gun, deputy director general of the North Korean Ministry for Foreign Affairs, who said North Korea was committed to returning to six-party talks and the eventual denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula, Pritchard said.

Li also told the delegation that North Korea wouldn't use nuclear weapons first and wouldn't sell nuclear weapons and technology to any group, including al-Qaida.

But Pritchard said Li made clear that North Korea had short-term expectations for the upcoming talks with the United States and the four other nations, which North Korea agreed to on Oct. 31.

Li also said that China will unfreeze North Korean assets in a Macau bank and that the United States won't object as a condition of the talks, Pritchard said.

The U.S. government has claimed that North Korea was using Banco Delta Asia to launder illegal profits from drug trafficking, counterfeiting and cigarette smuggling, and it has put pressure on the bank to stop doing business with North Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0095173

Li said there had to be progress on Banco Delta Asia first, and he indicated that North Korea next would insist on dropping the sanctions contained in a U.N. Security Council resolution.

U.S. officials have said that the U.N. sanctions should be implemented but that they'll discuss the Macau bank issue at the talks. The six-party talks also include China, South Korea, Russia and Japan.

Pritchard said Li quoted President Reagan on the need to "trust but verify." Li acknowledged that verification would be necessary if North Korea agrees to suspend its nuclear programs, but insisted that it also would be necessary to verify that it receives benefits at each step.

Pritchard said the group immediately e-mailed a report to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. The Bush administration didn't sanction the trip and hasn't responded, he said.

Hecker suggested in a written report that the United States must do more to address North Korea's security concerns.

He also said that North Korean officials had "little appreciation of the issues of safety and security related to having a nuclear arsenal." North Korea probably has enough plutonium for nine nuclear weapons and can produce enough for one per year over the next few years, he said.

Ri and other officials didn't provide details about the Oct. 9 test, but Chinese nuclear experts put it at about 1 kiloton, which they described as "successful but not perfect," Hecker said.

Many things can go wrong in a test, but a 1-kiloton test isn't a fizzle, as some U.S. officials have suggested, Hecker said. The U.S. atomic bomb dropped on Nagasaki, Japan, produced a 21-kiloton blast.

"A 1-kiloton explosion in Manhattan would be a catastrophe," Hecker said.

US Senator Seeks 10 Billion Dollars For North Korean Human Crisis (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

A bill was introduced in the US Senate calling for the establishment of a 10 billion dollar fund to prepare for any humanitarian crisis in nuclear-armed North Korea.

Bill Frist, the outgoing majority leader in the Senate who introduced the bill, said President George W. Bush should have "all necessary tools at his disposal to deal with foreseeable humanitarian contingencies on and around the Korean Peninsula.

"To make clear our intentions, and to establish a framework for providing assistance in these circumstances, my bill authorizes the creation of a 10 billion dollar 'North Korea Refugee Relief and Reconstruction Fund'", he said.

The proposed legislation was to be "a sign of hope to the people of North Korea, who have suffered for six decades under one of the cruelest regimes the world has ever known," said the retiring senator from Bush's Republican party.

"To the people of North Korea, I say 'we have not forgotten you, and we stand ready to help.'"

The hardline North Korean communist regime led by Kim Jong-Il recently tested a nuclear weapon and launched missiles in defiance of the international community. Human rights watchers have warned that the North Korean people remain vulnerable under the reclusive regime.

Kim's regime allowed as many as one million, and possibly many more, of its own people to die during the famine in the 1990s, according to a report last month commissioned by former Czech president Vaclav Havel, ex-Norwegian prime minister Kjell Bondevik and US Nobel Peace Prize laureate Elie Wiesel.

It said hunger and starvation remained a "persistent" problem and added that over 37 percent of children in North Korea were "chronically malnourished."

North Korea imprisons more than 200,000 people in its modern-day gulag, and it is estimated that more than 400,000 have died in that system over 30 years, the report said.

Frist said he introduced the bill "because of the critical threat posed to international peace and security by the hereditary dictatorship in North Korea."

"There is no doubt in my mind that in the event of massive refugee flows out of North Korea, or either the reunification of North Korea with South Korea or the emergence of a new, more benign regime in North Korea, the United States will step forward to help," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095174

With only a brief period left for Congressional debates and voting, Frist's office does not expect the bill to be approved this year.

The new year will see the Democrats in control of both chambers of Congress after they routed the Republicans in legislative elections last week.

"There would probably not be a vote on the bill in the near future but the Senator introduced it because it was something he thought was important -- to have the resources in place when needed," his spokeswoman Carolyn Weyforth told AFP.

Frist said that to make sure the United States could provide aid immediately to refugees already coming out of North Korea, the bill authorized the president to draw down up to one billion dollars from any government agency.

White House Hunts For Way Into Iran Talks (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

Rarely has the Bush administration seemed so confused and defensive about its policy of seeking to isolate Iran as it responds to mounting public and international pressure to find a way out of Iraq, even if that involves making a U-turn and engaging Tehran.

On Monday, in reply to a question about the US opening a dialogue with Iran over Iraq, the president made a direct link with the nuclear issue, demanding that Tehran first verifiably suspend its uranium enrichment programme.

Since then senior officials have had to row back from those comments on the nuclear link. A US offer, extended earlier this year to Tehran to discuss Iraq, can be "reactivated", officials said. "If, in the future, we want to avail ourselves of that channel, then it certainly is a possibility," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said. But he also added that he did not think it was under consideration.

However, David Satterfield, the state department co-ordinator for Iraq, contradicted this assertion. He told a Senate committee on Thursday that the US was reviewing the timing of a "direct dialogue" with Iran on the subject of Iraq. "We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq," he said.

Analysts say that as the US scrambles to find an honourable exit from Iraq, opening a new channel to Iran is very much under consideration. Bringing Iran and Syria into the equation is expected to form one of the main proposals of the Iraq Study Group led by former secretary of state James Baker and former Democratic congressman Lee Hamilton.

The imminent departure of Donald Rumsfeld as defence secretary also removes one of the main forces opposed to engagement with Iran. His nominated successor, Robert Gates, is closer to the Baker school of foreign policy "realists" and two years ago co-authored a think-tank report that recommended the US "deal with the current regime rather than wait for it to fall".

"The idea of talking to Iran is now the consensus position," commented Ray Takeyh, an analyst with the Council on Foreign Relations think-tank who also took part in the 2004 report on Iran. "The question is not whether to talk to Iran but how and what to talk about."

Although the US military budget is several times bigger than Iran's entire economic output, Mr Takeyh says the US will find itself negotiating from a position of weakness. "This has got to be the most incompetent administration in history," he said.

James Jeffrey, a senior state department official, echoed the concern about negotiating from a position of weakness and admitted that the US had missed opportunities in the past to deal with Iran. The most recent occasion was in the spring of 2003 when Iran – rocked by the quick defeat of the Iraqi military and the fall of Baghdad – offered a broad dialogue with the US. It was quickly rebuffed.

Now there was a danger, Mr Jeffrey said, that showing a willingness to talk would lead certain regimes – meaning Iran and Syria – to "conclude that, ah-ha, this is out of weakness. 'If these guys were strong, they wouldn't want to talk to us. Because they are weak, we need to simply expand our demands'."

Trita Parsi, an analyst who advocates engagement, says the US cannot conceal its weakness but has limited alternatives. He says that for Iran to be drawn into a dialogue it needs a clear indication that the US is looking to discuss all issues and address a strategic transformation of the relationship, not just a tactical quick fix of the Iraq crisis.

DOJ_NMG_0095175

Iran is wary of its last experience of co-operating with the US, when it helped oust the Taliban from Afghanistan in 2001 and install the Karzai government, only to be denounced by Mr Bush weeks later as a member of the "axis of evil" in a State of the Union address that amounted to a call for regime change.

A three-hour meeting last month between Mr Baker and Javad Zarif, Iranian envoy to the UN, was seen as helpful by both sides, says Mr Parsi. Mr Baker was told that Iran would consider helping the US in Iraq if "Washington first changed its attitude towards Iran" – a euphemism for the Bush administration's unwillingness to deal with Iran in a strategic manner.

As Pressure For Talks Grows, Iran And Syria Gain Leverage (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The White House is under growing pressure to talk to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, but mounting violence in Iraq and the Bush administration's political woes give the negotiating edge to Tehran and Damascus and complicate any U.S. outreach, experts say.

The idea of talks is widely expected to be on the list of proposals that will come out of the Iraq Study Group report next month, because co-chairman and former secretary of state James A. Baker III and other members back engaging enemies as well as allies. British Prime Minister Tony Blair this week endorsed talking with Tehran and Damascus, with caveats. The CIA director and the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency said yesterday that talks could help. And an array of experts has encouraged the administration to reach out to the countries that have meddled most in Iraq.

But the Bush administration is already questioning the idea, and even supporters admit that full cooperation by both Iran and Syria may have little impact on the many-sided insurgency. Neither country has much sway over Iraq's Sunnis or the al-Qaeda branch in Iraq, as both are ruled by Shiites or Shiite offshoots.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, traveling yesterday to a conference in Vietnam, said that she is prepared to talk to "anybody, anywhere, anytime" under circumstances in which she believed progress was really possible. "I'm not afraid to talk to anyone," she told reporters. But she dismissed the idea that diplomacy offers any "magic bullets" for Iraq.

The United States has made multiple overtures to Tehran, particularly related to its controversial nuclear program. A year ago, Rice told Congress that Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq, had been empowered to talk to his Iranian counterpart in Baghdad on Iraq.

"There's no lack of opportunity to talk to the Iranians," she told reporters. "The question is: Is there anything about Iranian behavior that suggests that they are prepared to contribute to stability in Iraq? And I have to say that at this point I don't see it."

Syria has given no indication that it is willing to be a stabilizing force anywhere in the region, including in Iraq, Lebanon and the Arab-Israeli dispute, she added. President Bashar al-Assad's government has "aligned itself with the forces of extremism," she said.

In a briefing Wednesday aboard Air Force One en route to Singapore, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley all but rejected the idea. "What we need is less talk and more action by Iran," he said.

But experts on both sides of the Iraq debate argue that after decades of tension with both countries, Iran and Syria now have a common interest with the United States in preventing further turmoil in Iraq. "We've gone past the point of being desirable. It's absolutely necessary to talk to them," said Joseph Cirincione, vice president of the Center for American Progress.

Iran fears the spillover of Iraq's political problems on its own large Kurdish, Sunni and Arab minorities in the event of a full-scale civil war. It also was burdened with a refugee problem as more than 2 million people fled wars in neighboring Iraq and Afghanistan.

Syria is also looking for a way out of its isolation. And it fears that Kurdish separatism in Iraq would influence its own restive Kurdish population, said Theodore H. Kattouf, former U.S. ambassador to Syria.

"They have some hardheaded reasons to want to coordinate with us to make sure that our withdrawal, which they want, is not precipitous," said Geoffrey Kemp, a Reagan administration National Security Council staffer.

Yet prospects of U.S. success are limited, analysts warn. At the negotiating table, Iran and Syria would for the first time hold the trump cards after years of public rebukes and punitive sanctions, and would see any overture by Washington as a win for them. The administration could have achieved far more if it had talked to both countries from a position of strength on the eve of war in 2003 or last year, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0095176

"Neither Iran nor Syria will do a favor for the U.S. without wanting something back -- and what both countries want are things that the U.S. is not willing to give them," said Shaul Bakhash, a George Mason University expert on Iran.

Cooperating with the United States also carries dangers. "Syria and Iran both believe that the U.S. is tilting at windmills and will not lend their leverage to a venture which they see as doomed," said Joshua Landis, a University of Oklahoma specialist who recently spent a year as a Fulbright scholar in Damascus.

Both countries have limited ability to solve the complicated morass of problems in Iraq. In testimony yesterday before the Senate Armed Services Committee, the CIA director, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, said Iran and Syria have varying degrees of influence on Iraq.

"Clearly, both governments could do more. If our dialogue with them could convince them to do more, that their interests are not served by a fracturing of Iraq, then I would say that might be useful," Hayden said.

But on the biggest issue of preventing full-scale civil war, Iran may not be able to rein in Iraq's Shiite militias. "Lots of people in the Shiite community are happy to take Iranian money and arms but they are not willing to take Iranian orders," said Patrick Clawson of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Abba Olmert (WSJ)

By Michael B. Oren

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

"Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." With these words, Lyndon B. Johnson greeted Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban at the White House on May 26, 1967. The Middle East was in the throes of an escalating crisis. Gamal Abdul Nasser had evicted U.N. peacekeepers from Egypt's border with Israel, blockaded the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping, and called on the Arab world to "throw the Jews into the sea." Israel had no intention of waiting to see if Nasser would carry out his pledge, or of keeping its troops on the permanent state of alert that was bankrupting the country. And so the Israeli government sent its foreign minister to seek Johnson's approval for mounting a pre-emptive strike. But LBJ only disappointed Eban. Though hostile to Nasser and firmly supportive of Israel, the president was hamstrung by America's imbroglio in Vietnam and by the drop in his domestic support. The most he offered the Israelis was Washington's help in mobilizing international action against Egypt. Beyond that, there was only that repeated, cryptic phrase, "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone."

Perhaps a similar message was imparted by George W. Bush in his meeting earlier this week with Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Much like 1967, Israel faces a Middle Eastern leader who has repeatedly sworn to wipe it off the map, and to that end is assiduously trying to acquire nuclear weapons. Like Nasser, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad can cripple Israel economically by keeping it in a state of alert, driving away foreign investment and tourism. In the absence of international commitment to thwart Iran's nuclear plans, Israel has no choice but to consider striking pre-emptively. Doing so, however, requires explicit U.S. support, or at the very least, an indication that the U.S. will not oppose such action. Like Eban 40 years earlier, Mr. Olmert came to Washington in search of a green light.

But the U.S. is hardly in the position to sanction an Israeli attack. Bogged down in Iraq and hemorrhaging political capital at home, Mr. Bush resembles Johnson in his inability to approve risky military initiatives. As inimical to Mr. Ahmadinejad as his predecessor was to Nasser, and at least as sympathetic to the Jewish state, Mr. Bush is nevertheless unable to undertake a unilateral attack against Iran or even to endorse an Israeli one.

This was bad news for Mr. Olmert. The Israeli prime minister hoped to secure a hard-and-fast timetable for interdicting Iran's nuclear program first by diplomacy and then, if that failed, by force. Instead, he heard that the U.S. would only support measures to isolate Iran economically and balked at the use of bombs. Though he and his administration have routinely stated a determination to prevent Iran from obtaining strategic capabilities, Mr. Bush, in the aftermath of his party's electoral defeats, avoided all public mention of armed power as a means of achieving that goal.

The only option for the U.S., then, is international sanctions. These, however, have proven singularly inadequate in quashing the nuclear aspirations of North Korea -- a country far more financially fragile than Iran -- and lack the vital support of Russia, China and France. Iran has also threatened to retaliate for sanctions by cutting back oil production and increasing its support for terror.

DOJ_NMG_0095177

Back in 1967, Johnson also tried to apply international pressure on Egypt. He planned to issue a multilateral declaration condemning the closure of Tiran and to create a convoy of ships from 26 nations to physically challenge the blockade. But fearing for their oil supplies, European countries refused to cooperate with Johnson's démarche, while Egypt threatened violence against any attempt to reopen the straits. In the end, only four countries were willing to sign the declaration and only two volunteered ships for the convoy.

Mr. Bush is unlikely to be more successful than Johnson in marshalling international strictures against a defiant Middle Eastern regime. Nor was Mr. Olmert liable to extract from Mr. Bush more concrete backing for pre-emptive action than Eban did from LBJ. At most, Mr. Bush could have signaled his sympathy for Israel's plight and for the steps it must take to ensure its survival. The light Mr. Olmert received in Washington was probably not green, but neither was it flashing red.

Eban left the White House disappointed and confused. Neither he nor the Israeli government could decipher the meaning of the message "Israel will not be alone unless it decides to go it alone." Was the president opposed to an assault against Egypt, as some of the ministers believed, or was he indicating his willingness to look the other way while Israel attacked? Ultimately, Israeli leaders concluded that, while the U.S. might condemn the action, it would probably do nothing to stop it. Johnson, for his part, understood that the Israelis had lost faith in international diplomacy and would interpret his words as a go. "They're going to hit," the president sighed, "and there's nothing we can do about it."

Lyndon Johnson indeed did little to prevent Israel from launching its surprise attack against Egypt on June 5 or, after Jordan and Syria joined the war, from advancing into the West Bank and the Golan Heights. The Six-Day War was a seismic event that profoundly altered the Middle East, with reverberations that continue to convulse the region. An Israeli strike at Iran's nuclear facilities could well have a similar impact, especially as Mr. Ahmadinejad and the mullahs are certain to react violently.

Mr. Olmert and his government must consider such consequences as they decide on Israel's next moves. The ramifications of that decision are certain to affect America as well. Many Arabs to this day believe that the U.S. was complicit in the Six-Day War, and even that American pilots flew Israeli planes. Such rumors will again be rife if Israel attacks Iran, and especially if Israeli jets pass through Iraq's American-controlled airspace. Israel may indeed act alone, but in the minds of a great many people in the Middle East, the U.S. acts with it.

Mr. Oren, a senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, is author of "Power, Faith, and Fantasy: America in the Middle East, 1776 to the Present," forthcoming from W.W. Norton.

Six Major Powers Fail To Bread Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions (AFP)

AFP, November 16, 2006

Six major UN powers failed to break the deadlock in their bid to agree on a package of targeted sanctions against Iran over its refusal to suspend sensitive nuclear fuel work.

"We did not make any progress today," US Ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton told reporters after envoys of the six powers wound up their sixth informal session in three weeks on a European draft resolution urging nuclear and ballistic missile-related sanctions against Iran.

The meeting at France's UN mission in New York was attended by ambassadors from Germany and the UN Security Council's permanent members -- Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

"We'll meet again in the near future," said Bolton, without saying exactly when.

He added that the sanctions issue may also be discussed at the foreign minister level on the margins of the weekend meeting of the Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation group in Hanoi.

Western countries suspects Iran is covertly seeking to build nuclear weapons.

Tehran, which insists that its nuclear program is peaceful, has rejected UN demands that it halt uranium enrichment, a process that can produce fuel for electricity generation but can also be used to produce the raw material for a nuclear warhead.

The draft put forward by Britain, France and Germany also includes travel bans and financial restrictions on Iranian scientists working on the nuclear and missile programs.

DOJ_NMG_0095178

Russia and China, which both maintain close energy and trade ties with Tehran, want to drastically reduce the scope of the sanctions while the US side is pushing for even tougher sanctions.

Iran Dismisses U.N. Report On Uranium (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, November 16, 2006

Iran on Wednesday dismissed a U.N. report that inspectors found new traces of enriched uranium and plutonium at a nuclear waste facility, saying it had already explained that discovery.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad insisted the West will gradually back down in its standoff with Iran and eventually accept its nuclear program.

"While the West tries to thwart the progress of our nation, time is on our side," Ahmadinejad told a crowd in Sanandaj, the capital city of Iran's Kurdistan province. "They would have to take one step back with every passing day and approve the right of the Iranian people."

Oil-rich Iran has claimed it has a right to a nuclear program it says is aimed at producing energy. But the United States suspects Tehran has ambitions to make nuclear weapons.

Ahmadinejad's comments came a day after an International Atomic Energy Agency report said its experts have found unexplained plutonium and highly enriched uranium traces in a nuclear waste facility in Iran. Both materials can be used in building a nuclear warhead, though one U.N. official said the uranium was not enriched to weapons-grade level.

Alaeddin Boroujerdi, head of the parliamentary committee on National Security and Foreign Policy, called the report "an old story."

"This is an old story and contains no new points," Boroujerdi told the official Islamic Republic News Agency on Wednesday. "Iran has submitted a comprehensive report on the issue to the IAEA. It will be convincing."

He did not elaborate on the source of the traces. Iran has said that previous traces of enriched uranium found by inspectors came from equipment that it bought from abroad without knowing of the contamination.

"What was mentioned in (IAEA chief Mohamed) ElBaradei's report are issues that Iran has already answered many times. Tehran, based on the safeguards, has fully cooperated with the IAEA," the official Islamic Republic News Agency quoted Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammed Ali Hosseini as saying.

A senior U.N. official who was familiar with the report cautioned against reading too much into the new findings, saying Iran had explained both and they could plausibly be classified as byproducts of peaceful nuclear activities.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the report publicly, said that while the uranium traces were enriched to a higher level than needed to generate power, they were below weapons-grade.

The report, prepared for next week's meeting of the 35-nation IAEA, also faulted Tehran for not cooperating with the agency's attempts to investigate suspicious aspects of Iran's nuclear program that have led to fears it might be interested in developing nuclear arms.

The U.S. and its European allies are currently negotiating with Russia and China over a draft U.N. Security Council resolution that would penalize Iran for its refusal to respect an Aug. 31 deadline for halting uranium enrichment.

Russia and China have extensive trade with Iran and are rejecting the harsh sanctions that the Western allies want to impose.

The five veto-wielding Security Council members — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Germany have now held six rounds of closed-door talks.

John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, said Wednesday there were still "wide gaps" between the Russians and Europeans. Asked whether there had been any progress since the talks began, Bolton said, "Well, we didn't make any progress today — let's leave it at that."

President Bush, eager for Russian help in ongoing nuclear disputes with North Korea and Iran, visited President Vladimir Putin Wednesday in Moscow at an airport stopover on his way to Asia.

DOJ_NMG_0095179

U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley played down differences between Washington and Moscow, saying negotiations on U.N. resolutions are "a little bit like sausage making."

"It's not pretty and a lot of it spills out to the public, but I think the international community has held together on this issue and I think it will again," he said.

___

Associated Press writers Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations and Jennifer Loven in Moscow contributed to this report.

China Could Find Congress A Chillier Place (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- She scuffled with police on Tiananmen Square, protested the visits of Chinese leaders to the White House, and calls the U.S. trade relationship with China "a disaster."

When Democratic Rep. Nancy Pelosi becomes House speaker in January, her views on China could set the tone for a new Congress looking to get tough on Beijing. Mrs. Pelosi's criticisms include human-rights abuses and unfair trade practices, as well as allegations that China is manipulating its currency and seeking technologies to undermine U.S. national security.

Just how much Mrs. Pelosi and other top Democrats will focus on China -- and how much influence they will have on China policy -- is hard to predict. But apprehensions run high in Beijing and Washington that a Pelosi-led, Democrat-controlled House could seize on China trade and security issues to bash President Bush, much as congressional Republicans did in the final years of the Clinton administration.

"There is definitely going to be a shift" in the House, said Republican Rep. Mark Kirk of Illinois, co-chair of the bipartisan, pro-engagement, U.S.-China Working Group in the House. "The question is whether the shift will be effectively blocked by the Senate and the White House."

China's ambassador to Washington, Zhou Wenzhong, declined to comment on Mrs. Pelosi, and said that "mainstream Democrats basically support the current policy." Still, he expressed concern that the new Congress could be "more concerned about trade and about human-rights issues." Administration officials say that in private conversations, Chinese diplomats have expressed deeper worries about the new Congress than their ambassador has in public remarks.

The direction the Democrats take on China will depend on the strength of the economy before the 2008 presidential election and the party's overall strategy leading up to 2008. Some Democrats say the party may not need to make President Bush's China policy a key issue over the next two years, with Mr. Bush already beleaguered by the war in Iraq and rising nuclear threats in Iran and North Korea.

The Bush administration hasn't taken a hard-line approach toward China, with Beijing a pivotal player on global-security issues of concern to the U.S. The two countries have also strengthened ties and exchanges in many other areas, such as law enforcement and civil-service training.

"Whenever we have split government, Congress sees that as an opening to attack the administration's China policy," said Jeffrey Bader, a former Clinton official on China who now heads the Brookings Institution's Thornton China Center.

For months, Mrs. Pelosi has joined top Republican lawmakers and Democrats, including New York Rep. Charles Rangel, next chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, in calling on the Bush administration to crack down on China's trade practices through the World Trade Organization.

Mrs. Pelosi and a bipartisan cadre of lawmakers have urged the administration to put more pressure on China to further loosen its currency controls and take action against rampant piracy of U.S. goods. Critics say Beijing has kept the yuan artificially low, making its exports cheaper and fueling a huge trade surplus with the U.S. She has urged the U.S. to file a WTO case on that issue, too.

Other Democrats said they plan to push hard on Chinese labor standards, and have hinted that future trade restrictions could hinge on findings of unfair labor practices in China. Both Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Rangel have argued that China's holdings of U.S. Treasury bills, valued at $339 billion as of August, pose a threat to U.S. national security.

DOJ_NMG_0095180

Speaking after last week's midterm elections, which put both houses of Congress under Democratic control, Mr. Rangel said it might be hard to pursue China on trade violations because of its huge financial leverage over the U.S. "But at least we can be angry ... and try to protect American industry," he said.

Mr. Rangel said he intends to defer to the administration on China policy, at least to start, and wants to work alongside Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and others, "rather than Congress mandating that they do something."

Mrs. Pelosi's aides said her new prominence won't change her views on China, particularly when it comes to the country's human-rights abuses and lack of religious freedom. But they said she will have a lot on her plate, and won't try to dictate the direction of House policy on China at the committee level. Mrs. Pelosi declined to comment.

The most important change, Pelosi aides said, is that she will allow tough China legislation to come to a full vote in the House, instead of keeping bills bottled up in committee, as many previous speakers have.

Mrs. Pelosi's district includes San Francisco's Chinatown, which has traditionally taken an anti-Beijing stance.

After Beijing crushed the democracy protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989, Mrs. Pelosi battled the first Bush administration and helped to protect Chinese students in the U.S. She also worked to make preferential trade benefits to China conditional on its showing "significant progress" on human rights.

In September 1991, Chinese police stopped Mrs. Pelosi and two other U.S. lawmakers on Tiananmen Square after they unfurled a pro-democracy banner. The Chinese foreign ministry called the move "a premeditated, anti-Chinese farce."

Mrs. Pelosi, along with several prominent House Republicans, continued to push for changes in China policy during the Clinton administration. In 1997, as Mr. Clinton was greeting Chinese leader Jiang Zemin at the White House, Mrs. Pelosi, at a nearby rally, denounced the visit.

In March, as the White House prepared to welcome Chinese President Hu Jintao, Mrs. Pelosi, Mr. Rangel and 14 other Democrats wrote to Mr. Bush, urging the U.S. to file more cases against China and other countries within the WTO. In an opinion piece published in the Los Angeles Times the day Mr. Hu arrived, Mrs. Pelosi wrote: "The American people want the administration to show resolve in standing up to Beijing, to demonstrate that we believe that the Chinese people deserve freedom."

Myron Brilliant, head of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's Asia division, said Democrats harbor "a lot of displeasure at the lack of follow-through in China on the trade front." He said the chamber is taking a "wait-and-see attitude" toward the next Congress, but would mobilize with other business groups if the House tries to address China issues through legislation.

Using "unilateral swords are not actions that we can support," he said.

Write to Neil King Jr. at neil.king@wsj.com1

Palestinian Rocket Fire Kills Israeli Woman (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

JERUSALEM, Nov. 15 -- An Israeli woman was killed Wednesday in a Palestinian rocket strike on the town of Sderot, prompting some Israeli lawmakers to demand a sharp military response in an effort to end such attacks from the Gaza Strip.

The death of Faina Slotzker, 57, was the first fatality inside Israel in a Palestinian rocket strike since July 2005. It brought competing assertions of responsibility from the Hamas and Islamic Jihad movements, both of which said the attack on a residential neighborhood was retaliation for Israeli shelling last week that killed 20 Palestinian civilians in the Gaza town of Beit Hanoun.

At least nine rockets landed Wednesday in Israel, including four in the city of Ashkelon north of Gaza. Two Israelis were reported seriously wounded by the rockets: a 17-year-old boy and a 24-year-old man identified as a bodyguard of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, who lives in Sderot. Doctors at Barzilai Hospital in Ashkelon said the man's legs had to be amputated.

Peretz, under mounting pressure to end rocket fire from Gaza that has menaced Israeli border cities for years, pledged that those responsible would "pay a heavy price." Some lawmakers in Jerusalem demanded swift retaliation to deter Palestinians from future strikes.

DOJ_NMG_0095181

"Israel will pay a heavier price if it will not operate immediately" in Gaza, Danny Naveh, a member of the Likud Party, said in parliament. Echoing warnings of other lawmakers that Israel's frontline towns were being abandoned by the military, Naveh said, "Any day that passes without a large-scale operation creates the feeling that the fate of Sderot is not that of Tel Aviv," Israel's largest city.

Slotzker was the seventh person killed by Palestinian rocket strikes inside Israel since such attacks began in 2000, at the start of the most recent Palestinian uprising. The majority of the victims lived in Sderot, a town of 20,000 that sits only a few miles east of the Gaza border. In addition, a Bedouin shepherd and his 17-year-old son were killed in March when they detonated an unexploded rocket in a field near Sderot.

Hundreds of the crude rockets, known as Qassams, have been fired into Israel over the last six years. Launched from makeshift tripods, the rockets are highly inaccurate and pack little explosive force, although they have damaged schools, public buildings and homes in border towns.

Israel withdrew its settlers and soldiers from Gaza 14 months ago, but the army has pushed back into the strip several times since June 25, when gunmen, some of whom belonged to Hamas's military wing, captured an Israeli corporal. The army has fired more than 10,000 artillery shells toward Qassam launch sites in Gaza since the withdrawal, leading to what until recently had been a steady decline in the number of rockets landing in Israel.

In recent weeks, Israeli officials have signaled that a large operation inside Gaza might be necessary to end the rocket attacks and weapons smuggling through tunnels along the strip's southern border with Egypt.

Briefing foreign journalists earlier this week, an Israeli military official said that "tons" of explosives have entered Gaza through the tunnels since the Israeli withdrawal, including propellants the official said were used to magnify the rockets' blast and range. He singled out Hamas, now running the Palestinian Authority, as "a growing military threat to Israel."

The warning came after weeks of stepped-up Israeli military operations in the strip that failed to stop the attacks and inflamed the passions of residents of Gaza's border towns and the armed groups at war with the Jewish state. An intensive six-day operation inside Beit Hanoun killed more than 60 Palestinians, just over half of them gunmen. One Israeli soldier also was killed.

Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel -- Rockets fired from the Gaza Strip into the town of Sderot yesterday killed an Israeli woman, critically injured two persons and narrowly missed the home of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, raising pressure on the government to order the army back across the border.

Israeli warplanes raided the Gaza Strip overnight, hours after the Palestinian rocket attack.

The retaliatory attack followed a promise by Mr. Peretz to hit back and a warning that militants would "pay a heavy price."

Fatima Slutsker, a 57-year-old mother of two, died of wounds sustained when the rocket struck early yesterday in a street in the town of Sderot, three miles north of Gaza, police and medics said.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was in Los Angeles for meetings with Jewish community leaders, ordered the army to continue its lethal four-month offensive in the coastal strip after the death.

"Olmert has been updated and spoke on the phone with the defense minister and instructed him to continue to act against Qassam rocket fire and infrastructure," Mr. Olmert's spokeswoman, Miri Eisin, told reporters in Los Angeles.

The death of the Sderot woman was the first fatality caused by one of the crude Qassam rockets in more than a year, and it highlighted the limited effectiveness of a recent weeklong offensive against Palestinian militants holed up in the northern Gaza village of Beit Hanoun.

It also served as a reminder that Palestinian militants, like Hezbollah, are able to paralyze an Israeli city -- however small and nonstrategic. Members of Mr. Olmert's Cabinet said not enough is being done to shut down the rocket attacks.

"The military's activities aren't satisfactory," said Public Security Minister Avi Dichter. The Associated Press quoted him as saying Israel must find a way to halt the attacks, "whether that means a ground operation, an air operation or other special operations."

DOJ_NMG_0095182

Israeli officials have said the army should retake the Philadelphi corridor along Gaza's border with Egypt to halt weapons smuggling.

Israeli intelligence officers say the corridor has been used by Palestinian militants to bring in anti-tank missiles and material for unmanned attack drones -- equipment that will make Israelis "miss" the days of the Qassams, said Sderot Mayor Eli Moyal.

"From day to day, the firing is becoming more precise, more fatal and more dangerous," wrote Ron Ben-Yishai, a veteran security-affairs commentator writing on a Web site linked with the Yediot Ahronot newspaper. "What the government doesn't do today will be more difficult tomorrow."

But some analysts said Israel should postpone any major military operation in Gaza to enable the formation of a more moderate Palestinian "unity government" that could improve security in Gaza and possibly restart peace negotiations.

Israel hopes that ongoing talks between Hamas and Fatah will produce a new government that would accept international demands laid out by the so-called Quartet -- the European Union, the United Nations, the U.S. and Russia -- and possibly offer a prisoner swap for Cpl. Gilad Shalit, the soldier held in captivity in Gaza since June 25.

"This is the best-case scenario," said Yossi Alpher, editor of a Middle East op-ed Web site, bitterlemons.org. "If all of that happens, then you have a good reason not to launch an offensive."

Palestinian militants rushed to take credit for the attack while residents of Sderot, located near the Negev Desert, complained that the government has failed to find a remedy for the daily trauma over the past six years.

Frustration with the government has left one community leader with a tinge of cynicism: He suggested that Sderot might have gotten more attention in Israel if residents had fled the city as did residents of northern Israel during the summer's border war with Hezbollah.

"Maybe we made a mistake" by refusing to flee, said Alon Davidi, a local activist who supports re-establishing an Israeli buffer zone in northern Gaza to push back the attackers. "Maybe this is what we need to do. People don't appreciate it when people just bite their lips and stay put."

Other residents say they are wary of proposals to reconquer Gaza. As he awaited tax officials to assess the damage from a Qassam rocket that severely damaged his home and left a small ditch in his yard, Shimon Ganam said Israel's military operations in Gaza have only triggered more rocket attacks on the city.

"The cease-fire a year and a half ago is the only thing that brought us security," he said, standing next to a house with an entire wall missing, shrapnel pockmarks, and the roof beams exposed. "Now we're being held hostage."

Hamas Claims Responsibility For Fatal Rocket Attack (CHIT)

By Joel Greenberg

Chicago Tribune, November 16, 2006

SDEROT, Israel -- Rockets fired from the Gaza Strip killed a woman and wounded several other people in this border town Wednesday, drawing warnings of a military response from Israeli leaders.

It was the first fatal Palestinian rocket strike on Israel since it withdrew from the Gaza Strip last year. The attacks have continued despite repeated army raids in an effort to halt the fire.

The armed wing of Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was retaliating for an Israeli shelling last week that killed 19 Palestinian civilians in the Gaza Strip town of Beit Hanoun. The militant Islamic Jihad group said it also had fired rockets.

The latest salvos raised the prospect of further Israeli action against militants in Gaza, with some Cabinet ministers calling for a tough response.

"Our action in Gaza will continue without interruption," said Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was meeting American Jewish leaders in Los Angeles. "We will decide on additional steps as required to continue fighting the unceasing, murderous terror from Gaza."

One rocket that hit Sderot slammed into a sidewalk about 150 yards from the house of Defense Minister Amir Peretz, who was not home. The explosion killed a passerby, Faina Slotzker, 57, and seriously wounded a security guard patrolling near the minister's residence, mangling his legs. Several people were slightly hurt.

DOJ_NMG_0095183

Galit Salim, 15, said she had been nearby on her way to school when she heard the incoming rocket alert, "Color Red," broadcast over loudspeakers a little after 8 a.m.

"I ran back home and heard a powerful boom," she said. "There was a strong smell of smoke. I went over there and saw two people without legs. The woman was frozen, she didn't respond. The other person was moving. I was shocked."

The blast shattered the windows in the home of Leah Aroch, 74, whose house is a few yards away. Shards of glass covered her living room and the pillow of her bed. "I had just gotten up after my dog rushed in when I heard the boom. The whole house was filled with smoke," she said.

Outside on the brick sidewalk, a shallow pit and a medic's surgical gloves marked the spot where the rocket had fallen.

Hours later another rocket landed in the town, seriously wounding a 17-year-old, the army said. Four more rockets landed in the coastal city of Ashkelon but caused no casualties.

Peretz met with top army officers to discuss a response.

"We will act against all those involved in firing Qassam rockets, from the heads of the terrorist organizations down to the last activist," Peretz said in a statement. "The terror organizations will pay a heavy price."

But military action has proved ineffective in halting the rocket strikes, often triggering more.

Last week's lethal shelling of Beit Hanoun, which the army said was caused by a technical malfunction, came after a weeklong raid in the town that left widespread destruction and more than 50 people dead, both militants and civilians. Yet rocket attacks continued from other areas during the incursion and resumed from around Beit Hanoun after the troops pulled out.

"People here are defending themselves," Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led Palestinian government, told Israel Radio from Gaza. "If the Israeli side is willing to stop all its actions, we have no problem with the Palestinian side also stopping."

The continuing rocket strikes, and angry criticism by Sderot residents who say they are fed up with living in fear, are likely to increase the pressure on the Israeli government to respond to the attacks, which began more than four years ago.

The crude, inaccurate rockets rarely cause casualties or damage, but previous strikes into Israel have killed six people since 2004, and the threat has terrified people in Sderot, a town of 20,000 less than a mile from the Gaza border fence.

Eli Moyal, the mayor, counseled stronger military action. "We have to create an equation that it won't be worth it for the Palestinians to shoot," he told Israel Radio.

Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, a former head of the Shin Bet security service, told Army Radio that Israel should broaden its operations to bring about a "complete halt" to rocket fire, "whether that means a ground operation, or an air operation or other special operations."

Some Sderot residents also called for harsher military measures, saying their nerves were frayed by the repeated alarms and rocket blasts.

"I fear most for my grandchildren, who wake up at night frightened by the booms," said Haya Ziegler, 58. "You live in constant fear of what will happen any minute. This is no way to live."

But Aroch, the woman living near the site of the deadly strike, said that military action had proved futile and that only talks, even with Hamas, could solve the problem.

"We have to put an end to this," she said. "We have to talk to them. We have to get to a cease-fire."

jgreenberg@tribune.com

'Human Rights' Council (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

When the U.N.'s Human Rights Council came into existence earlier this year over U.S. objections, we argued that the new organization offered no improvements over the discredited Human Rights Commission it replaced. Turns out we were wrong: The new Council has been worse.

Among the many problems with the old Commission -- other than a membership that included Zimbabwe, Sudan and Cuba -- was its obsessive focus on Israel. As legal scholar Anne Bayefsky has pointed out, in 40 years the Commission dedicated more than a quarter of its resolutions to scoring Israel while never once condemning repression in China.

DOJ_NMG_0095184

It was partly for this reason that the old Commission had to go, and why solons such as Kenneth Roth of Human Rights Watch and former Colorado Senator Tim Wirth of the U.N. Foundation urged the Bush Administration to endorse the Council, with Mr. Wirth describing it as "an important step forward in the fight for global human rights."

That was in March. The Council has since not been able to agree on a resolution condemning the government of Sudan for its atrocities in Darfur. Instead, the sole object of its censures to date has been -- drum roll, please -- Israel.

In July, the Council condemned Israeli operations in the West Bank and Gaza, which had been prompted by the killing of two Israeli soldiers in Israel and the hostage-taking of a third. In August it cited Israel for "massive violations of human-rights" in Lebanon, never mind the kidnapping of two Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah that had caused the war. Now the Council has dispatched "fact-finders" to Gaza to report on the latest fighting.

We won't hold our breath waiting for a balanced report. Meantime, perhaps Messrs. Roth and Wirth can reflect on what their credulity has achieved.

War Between Islamists, Government Is Brewing In Somalia (MCT)

By Shashank Bengali

McClatchy Newspapers, November 16, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya - Five months after Islamist militias defeated a coalition of CIA-financed warlords, Somalia appears to be sliding toward a major war that diplomats fear will draw thousands of foreign fighters to the Islamist side and spill into neighboring countries.

The rise of the Islamists, who took control of the capital, Mogadishu, in June and since have seized most of southern Somalia, already was a setback for U.S. counterterrorism efforts in the region, where al-Qaida loyalists are believed to be hiding. A full-scale war would be a major test for Bush administration policy in a place that Osama bin Laden has called a battlefield in his war against the West.

Iran, Syria, Libya, Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Djibouti and Eritrea are backing the Islamists with a dizzying influx of weapons, supplies and military personnel, according to a new United Nations report to be presented Friday to the U.N. Security Council. The support ranges from uniforms to first-aid kits to surface-to-air missiles, and, in one case, guerrilla training at a camp in Syria, the report says.

On the other side is Somalia's weak interim government, backed by U.S. ally Ethiopia, which the report says has sent thousands of troops to protect the government's hold on its only major outpost, the town of Baidoa, 150 miles northwest of Mogadishu. Uganda and Yemen are providing weapons.

A senior U.S. military officer conceded last week that the U.S. has no strategy in place should war break out and denied that the U.S. government is using Ethiopia as a proxy against the Islamists. "The U.S. position is we don't want them actively involved," said the officer, who briefed reporters in Nairobi on condition of anonymity.

But some observers said the United States hasn't discouraged Ethiopia, whose leader, Meles Zenawi, has said he won't tolerate a fundamentalist regime on his borders.

The Islamists have disavowed ties to terrorist groups, but U.S. officials accuse their supreme leader, Hassan Dahir Aweys, of having links to al-Qaida. Last week, the U.S. Embassy in Kenya, citing messages from Aweys posted on Islamist Web sites, warned of potential suicide attacks in Kenya and Ethiopia.

The new U.N. report, assembled by a panel of experts monitoring a long-ignored arms embargo, said hundreds of battle-hungry foreign jihadists, some of them trained in suicide bombing and assassination techniques, have joined the Islamists in Somalia.

The spark for a conflict could come from Ethiopia or from its enemy, Eritrea, the Islamists' chief sponsor and, the U.N. report says, a conduit for Arab support. Ethiopia and Eritrea fought a grisly war in 1998-2000 over a border that's still disputed. Eritrea is also thought to have thousands of troops in Somalia.

The findings of the U.N. report couldn't be independently verified. But virtually everyone agrees that the prospects for war are high.

DOJ_NMG_0095185

"This scenario is the one that we all feared, that the threat of war could reach these proportions," said Matt Bryden, a veteran analyst who consults for the International Crisis Group think tank. "Nothing is preventing things (from) moving in this direction."

Somalia has been a black hole for U.S. policy in Africa for more than a decade, since the deaths of 18 soldiers in the 1993 "Black Hawk Down" episode in Mogadishu precipitated the withdrawal of 25,000 U.S. troops. There's been no official U.S. presence in Somalia since.

After Sept. 11, 2001, the Bush administration saw Somalia's mix of poverty and anarchy as a potentially dangerous breeding ground for terrorists. In 2005, CIA operatives began clandestinely funneling money to Mogadishu warlords in exchange for intelligence on terror suspects - an operation that fell apart in June when the Islamists drove the hated warlords from the city.

The U.N. report says that the Islamists - officially a federation of Muslim sharia law courts - have quickly become the most powerful force in the country. They've cracked down on crime by imposing Muslim law and reopened Mogadishu's airport and seaport, boosting economic activity.

With help from Arab allies, they've organized their once-patchwork militias into a coherent fighting force, amassed a huge range of arms and military vehicles, recruited foreign fighters to their cause and begun formal training camps.

The report also details cooperation between the Islamists and the militant Lebanese group Hezbollah. About 720 Somalis fought alongside Hezbollah in this summer's war against Israel in exchange for support and training from Hezbollah patrons Syria and Iran, including guerrilla training of 200 Somalis in Syria in July, the report says.

The Islamists are "fully capable of turning Somalia into an Iraq-type situation, replete with roadside and suicide bombers, assassinations and other forms of terrorist and insurgent-type activities," the report said.

A spokesman for the Islamists, Abdirahin Ali Muudey, denied receiving aid from outside Somalia. "There is not any country (that) supports us with military equipment," he said. "All those countries, especially Syria and Iran - even our officials have never visited those countries in their life."

As face-to-face talks between the Islamists and the interim government have fallen apart, Islamist forces have moved to within 20 miles of Baidoa, where thousands of Ethiopian troops are believed to be waiting. Analysts say recent heavy rains, which have made dirt roads impassable, may be the only thing stalling the outbreak of major hostilities.

The Bush administration, led by the State Department's top Africa official, Jendayi Frazer, has been pushing for the deployment of a multinational African peacekeeping force. But the U.N. report warns that inserting foreign troops could actually provoke a military confrontation.

A war would likely involve fighting near Baidoa, as well as near the Ethiopia-Somalia border, 150 miles to Baidoa's northwest. Analysts note that much of southern Ethiopia's population is ethnic Somali, and the Islamists might be able to count on support from Somali rebel groups in Ethiopia.

There also are reports that the Islamists have been amassing anti-aircraft weaponry, an indication that they expect Ethiopia to use jet aircraft to bomb targets in Mogadishu, including the airport and seaport.

If hostilities drag on, fighting could spill over into Kenya, which has its own population of disaffected ethnic Somalis as well as Islamic extremist groups operating along the coastline. Analysts believe that a protracted conflict could draw those groups to the Islamists' side.

Over the weekend, another front appeared to open up several hundred miles north, near the key semi-autonomous region of Puntland, home to a seaport that provides the Baidoa-based government's only revenue other than foreign contributions. Islamist forces battled fighters loyal to the government and to former warlord Abdi Qaybdid, capturing a town and reportedly seizing several machine-gun-mounted pickups, known as "technicals."

"There are all these different friction points," said Mario Raffaelli, Italy's special envoy to Somalia. "Any one of them can be the starting point for a fight."

McClatchy special correspondent Mahad Elmi contributed to this report from Mogadishu, Somalia.

GAO Audit Finds Waste In Cuban Aid Program (WP)

By Karen DeYoung

DOJ_NMG_0095186

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Nearly all of the $74 million a federal agency has spent on contracts to promote democracy in Cuba over the past decade has been distributed without competitive bidding or oversight in a program that opened the door to waste and fraud, according to a report released yesterday by the Government Accountability Office.

In one of the more extreme cases of apparent abuse, the GAO said a Miami-based group used government money to purchase "a gas chainsaw, computer gaming equipment and software (including Nintendo Game Boys and Sony PlayStations), a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat, and Godiva chocolates."

The group said in its grant application to the U.S. Agency for International Development that it would use the money "to provide humanitarian assistance and information to [Cuban] dissidents and their families." The director of the grant recipient, Accion Democratica Cubana, told the Miami Herald that all the luxury items -- but not the chainsaw -- were sent to Cuba. But GAO author David Gootnick said the lack of documentation made that impossible to determine.

Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), who requested the audit along with Rep. William D. Delahunt (D-Mass.), said the lack of oversight and the failure to follow government rules led to creation of a money trough that existed largely to provide jobs and operating funds to Miami-based activists who oppose Cuba's communist government.

"I think that this administration and to some extent the last wanted simply to curry favor with the Cuban American exile community," Flake said. "It's been kind of a bipartisan thing, and you haven't had anybody really challenge it. We just kind of turned away."

Delahunt, currently the ranking minority member of the House International Relations subcommittee on oversight and investigations, said at a Capitol Hill news conference that he would hold hearings on issues raised in the audit when the new Congress convenes under Democratic leadership.

Flake and Delahunt chair the bipartisan Cuba Working Group, which has pushed unsuccessfully for changes in long-standing travel restrictions and economic sanctions -- tightened by the Bush administration -- that prohibit sending virtually anything to Cuba. "What is striking about this," Flake said of the democracy program, "is we're basically spending money to beat our own embargo."

Under Clinton-era legislation, USAID distributes money to U.S. groups to send surreptitious aid -- including food, medicine and office supplies -- to Cuba and non-monetary assistance to political dissidents and independent journalists trying to operate within the island's tightly controlled communist system. The administration has promised an additional $80 million in funding over the next two years and expanded the program to include detailed plans for a transition to democracy in Cuba. Planning has accelerated with President Fidel Castro's relinquishment of power to his brother, Raul. Although the official Cuban government position is that Fidel Castro is recovering from surgery and will return to office, U.S. intelligence officials have said they believe he has terminal cancer.

In its official response to the 59-page GAO report, USAID said that it was "taking issue" with unspecified findings but that it would "seek to improve agency performance in managing, monitoring and evaluating this assistance."

GAO auditors began with a cursory examination of the 50 grants that were made under the program from 1996 to 2005. Twenty-eight of the grants, it said, were "modified" after the fact in ways that extended agreed-upon completion dates by an average of one to three years and "increased the aggregate value of these agreements nearly eight-fold -- from about $5.9 million to nearly $50.1 million."

Auditors then conducted an in-depth examination of 10 grantees that account for more than three-quarters of the aid money. Although the GAO acknowledged the difficulty of operating effective aid programs in Cuba, it found that many of the grantees lacked records that would make it possible to determine how the aid money was used and what it accomplished.

Proposals for funding for virtually all the 10 grantees had been unsolicited and not offered for competitive bids by USAID. The government in most cases failed to comply with its rules requiring pre-award examinations, contract specificity, monitoring and formal audits at the end of a program. The GAO said it had referred three of the contracts for further investigation.

Report Cites Flaws In Cuba Aid Program (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0095187

AP, November 16, 2006

A Democratic critic of the Bush administration's Cuba policy on Wednesday promised hearings next year on a report citing weaknesses in the U.S. program promoting democracy in Cuba.

"The conclusions are disturbing to say the least," Rep. William Delahunt, D-Mass. The report by congressional investigators said the U.S. Agency for International Development did not always properly oversee Cuban aid grants and that coordination with the State Department was sometimes ineffective. Cashmere sweaters and chocolate were among the items bought with agency money, the study found.

Delahunt requested the study with Rep. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., another strong advocate of ending the four-decade-old policy of opposing the Castro government through economic penalties and restrictions on travel and personal contacts.

"To continue the current level of funding given the results and given the disarray this program seems to be in would be a tremendous waste of taxpayer dollars," Flake said.

When Democrats gain the majority in the next Congress, Delahunt will be chairman of the House International Relations oversight and investigation subcommittee, putting him in a position to convene hearings on Cuba.

The report by the Government Accountability Office found that in the past decade, USAID awarded 40 grants or cooperative agreements totaling $65 million and the State Department four grants worth $8 million to support democratic progress in Cuba. USAID provided 385,000 pounds of medicine, food and clothing, more than 23,000 shortwave radios and millions of books, newsletters and other informational material.

It said dissidents interviewed by the GAO in Cuba said they appreciated the assistance.

But investigators also found that 95 percent of USAID's total awards were made in response to unsolicited proposals; that reviews of grantees were not always finished before awards were granted; and that the agency did not adequately follow up on grants to ensure accountability.

Some USAID money, the report said, paid for a gas chain saw, computer gaming equipment, a mountain bike, leather coats, cashmere sweaters, crab meat and Godiva chocolates.

"Under the Bush administration's Cuba policy, it is illegal for Cuban-Americans to fly to Havana for a family funeral, but legal for the State Department to pay smugglers to bring chocolates and cashmere sweaters onto the island," said Sara Stephens, executive director for the Center for Democracy in the Americas.

Flake and Delahunt, while acknowledging the difficulty of delivering material to dissidents in Cuba, cited one finding in the report that it takes anywhere from $4 to $20 to get humanitarian or material assistance to the island.

"It may be closer to four cents a pound," if the administration lifted its restrictions on family visits and travel to Cuba, Delahunt said. "This really cries for a more thorough review of policy as opposed to just simply focusing on the findings and looking at it as an auditing problem."

USAID chief financial officer Lisa Fiely, in a letter to the GAO, said her agency has acted to comply with the recommendations. The agency took issue with some findings, she said, but pledged to better manager, monitor and evaluate the U.S. assistance.

On the Net:

Government Accountability Office: http://gao.gov/

More Cubans Take Trip To USA, Using Alternate Routes (USAT)

By Alan Gomez

USA Today, November 16, 2006

Cubans fleeing their communist homeland are reaching U.S. shores in increasingly large numbers as more brave the trip and new smuggler routes make it easier to land.

Traditionally, Cubans have used makeshift boats, rafts and even inner tubes to ride the currents toward the Florida Keys and Florida's southeast coast. But the Coast Guard and Border Patrol agents are heavily focused on the eastern shore, so more smugglers driving high-speed boats are popping up on Florida's less-populated, less-patrolled southwestern coast.

DOJ_NMG_0095188

“Authorities tied it up so tight near Miami that it's gotten hard for them to get in,” said Capt. Thom Carr of the police department on Marco Island, located west of Miami on the other side of the state. “Because of that, they told us (Cubans) might start heading this way, and now they are.”

Monday, 28 Cubans reached land in Naples. The previous day, 17 landed on Sanibel Island. And in August, 20 Cubans landed near Marco Island, according to The News-Press in Fort Myers.

That trend forced the Border Patrol to shift a special unit to southwest Florida this year to help law enforcement track down the smugglers.

“It's caught us by surprise because we haven't seen that in the past,” said Steve Cole, a spokesman with the U.S. Attorney's Office Southwest Florida division.

The shift to the Gulf of Mexico seems obvious to some who live there.

The waterfront along Miami and Fort Lauderdale is stacked with high-rise buildings that light up the waters and make it easier to spot vessels on the water. The area also has many fishermen and boaters who help the Coast Guard identify smugglers gunning for land.

On the other hand, the Gulf Coast is largely a quiet collection of beach homes where cities have laws restricting the amount of light homes can emit at night. The laws ensure that hatching sea turtles head to the water instead of being drawn to city lights.

Mark Sobel, who owns a resort on Sanibel and woke up Sunday to find 17 Cubans on his doorstep, said the combination of those factors results in a prime setting for nighttime smuggling runs. “It's quite dark, and that may very well be a haven for them,” he said.

New routes account for only part of the recent upswing in Cuban migration to the USA.

The Department of Homeland Security estimates that 6,356 Cubans reached U.S. soil in 2005. That's up from 303 in 2003 and marks the highest influx of Cubans since the Coast Guard picked up more than 37,000 Cubans in 1994 in the waters between Florida and Cuba.

Alfredo Mesa, director of the Miami-based Cuban American National Foundation, draws a direct link between the recent upsurge and a crackdown on dissidents on the island in 2003. Dozens of journalists and political activists were arrested, convicted and sentenced to decades in prison on charges of “working with a foreign power to undermine the government.”

“I would make a correlation between this recent wave and the government increasing their repressive apparatus,” Mesa said. “That's at the root of why people seek freedom.”

Lisandro Perez, a Florida International University sociology professor and past director of the school's Cuban Research Institute, takes a broader look at explaining the recent surge. The influx in 1994 was preceded in size only by the Mariel boat lift in 1980, when 125,000 Cubans arrived in Florida.

Perez says that after each massive exodus, islanders settle back down for a number of years, but the economic pressures and the “oppressive” regime eventually drive people to the point of fleeing, no matter the risk or cost. The result, Perez says, is a roughly dozen-year cycle between each exodus.

“After one of these exoduses, there's a collective breath because people who wanted to leave have left,” Perez said. “But over time, these things accumulate. There's a pent-up demand in Cuba for migration that tends to increase with time.”

Law enforcement officials say stopping such a mass migration would be just as hard now as it was during the previous waves.

The U.S. government has a migration policy unique to Cuba. Known as the “wet-foot, dry-foot” policy, any Cuban who reaches land is generally granted political asylum while those caught at sea are returned to Cuba.

That places the onus on the Coast Guard and other law enforcement to stop the floating refugees before they reach shore.

In fiscal year 2005, when more than 6,300 Cubans reached land, the Coast Guard caught 2,712.

“It's a maritime zone. We can't put a wall up around the United States,” said Petty Officer James Judge, a spokesman with the Coast Guard's Miami station. “And we don't have enough Coast Guard assets or other agencies out there to check every single boat and have a 100% way of stopping illegal trafficking of anything, including people.”

DOJ_NMG_0095189

Empowering, Not Muzzling, Our Ambassadors (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The memorandum that was the subject of "Karen's Rules on Diplomacy: Talk to the Media -- if You Dare" [Federal Page, Nov. 8] was originally distributed more than a year ago and is having its intended effect of freeing U.S. ambassadors to engage with the media around the world. It's disappointing that neither The Post nor the organizational psychologists it consulted bothered to check with the State Department before publishing the article. If you had, you would have learned that these guidelines empower our ambassadors rather than restrict them.

When I arrived at the State Department and met with ambassadors last year, many told me that they felt they were not allowed to speak on the record to the media unless the interview was "pre-cleared" by Washington. While this perception was not entirely accurate, many ambassadors hesitated to speak on the record without specific permission. Given time differences and journalists' daily deadlines, that meant too many ambassadors did not regularly engage with the media. Yet it seemed to me, and to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, that if we trusted our ambassadors to represent our country overseas, we should also trust them to use good judgment in speaking to the media about U.S. policies.

As I began encouraging ambassadors to engage more vigorously with media, they requested clear guidelines. The resulting rules cited by The Post have been applauded by our missions abroad; in fact, they were reissued at the request of public affairs officers because many ambassadors are new.

We have dramatically increased the appearances by our ambassadors on media outlets around the world. This expanded engagement is good for our country.

Undersecretary of State for Public Diplomacy and Public Affairs
Washington

Kabila Wins Election Runoff In Congo (AP)

By Michelle Faul

AP, November 16, 2006

Incumbent President Joseph Kabila was declared the winner Wednesday of Congo's tense runoff election, defeating his rival and ex-rebel leader, Jean-Pierre Bemba, in the country's first multiparty contest in more than four decades.

Kabila won with about 58 percent of the vote, compared with nearly 42 percent for Bemba, said Apollinaire Malu Malu, chairman of the Independent Electoral Commission.

Bemba has disputed results from the Oct. 29 vote for days and his forces fought police and troops loyal to Kabila on Saturday for several hours in the capital, leaving three civilians and one soldier dead. Earlier Wednesday, Bemba's fighters refused a request by U.N. peacekeepers to return to military barracks in the city.

Bemba's home was silent, as was most of this capital of nearly 7 million people, where he enjoys massive support and Kabila is largely disliked. A few dozen people in some downtown Kinshasa bars and made celebratory toasts, and car horns honked in victory in an elite suburb.

"Peace must reign in every corner of the country. Long live democracy. Long live the new Democratic Republic of Congo," Kabila said in a televised address after he was declared the winner. "I ask you tonight to remain united and to live in fraternity and tolerance."

The U.N. mission deployed tanks onto Kinshasa's streets Wednesday, part of stepped-up security across Kinshasa that has also included a greater presence of European peacekeepers and police.

The electoral commission had said it would look into Bemba's complaints alleging fraud, but Malu Malu made no reference to the investigations.

The 35-year-old Kabila won 9,436,779 votes, compared to 6,819,822 votes for Bemba, Malu Malu said. Turnout among the nation's 25 million registered voters was about 65 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0095190

Congo may one day look back at the election as the difficult birth of an era of peace, democracy and prosperity after decades of colonial rule, dictatorship and war that devastated what should be among the richest countries in Africa, if not the world. But for now, it is far from clear that supporters of the political rivals won't resort to violence.

"The big hope is that people want the elections, they want peace, they want to get on with their lives in circumstances that promise a better future," said William Lacy Swing, the U.N. secretary-general's special representative to the Congo.

"The vast majority of people are tired of war, tired of violence, they want peace and they are not easily going to be involved in acts that will disrupt order," he said. "I honestly believe that after these elections, one can truly say that this country is another country."

International observers have said voting was largely free and fair, and the election commission has rejected accusations its count has been skewed by fraud.

When results of the first presidential round were announced in August, the two sides battled it out on the streets of Kinshasa for three days, killing 23 people.

White U.N. personnel carriers with mounted submachine guns and truckloads of troops remained overnight in front of Bemba's house on the capital's main June 30 Boulevard. U.N. military spokesman Lt. Col. Stephane Lescoffit said about 100 troops had been stationed there.

On Tuesday, Bemba's spokesman said, a Congolese Armed Forces officer led a convoy of 16 trucks to the house and demanded that 300 members of Bemba's bodyguard accompany them to be confined to barracks on the outskirts of town. They refused and the trucks left, said the spokesman, Moise Musangana.

Army spokesman Col. Leo-Richard Kasonga said he couldn't immediately comment on the demand that Bemba's forces be confined to barracks, which appeared to have been made without consulting the U.N. peacekeepers.

Musangana said Bemba had about 1,500 armed fighters at his home, while the presidential guard numbered up to 15,000.

On Tuesday, Bemba's supporters challenged the vote count and threatened to tear up agreements to use dialogue and not violence to resolve disputes.

International observers have reported some problems in the largely peaceful elections, but largely agree that the exercise was free and fair — a tremendous achievement given the size and population of the country, its primitive infrastructure, lack of institutions, and the fragility of a peace that still has not taken hold in the east.

The Central African nation is the size of the United States east of the Mississippi, but has only 300 miles of paved roads, posing huge logistical problems for the U.N. mission that spent nearly $500 million on the vote, the biggest election the world body had ever helped organize.

"There have been issues but, technically speaking, I really believe it was free and fair," said Carmina Sanchis-Ruescas of the Washington-based IFES, which aids elections around the world. "There always some errors and mistakes, but not to the extent that we could claim that it has not been free and fair."

The names of some voters didn't make it onto the lists of eligible voters because of technical glitches, while up to 1.5 million poll workers and observers were allowed to vote outside their home districts, raising concerns.

The country's top Roman Catholic prelate, Cardinal Frederic Etsou, accused the Electoral Commission of publishing false results.

But the biggest national observer mission, set up by the Catholic Church, found no evidence the count was rigged.

"We saw some irregularities, but we cannot speak of fraud," said Henri Nuyiya of the Coordination for a Successful Transition, which mustered 50,000 election volunteers. "If there were a few people who voted in places where they were not registered, this would not have affected the results of the elections."

Both candidates had representatives at polling stations who were given copies of the results on the day of balloting, said Colin Stewart of the Atlanta-based Carter Center, which also sent observers.

That measure, he said, "constitutes a very strong measure of transparency and virtually eliminates any possibility of significant fraud in the compilation process."

Incumbent Declared Winner In Congo Vote (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0095191

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

KINSHASA, Congo, Nov. 15 -- Incumbent Joseph Kabila was on Wednesday declared the winner of Congo's first presidential elections in more than 40 years, as the crumbling boulevards of the capital remained calm.

The announcement came during a week of rising tensions and as dozens of U.N. tanks patrolled the streets. On Tuesday, supporters of Kabila's rival, Jean-Pierre Bemba, essentially declared their candidate president, accusing the election commission and other countries of an "electoral holdup."

Bemba, a former rebel leader, has wide support in Kinshasa and a personal guard of an estimated 1,000 soldiers who had refused to evacuate to the edges of the city.

By sundown Wednesday, many Congolese were expressing fear that the historic vote would end in a street brawl. Business owners chained their doors early, streets were unusually empty, and some families boarded ferries bound for Brazzaville, in neighboring Congo Republic across the vast Congo River.

But the sort of violence that killed at least 23 people after the first round of voting on July 30, and that people endured during a decade of civil war, did not materialize.

"We're fed up with the fighting," said Charles Tumba, a Bemba supporter sitting outside a house lacking electricity and running water most of the time. "Basically, everybody is expecting a change in the country. But let's wait and see."

Some international election observers reported irregularities but said none were significant enough to alter the results.

A massive logistical effort had gone into the election in Congo, a mostly roadless country the size of Western Europe with a population of more than 62 million. Foreign donors poured in $450 million to support the vote, which one Western aid official deemed perhaps one of the "most complicated processes in the history of democracy."

The United Nations deployed 17,500 troops, the largest peacekeeping force in the world. Election workers registered more than 25 million voters, many of whom walked miles to cast paper ballots that had to be trucked, biked, canoed or hiked to one of thousands of counting centers across the country. And because there was a runoff, it was done twice.

Kabila, who took power after his father, Laurent Kabila, was assassinated in 2001, faces the challenge of satisfying the high expectations of the electorate, including the 42 percent who voted for Bemba, in a country with more than 200 ethnic groups and at least that many political parties.

"It's not enough just to vote," said Christophe Lutundula, an opposition lawmaker who received death threats after he wrote a report examining wartime mining contracts. Kabila "has to manage his victory. And there has not been much progress in the maturing of the political culture, and that's what worries me most. It is effectively a cultural war to change things in this country."

Kabila takes charge of a country still imbued with the legacy of its longtime dictator, Mobutu Sese Seko, who looted billions from the government during his 32-year rule. The violence, disease and famine accompanying the civil war that followed left more than 4 million people dead.

Several former rebel leaders accused of war crimes now hold high-ranking positions in the national army, and militias still terrorize people in the east, taking over farms and national parks. Kabila also faces a population desperate for decent jobs, as unemployment hovers around 80 percent.

Many here say they hope a new constitution, adopted last year, will provide some framework for reforms. The document provides for the creation of provincial legislatures, for example, that in theory will decentralize state power, allowing provinces to retain 40 percent of revenue for local projects.

"People have learned a lot from this process," the aid official said. "And it has created a whole cadre of people who understand what it means to be in the weeds of democracy."

'Glamorous' Socialist Seeks French Presidency (USAT)

By Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095192

PARIS — Is France, which has been led by male political lions like Charles de Gaulle, Francois Mitterrand and now Jacques Chirac, ready for a female president? And a woman who is a glamorous, unmarried mother — and a new-breed Socialist at that?

Segolene Royal, 53, who hopes to be the republic's first female president, will get a partial answer to that question this week. The Socialist Party's 200,000-plus registered members go to the polls today to choose their nominee for April's presidential election. Results are due Friday.

Royal already has shaken up French politics, traditionally dominated by men from the elite universities that groom the nation's leaders and move up through France's bureaucracy.

She has graced the covers of magazines such as TIME Europe. While on vacation in August, paparazzi photographed her in a turquoise bikini. "She's very glamorous. She's very pretty. She's seen as separate from the French ruling elite," says Rachna Uppal, European analyst for Global Insight, a London-based consulting firm.

On the final day of campaigning Wednesday, Royal's two male opponents, Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Laurent Fabius, denied her accusations of chauvinism.

Royal quoted Strauss-Kahn this week as saying that she "would have done better to stay at home rather than read out her cookery notes." She told party members that Fabius had wondered, "Who is going to look after the children?" if she became the party candidate.

As leader of her party — and possibly of the nation — Royal says she offers something different: a connection with the French people.

Uppal says Royal cultivates the image of a person who is willing to listen. France has been racked by riots in the past year by minority youths, mostly Muslim, who complain they are discriminated against in jobs, in education and in treatment by police.

The French "think they want change; they say they want change," Uppal says. "But they fear change. Royal stands out as someone who is listening to them."

Although there are no recent polls of party members, Royal was the choice of 58% of those who "sympathize" with the Socialist Party in a poll in Sunday's Le Journal du Dimanche by the Ifop agency. Strauss-Kahn, a former finance minister, was preferred by 32% in the Nov. 2-10 poll of 716 Socialist-leaning adults.

Royal is running even among all voters in a matchup against the likely presidential candidate of the ruling center-right party, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy. She was favored by 32% to Sarkozy's 31% in an Oct. 17-18 poll by the firm CSA.

"She has a very good chance of becoming the first woman president," William Keylor, professor of international relations at Boston University, says of Royal. "This would be a sea change in French politics if those old guys are going to have to … turn over Elysée Palace to a woman."

Royal's background is similar to her male political counterparts. She got an economics degree from Paris' Institute of Political Sciences, known as Sciences Po. She also graduated from the National School of Administration, the launch pad for the governing elite. She served as minister of environment, education and family and children. In 2004, she was elected president of one of 12 elected regional administrative bodies.

At Sciences Po, she met Francois Hollande, 52, a veteran French politician and chairman of the Socialist Party since 1997. She and Hollande live together, but they never married. They have four children.

"I would vote for her," says Catherine Clisson, 43, a Paris homemaker and mother of a teenage boy and 11-year-old girl. "I really would like a change. The (male) politicians we have from the establishment, they don't really know how people live. A woman like Segolene Royal knows a little more."

Royal's rise as a political star hasn't been trouble-free. She has drawn harsh criticism from Socialist hard-liners for some of her stands. And she has backtracked to avoid alienating the party base.

She backed off her critique of France's 35-hour workweek, which is a Socialist party sacred cow.

She has been fuzzy on how to pull France out of its economic doldrums. The French economy was stagnant in the third quarter. Unemployment for minority youths in suburban areas is as high as 20%, although it dipped to 8.8% in September, lowest level in five years.

DOJ_NMG_0095193

Royal also has not made her foreign policy views clear, although she has indicated her take on U.S.-French relations differs from opponent Sarkozy, who is strongly pro-American, says Philip Gordon, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution in Washington. "She's staking out a position that stresses France's independence from the United States," Gordon says.

Royal wants delinquent juveniles to be sent to boot camps run by the military. And she has called for "citizens' juries" that would assess how politicians are doing and attend Cabinet meetings.

When jeered by Socialists at a candidate debate last month, Royal defended the juries. "Don't be afraid of the people," she said. "Democracy is like love: The more you get of it, the bigger it grows."

If no candidate emerges with a majority Friday, Socialists will hold a runoff between the top two vote-getters next Thursday.

Analyst Uppal says a second round could prevent Royal from taking positions that stray from the traditional Socialist platform. "She wants a shoo-in," Uppal says. "If she's a shoo-in, she will be saying a lot more controversial things."

Annan Faults 'Frightening Lack Of Leadership' For Global Warming (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, Nov. 15 — Secretary General Kofi Annan on Wednesday put the blame for global warming on "a frightening lack of leadership," saying the poorest people in the world, who do not even create much pollution, bear the brunt of rising temperatures.

"The impact of climate change will fall disproportionately on the world's poorest countries, many of them here in Africa," Mr. Annan said in a speech to a major climate conference here. "Poor people already live on the front lines of pollution, disaster and the degradation of resources and land.

"For them," the United Nations leader said, "adaptation is a matter of sheer survival."

When pressed at a news conference afterward about his comments on poor leadership, Mr. Annan denied that he was singling out the United States, the world's biggest source of the smokestack and tailpipe gases that are linked by most scientists to rising temperatures. The United States is also one of the few countries that has not ratified the Kyoto Protocol, the first treaty setting limits on the heat-trapping pollutants.

"My speech was not directed at a particular individual or leader," Mr. Annan said. "I just want leaders around the world to show courage, because this is one of the greatest challenges of our time."

Among other issues, negotiators at the climate conference are exploring how to set new emissions limits for the period after 2012, when Kyoto's terms expire. Bush administration officials have said the United States has no plans to accept any binding limits.

The delegation from the United States, meanwhile, denied that it was part of the leadership failure that Mr. Annan spoke about.

Paula J. Dobriansky, the under secretary of state for democracy and global affairs, said Wednesday that "we think the United States has been leading in its groundbreaking initiatives." She listed several measures, including financial incentives for businesses to reduce pollution and strict domestic rules that she said had helped in the fight against global warming.

Each year thousands of environmental experts, government officials and activist groups gather for a nearly two-week-long conference on how to battle global warming.

This year's conference in Nairobi, partly because it has drawn so many Africans, has focused on the possibility that those least responsible for pollution-induced climate change may suffer the most from it. Africa, one of the least industrialized areas in the world, is a case in point.

The herders of Kenya's grassy plains, for example, whose total pollution basically boils down to their cooking fires and the few cigarettes they smoke, are being displaced by increasingly frequent droughts, which many scientists blame at least partly on global warming.

Malaria, one of Africa's leading killers, is spreading to higher altitudes because of rising temperatures. The Sahara is expanding, turning farmland into desert and contributing to conflicts like the one in the Darfur region of Sudan. And the list goes on.

DOJ_NMG_0095194

"Africa faces some of the fiercest effects of climate change," Kenya's president, Mwai Kibaki, said in a speech on Wednesday at the climate conference. He said warmer temperatures could destroy agriculture and tourism, two of Kenya's brightest hopes for a way out of poverty.

The emphasis on poor countries has led to another running theme at this year's climate caucus: adaptation. Experts and politicians concede that so much carbon dioxide, one of the dominant heat-trapping gases, has already accumulated in the atmosphere that the world must accept global warming and figure out how to adapt to it.

"For too long the international community focused almost exclusively on mitigation," said Kivutha Kibwana, Kenya's environmental minister, who is president of the conference. "Let Nairobi be the starting point whereby adaptation and mitigation efforts go hand in hand."

The conference has succeeded in establishing the broad outlines of an adaptation fund that calls for industrialized countries to help poor countries deal with the adverse effects of climate change through measures like relocating coastal people displaced by floods.

Though the fund is still tiny, around $3 million, United Nations officials say that it will grow rapidly and that there is now a plan for how to manage it. Each country will get one vote, which will give the developing world a larger voice than that of industrialized nations.

Still, much work remains, and the conference ends Friday. One bogged-down proposal is the effort to limit the average global temperature increase to 3.5 degrees Fahrenheit or so, which may not sound like much but would significantly change the environment. In the past century, average global temperatures have risen about 1 degree.

Even moderate projections of warming under current emissions trends foresee four or five times that temperature increase by 2100, accompanied by a substantial rise in sea levels and disruption of climate patterns and water supplies.

Earlier this week, a group of island nations objected to the 3.5-degree ceiling, saying that even that would be too high for them to bear, because of all the flooding.

Participants were also divided over the idea of a carbon dioxide tax. On Wednesday the president of Switzerland, Moritz Leuenberger, proposed using such a tax to finance adaptation programs. The tax would serve the dual purpose of discouraging rich countries from polluting and helping poor countries deal with the consequences of pollution.

"This is not a fight against nature," Mr. Leuenberger said. "It is a battle against shortsighted egoism."

Talks By India And Pakistan Make No Gains On Train Blasts (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

NEW DELHI, Nov. 15 — Peace talks between India and Pakistan, which had stalled after the bombings of commuter trains in Mumbai in July, limped forward this week, as senior officials from both countries met here for two days to discuss issues ranging from how to exchange information on terrorist groups to a dispute over an uninhabitable area high in the Himalayas.

But the dialogue between their top diplomats ended Wednesday without movement on a crucial and closely watched item: India, having accused Pakistan of involvement in the Mumbai bombings, presented no evidence of such complicity.

India has long blamed Pakistan-based militant groups for organizing terrorist acts on Indian soil, and the Indian police have recently accused the Pakistani intelligence agency of directing the July 11 train bombings.

Pakistan has repeatedly rejected blame and challenged India to share its evidence. The two countries agreed in September to exchange information about terrorism, but plenty of doubts remain on each side about whether their mutual distrust will permit an earnest exchange.

The Pakistani foreign secretary, Riaz Muhammad Khan, told reporters on Wednesday afternoon that India had furnished information about "linkages" between banned militant groups in India and Pakistan, but nothing on the Mumbai attacks.

His counterpart, Shiv Shankar Menon, would only say of the information that it was "material relating to cross-border linkages to terrorist acts in India."

Asked if elements in the Pakistani government had been involved, Mr. Menon would not specify. "There are elements in Pakistan that are involved, not just in assisting but inciting terrorism in India," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095195

Mr. Menon also said that his government could not proffer information on the Mumbai blasts because no one had been charged in an Indian court. The police in Mumbai have made arrests, but some of the suspects have complained that confessions, implicating militant groups and intelligence operatives in Pakistan, were extracted by force. In a television interview last month, the Indian national security adviser, M. K. Narayanan, said that India had less than "clinching" evidence.

In a joint statement, the two nations, each with nuclear weapons, agreed to continue talking and said they had reached agreement on "reducing the risk from accidents relating to nuclear weapons."

They were far from an accord on pulling back troops from Siachen Glacier, 18,500 feet in the Himalayas, where Indian and Pakistani soldiers have faced off for more than 20 years. It is uninhabitable, and the dispute is less over who controls it than recording on a map whose troops were last standing where. India wants its troop positions laid out on a map; Pakistan says it opposes what Mr. Khan on Wednesday called "endorsement of a certain claim."

Pakistan Moves Toward Altering Rape Law (NYT)

By Salman Masood

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 15 — After months of delay, the Pakistani government on Wednesday finally pushed legislation through the lower house of Parliament to amend rape laws that human rights advocates say have led to punishment for thousands of innocent victims.

The passage of the legislation, which has been opposed by Islamist parties, is seen as a litmus test for President Pervez Musharraf's commitment to steering the country toward moderation and enlightenment. Because of the pressure by the Islamic groups, though, the measure passed on Wednesday still contains provisions that concern human rights groups.

To become law, the bill must be approved by the Senate, which is expected, and by General Musharraf. Months of wrangling and political opposition cast doubts on whether the government would succeed in passing the changes to the current law, the Hudood ordinance, under which women who report rape can end up being prosecuted for adultery. The law was enacted in 1979 by a former military dictator, Gen. Muhammad Zia al-Haq, to appease Islamists who contended that he was secularizing the country.

Late Wednesday, General Musharraf made an appearance on state-run television and congratulated the nation on the passage of the measure, the Women's Protection bill, saying, "This process of empowerment, protection of women will continue."

Under the Hudood ordinance, rape is included in matters covered under Islamic law, like marriage and divorce. A woman who reports that she has been raped must produce four male witnesses to prove it. If she fails to do so, she can be prosecuted for adultery. Thousands of women have been punished under the law, often on the flimsiest evidence. That risk has kept many women from trying to bring their attackers to justice.

The legislation passed Wednesday gives judges the discretion to try rape cases in a criminal rather than an Islamic court. The new legislation allows forensic and circumstantial evidence to be used as a basis for convictions, as with other crimes.

The amendment also introduces the concept of statutory rape, outlawing sex with girls under 16. The Islamic code had merely banned sex with girls before puberty.

The change in the law comes after high-profile cases that were widely publicized here by women's rights groups and in the West and that brought considerable pressure to bear on the government. They include cases in which local authorities have permitted rapes as a way of compensating someone judged to have been wronged by the woman's male relatives.

Dealing with Hudood laws has been a political minefield for General Musharraf, with Islamic opposition political parties saying that changing the laws would violate the principles of Islam. Pakistani officials have taken pains to convince the public that amending the laws would not violate Islamic precepts, and General Musharraf repeated that theme in his remarks. "I assure the entire nation that no Pakistani can ever think of enacting law that is repugnant to the Holy Koran and the Sunnah," the recorded teachings and actions of the Prophet Muhammad, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095196

The new law would continue to allow prosecutions for what it calls fornication, a provision that was introduced at the insistence of religious scholars and was backed by the alliance of religious opposition parties. Human rights advocates on Wednesday expressed concern over that provision.

General Musharraf said in his televised address that the government "did not cave in to the mullahs" and that "the section regarding fornication was inserted after consultation with legal experts and ruling party members."

The legislation approved Wednesday was shaped during months of drafting and back-door negotiations between the government and opposition political parties. Vociferous protests by an alliance of Islamist parties had stalled the legislation, which was introduced in August.

An attempt to pass a new law in September broke down after threats of mass resignations by the religious alliance forced the government to pull the legislation back. But on Wednesday, the government finally moved ahead, and Parliament's lower house passed the bill in just one sitting.

Opposition members from the more extreme Islamist parties boycotted the vote and walked out of the Parliament as the legislation was introduced. But it seemed unlikely that religious alliance members would go so far as to resign from Parliament, analysts here said.

Maulana Fazalur Rehman, leader of Muattahida Majlis-e-Amal, the alliance of religious parties, said the bill "will turn Pakistan into a free-sex zone."

The liberal opposition Pakistan People's Party of former Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto supported the bill. Sherry Rehman, central information secretary for the party, said it had decided to support the legislation because it was consistent with the party's goal of emancipating and empowering Pakistan's women.

"We are not totally satisfied," she said. "We wanted a total repeal of the Hudood laws."

Human rights advocates have demanded a total repeal of the Hudood laws, and the move on Wednesday met with guarded words of welcome but also with concerns.

Farzana Bari, a member of Pattan, a human rights advocate, said she was pleased that rape cases would be prosecuted under the country's penal code. But she said she was disappointed that the government had tried to appease the Islamists by incorporating the so-called fornication section.

She said noted that adultery had not been an offense against the state before the Hudood laws, and she worried that judges could be bribed to misuse the provisions. "There is nothing to celebrate," Ms. Bari said. "This clause about fornication would now open a new chapter of misuse and abuse."

Pakistan Moves To Amend Rape Laws (WP/AP)

By Paul Garwood, Associated Press

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan, Nov. 15 -- Pakistan's lower house of Parliament passed amendments to the country's rape laws Wednesday, ditching the death penalty for extramarital sex and revising a clause on making victims produce four witnesses to prove rape cases.

Consensual sex outside marriage would remain a crime punishable by five years in prison or a $165 fine, said a parliamentary official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to reporters.

International and local calls for change intensified after the 2002 gang rape of Mukhtar Mai. A tribal council in her village in Punjab province ordered the rape as punishment for her 13-year-old brother's alleged affair with a woman of a higher caste.

The amendments enraged Islamic conservatives but won cautious support from human rights activists, who wanted the controversial laws scrapped altogether.

Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, praised lawmakers for approving the amendments and criticized fundamentalists for their "unnecessary" opposition and their claims that his government was acting against Islam.

"I have taken a firm decision to change these unjust rape laws as it was necessary to amend them to protect women," Musharraf said in a televised address to the nation. He urged the Senate, dominated by government allies, to swiftly approve the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0095197

Pakistan's late dictator, Gen. Mohammed Zia ul-Haq, introduced the laws, known as the Hudood Ordinance, in 1979 to appease Islamic political groups opposed to the secularization of Pakistani society.

Human rights activists and moderates have long condemned the laws for punishing rape victims instead of protecting them. The laws placed the burden of proof on victims while providing safeguards for their attackers, such as requiring four eyewitnesses to bring rape charges.

The amendments coincide with efforts by the Islamabad government to soften the country's hard-line Islamic image and pacify opponents of the laws.

Hina Jilani , a leading Pakistani human rights activist, praised the government for taking practical steps to amend the laws, but she demanded more legislation to protect women's rights.

"The government has made some positive changes by passing this bill, but it does not meet our demands," said Jilani, of the independent Human Rights Commission of Pakistan. "We wanted a total repeal of the 1979 rape law, but the government has not done it."

The amendments drop the death penalty and flogging for people convicted of having consensual sex outside marriage and give judges discretion to try rape cases in a criminal court, rather than an Islamic court. Strict Islamic law dictates that a woman claiming rape must produce four witnesses, making a trial almost impossible.

Support Builds For Libyan Dissident (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Human rights activists and Western diplomats are increasingly concerned about the welfare of Fathi al-Jahmi, a leading Libyan dissident awaiting a possible death sentence while being held in solitary confinement in Libya, and who is known to have several life-threatening health conditions for which he is receiving little or no medical care. He is charged with having an unauthorized meeting two years ago with a foreign official -- believed to be a U.S. diplomat -- and campaigners are pushing the Bush administration to do more to secure his release.

Jahmi, 65, a democracy activist in Libya since the late 1970s, has been in and out of Libyan jails and survived an assassination attempt in 1990 when gunmen stormed into his house. A civil engineer, Jahmi had served as governor of Libya's oil-rich Gulf province and as head of the National Planning Committee until 1972. After 1978, when his businesses were nationalized, he became Libya's public face for democracy, free enterprise and freedom of expression.

He was imprisoned in October 2002 after delivering a speech at a conference in Tripoli calling for democracy, a free press and the release of political prisoners. He was released on March 12, 2004, after intervention by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who held a face-to-face meeting with Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi to ask for Jahmi's freedom.

Jahmi and his eldest son, Mohamed, met subsequently with a U.S. diplomat at the Corinthia hotel in Tripoli to express his gratitude for the U.S. help in his release, according to his brother and human rights groups. Two U.S. diplomats later visited Jahmi at his house, said his brother, Mohammed al-Jahmi, who said members of the Libyan state security bureau were parked outside the house and threatened the family.

Fathi al-Jahmi was rearrested two weeks later and has been in jail since. "I happened to be on the phone with the family when government agents encircled his house. I could hear the sirens," his brother recalled.

Jahmi has been accused of "exchanging information with employees of a foreign state that is harmful to the country" and "scheming with foreigners during times of peace," according to a statement from the Libyan People's Bureau, or embassy, in London sent to Amnesty International in July.

New York-based Human Rights Watch says Libya's penal code imposes the death penalty on anyone who talks to or conspires with a foreign official to provoke or contribute to an attack against Libya. The United States restored full diplomatic relations with Libya in May.

Jahmi's family had been trying to get indictment papers for the past two years, and this week was the first they learned of the charge, Mohammed al-Jahmi said in an e-mail.

DOJ_NMG_0095198

Mohammed al-Jahmi, a software engineer in Boston who came to study in the United States in 1977 and remained here, said he was extremely concerned about his brother's health. "I know everyone is doing their best to help. Everyone at the State Department kept telling me that Libya has changed. Libya has not changed," he said. He said his brother had never called for violence but for political dialogue for change at a roundtable of Libyans.

Several members of Congress, 36 human rights organizations in the United States and abroad, and other concerned citizens plan this week to send a petition to President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urging them to take swift action to secure Jahmi's release. "The United States has now restored diplomatic relations with Libya," the petition says. "We urge you to use this opportunity to bring about the immediate and unconditional release of Fathi Eljahmi and all prisoners of conscience in Libya."

"We do remain concerned about Libya's human rights record," a State Department official said Monday. "We have raised Mr. al-Jahmi's case with Libyan authorities and we continue to do so since we have normalized relations. We want the Libyan government to release Fathi al-Jahmi immediately," he added.

Repeated telephone calls to Libya's ambassador to Washington, Ali Suleiman Aujali, were not returned.

In February 2005, the group Physicians for Human Rights sent a Dutch physician and prison health expert to evaluate Jahmi. The report, by Joost Jan Den Otter, said Jahmi's chronic conditions, including diabetes, high blood pressure and coronary artery disease, and his inadequate care in prison, could lead to a "lethal scenario." The report warned that Jahmi was in danger of a fatal heart attack or severe kidney failure. It also described Jahmi's dismal appearance and hygiene and called his treatment "cruel, inhuman and degrading."

Three Libyan doctors confirmed the diagnosis and informed the Dutch physician that Jahmi was now receiving proper treatment. When Human Rights Watch visited him in May 2005, Jahmi had been given a haircut and cleaned up, according to a photograph taken by a representative of the group.

Jahmi's son Mohamed visited him in jail at the end of August this year and said he looked frail and ashen. Jahmi told his son that his supply of medications had run out and had not been refilled.

The complex U.S.-Libyan relationship deteriorated in 1986, when President Ronald Reagan ordered a U.S. military strike against Tripoli that targeted Gaddafi's residential compound and killed his young daughter. The airstrike was in retaliation for the bombing 10 days earlier of a discotheque in West Berlin frequented by U.S. military members.

Relations between the two countries have swung dramatically since, from Libya being routinely accused of supporting international terrorism to Gaddafi winning praise for abandoning his nuclear program and the release in March of 132 political prisoners.

Presidential Candidate Bucks Chavez Tide (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

AP, November 16, 2006

The best hope for many Venezuelans fed up with what they see as increasingly autocratic rule under President Hugo Chavez may be a gravelly voiced political veteran with a reputation for boldness and grit.

On the campaign trail, Manuel Rosales pumps his fists in the air, provoking screams of near-religious fervor from thousands of exuberant supporters.

The gray-haired 53-year-old has managed to galvanize the fractured opposition as its unity candidate to face Chavez in Dec. 3 elections, and is drawing giant crowds even though he trails the incumbent by 20 points or more in most opinion polls.

"Democracy is at risk with this government, and Venezuelans need to unite to defend it," Rosales told The Associated Press, accusing Chavez of wanting to be president-for-life like his friend Fidel Castro of Cuba.

Rosales gets his message out forcefully through private Venezuelan TV stations and newspapers that carry a steady stream of Chavez criticism. He gets limited coverage on state television, which sometimes interrupts his speeches or films them from odd or unflattering angles.

DOJ_NMG_0095199

Billboards for Rosales show him surging through campaign crowds and bear the slogan "Dare to change!" But Chavez billboards are much more numerous, and the opposition has complained that when Chavez seizes the airwaves to speak for hours, it amounts to an unfair campaign practice.

Rosales, who temporarily stepped down as governor of the western state of Zulia to run, is one of just a handful of opposition politicians to remain a regional powerbroker in defiance of the pro-Chavez tide. He was one of only two non-Chavistas to win governor's races in elections two years ago.

And while he has many middle- and upper-class supporters, Rosales has sought to make inroads among Chavez's traditional support base — the poor.

He strongly criticizes what he calls handout social programs at the heart of Chavez's populist agenda, saying money is tossed about to secure political patronage. Instead, Rosales proposes creating a state-issued debit card to directly distribute one-fifth of Venezuela's oil income among the country's poorest families.

Many Venezuelans say the candidate, a cattle rancher who has been active in politics for three decades, lacks Chavez's charisma.

But in Venezuela's highly polarized society, this former mayor of Maracaibo, the country's second-largest city, has seen the campaign take on religious overtones.

At rallies, supporters press wooden crosses or figurines of Christ into Rosales' hands. Others give him pictures of saints or bottles of holy water — displays of devotion also common among followers of Chavez, who often invokes Jesus as an inspiration.

When Rosales walks through crowds, supporters often try to push past security guards to shake his hand, hug or kiss him.

"He's the only hope we have to get rid of this government. That's why we love him," said Roselyn Fuentes, one of tens of thousands who joined a campaign march across Caracas.

"Take a look at this," Rosales said while riding in a sport-utility vehicle after a campaign stop, rolling up his sleeves to reveal bruises and scratches on his forearms. "That's the affection of the people."

Some give Rosales poems written in his honor or notes asking for help finding a job — displays of devotion also seen among Chavez's backers.

Chavez avoids referring to Rosales by name, often calling him the "ex-governor" and depicting him as a U.S. pawn. Some pro-Chavez campaign banners read: "Vote against the devil — Vote against the empire."

But Rosales denies any links to Washington, insisting he's an independent-minded democrat speaking for Venezuelans whom Chavez has betrayed. And he's tried to distance himself from the corrupt political class that ran the country for four decades until Chavez's 1998 election.

In fact, until recently Chavez and Rosales were on speaking terms, the centrist governor being one of the few opposition leaders to occasionally attend presidential functions. That changed in December when Rosales' small party, A New Time, joined a boycott of congressional elections.

Some Chavez supporters poke fun at Rosales, noting he has stumbled over words. His response: "Maybe I don't talk so pretty, but I'm honest."

Rosales also has warned he could call street protests after next month's vote if he thinks it hasn't been conducted fairly.

Friends say Rosales isn't likely to back down. They say that when Rosales won his first election in his hometown in 1979, local political bosses tried to tamper with the results — and that a gun was fired into the air during an argument among Rosales, his opponents and soldiers guarding the ballots.

Rosales claims not to remember exactly what happened, saying "problems, attempts at fraud arise in many elections and everyone defends what's theirs. There was a problem there and I defended what was mine."

Asked who fired the gun, Rosales grinned and responded: "I don't remember. Maybe it was a firework."

No Apartheid For Gays, Either (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095200

WHEN SOUTH AFRICAN lawmakers voted Tuesday to legalize same-sex marriage, the former icon of unjust government reminded the world that its break from colonial apartheid wasn't just about changing the power structure. It was about conferring broad civil rights within its borders.

What makes the vote by South Africa's Parliament unique is that it stems not from the gradual social liberalization that sparked similar moves in such countries as Spain and Canada but from its very constitution. Adopted in 1996, that document drew its inspiration from a newfound hope of rights for all and, as a result, specifically prohibited discrimination against homosexuals.

Under court order to follow its own constitution, Parliament was forced into overriding old marriage laws and extending marriage rights to same-sex couples, thus becoming an unlikely global beacon of progressiveness. The vote is all the more extraordinary for its contrast with much of Africa on the question of homosexuality, which is illegal in most sub-Saharan countries.

It's regrettable that, unlike other countries that have legalized same-sex unions, South Africa will allow civil officials to opt out of performing gay-marriage ceremonies. It should not be up to government functionaries to determine whether a nation's laws are to their liking; it's simply their job to carry out the laws. Time might cure what Parliament didn't. As same-sex marriage becomes more common in South Africa, and people see it does nothing to hurt the nation or heterosexual marriage, objections by officials may decline.

South Africa is far from a perfect democracy, and government action alone, in South Africa as elsewhere, cannot end discrimination. Some of its leaders, notably President Thabo Mbeki, have been less than enlightened in their views on homosexuality and AIDS. (Only recently has his government made antiretroviral drugs more widely available.) But on Tuesday, the nation showed that it has shed the worst of its past and is growing into a rights-based democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0095201

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 2006 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Prosecutors Urge Jurors To Convict Colombian Rebel Leader (AP) ... 4
US Argues Harsh Treatment Shouldn't Undercut Padilla Case (CSM) ... 4
Lawyers Try To Stop Gitmo Med Procedure (AP) ... 6
German Court Finds Sept. 11 Terrorist Guilty Of Abetting Murder (BLOOM) ... 7
German 9/11 Trial Underscores Need For Better Global Cooperation (CSM) ... 7
A Better Way To Fight Terrorism (WP) ... 8

Homeland Response:

Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared (KTVT) ... 9
Feds Bust UMass Student For Sears Tower Bomb Hoax (BOSH) ... 10
Judge Rejects Request To Strike Don't-tell-how-to-make-a-bomb Law (SDUT) ... 10
Steven Hatfill Demands Fines For N.Y. Times (NYS) ... 11
Lawyer Disputes Feds' Claim That His Client Engaged In 'Overt Sexual Activity' On Airliner (AP) ... 12
Allard Lobbies For Supermax Funding (RMN) ... 12

War News:

General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout (USAT) ... 12
General Warns Against Iraq Exit Timeline (FT) ... 13
Facing Withdrawal Demands, Abizaid Calls For More Troops (LAT) ... 13
General Warns Of Risks In Iraq If G.I.'s Are Cut (NYT) ... 15
Abizaid Says Withdrawal Would Mean More Unrest (WP) ... 16
Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats (WT) ... 17
With Politics As Subtext, Senators Clash On Iraq (NYT) ... 18
New Armed Services Chairs Oppose Iraq (AP) ... 19
U.S. Military Leaders Oppose Timetable On Iraq (MCT) ... 20
Dems Call For More Urgency On Iraq (CSM) ... 21
The "Stay Or Leave" Debate In The US Finds A Mirror In Baghdad (NYT) ... 22
Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn (WP) ... 23
Iran Hints That US Shouldn't Withdraw From Iraq Too Soon (LAT) ... 25
US Should Add Troops To Prevent Disaster In Iraq (RC) ... 26
About 70 Freed After Mass Iraq Abduction (AP) ... 27
Kidnappings Stir Political Dispute In Iraq (NYT) ... 29
In Iraqi Colleges, Fear For An Already Shrunken Realm (WP) ... 30
US Troops Look For An Inside Man In Iraqi Slayings (LAT) ... 31
Nurture Iraqi Democracy, From The Ground Up (LAT) ... 33
Unleash The Shiites? (LAT) ... 34
Police In Anbar Province Lack Protection, Pay (USAT) ... 35
Soldier Pleads In Iraq Rape, Murder Case (AP) ... 36
Taliban, Al-Qaeda Resurge In Afghanistan, CIA Says (WP) ... 36
Christmas Tree Growers Want To Give U.S. Troops Abroad A Little Bit Of Home (USAT/AP) ... 37

Corporate Scandals:

Enron's Causey Sentenced To 5 1/2 Years (AP) ... 38
Case Closed: Last Top Enron Exec Sentenced (USAT) ... 39
Former Enron Accountant Gets 51/2 Years For Fraud (WP) ... 39
SEC Intensifies Probe Into Dell's Accounting (AAS) ... 40
Dell To Delay Results As SEC Begins A Formal Probe (WSJ) ... 41
Dell Accounting Inquiry Made Formal By S.E.C. (NYT) ... 42
Former HP Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty In Spying Scandal (AP) ... 43
Audit Clears SEC's Financial Statements (WP) ... 43
Ousters Can Raise Chance Of Charges (LAT) ... 43

Criminal Law:

Disgraced Lobbyist Jack Abramoff Reports To Prison (AP) ... 45
Abramoff Begins Serving Sentence At Maryland Prison (LAW) ... 45
Another Guilty Plea In 2002 Phone-jam Case (MANUL) ... 46
Judge Sentences TV Advertiser To 86 Months For Selling Faulty Computers (AP) ... 47
Authorities Form Multinational Unit To Hunt Pedophiles (USAT) 47
Judge Rejects Challenge To Evidence In Cuban Agent Case (AP) ... 48
Officials Cannot Confirm Whitey Bulger 'Sighting' (BOS) ... 48
Feds To Be On Alert At Whitey Galpal's Mom's Burial Today (BOSH) ... 49
Official Admits Accepting Bribe (NSL) ... 49
West Long Branch Councilman Admits Taking Bribe (NSDY/AP)49
John Dougherty's Home Searched In Federal Probe (PHI) ... 50
FBI Joins Johnson School Inquiry (LEXHL) ... 50
NY Authorities Bring Down Huge Gambling Ring, Arrest Poker Player (AP) ... 51
Online Bookie Ring Has Link To Miami (MH) ... 52
Dozens Charged With Running Gambling Ring (WP) ... 53

27 Arrested In City's 'Largest' Betting Bust (NSDY) 53
$3.3 BIL CASINO ROYALE (NYPOST) 54
You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed (NYDN) 56
Campaign Gifts To Governor Probed (MH) 57
Vernon Mayor, Former City Administrator Charged With Corruption (LAT) 58
In Murder Case, New Evidence But Same Cell (NYT) 58
Simpson Revisits Infamous Case (LAT) 60

Civil Law:

Unions Object To New Bonus Plan For Dana Executives (AP) .. 61

Civil Rights:

Suspect In LAPD Excessive Force Probe Enters Plea And Is Released (LAT) 62
Video Arrest Subject Pleads No Contest (NSDY/AP) 62
LAPD Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe (AP) 63
More Racist Graffiti Reported In Charles (WP) 63
Counting The Vote, Badly (NYT) 64

Antitrust:

U.S. Opens Criminal Probe Of Banks' Municipal Deals (Correct) (BLOOM) 65
KKR, Carlyle, 11 Others Accused Of Rigging Buyouts (Update2) (BLOOM) 65
US Airways Bids To Acquire Delta And No. 1 Rank (WP) 66
US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1 (NYT) .. 67
US Airways Presses Delta Over $8bn Offer (FT) 69
US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (PPG) 70
US Airways Announces Takeover Bid For Delta (LAT) 71
US Airways Proposes $8.7 Billion Delta Air Takeover (Update15) (BLOOM) 72
US Air Faces Long Road In Delta Bid (USAT) 74
US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (WT) 76
US Airways Proposes To Merge With Delta (WSJ) 77
Federal Watchdogs Likely To Approve Deal (AJC) 78
Hostile Approach Set To Face Tough Antitrust Probe (FT) 79
US Airways' $8 Billion Bid For Delta May Unleash New Consolidation (FWJD) 80
Do Fliers Gain When Airlines Consolidate? (WSJ) 81
US Airways Bid For Delta Could Spur Consolidations (FWST) ... 83
Let Delta Fly Right (LAT) 85
Micron Subpoenaed In Price-fixing Probe; Two Idahoans Sue (IDAHOST) 85
AT&T Merger May Face Further Scrutiny (SAEN) 86
Microsoft Still Short On Data, The EU Says (AP) 87

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Environmentalists Sue Bush Administration Over Global Warming Report (AP) 87
Court Asked To Rescind EPA Decision Allowing Field Burning (AP) 88
Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry (WP) 89
Isleta Settlement Gets Approval From Senate (AP) 90

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mob Reappears In Court (PHI) 90
U.S. Charges Detroit Man In Fentanyl Deaths (AP) 91
Feds Charge Suspect In Fentanyl Deaths (DN) 91
Notes: U.S. Rules Won't Be Party To Bode-type Behavior (USAT) 92
Bikers Sentenced For Meth-making (AP) 92
Meth Makers Get Prison (FREEP) 93
Police: Meth Crisis Minimized In Area (PHTH) 93
Livermore Seeks Permanent Ban On Marijuana Dispensaries (TH) 94
Gardena Joins Bans On Medical Marijuana Outlets (TDB) 94
Mexican Cartels Expand Meth Dealing In U.S. (ABC) 95
Meth, Ecstacy, Heroin Readily Available (WT/UPI) 96
Canada-based Drug Traffickers Peddling More Ecstasy In U.S., Says Report (CP) 96
U.S. Officials Troubled By Expansion Of Asian-Canadian Drug Gangs (GM) 97
Fugitives Answer Call To Surrender (USAT) 97

Immigration:

29 Immigrants Arrested For Visa Fraud (USAT) 99
DHS Watchdog Warns 'Fence' Cost Will Grow (WP) 99
We Must Start Over On Immigration Reform (HILL) 100
No Mandate For Amnesty (USAT) 101

Tax:

The Economic Agenda (WP) 102

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Put Nominations Back On Table (NYT) 102
White House Resubmits Appeals Court Nominees Opposed By Democrats (AP) 103
Bush Resubmits Six U.S. Appellate Court Nominees (Update1) (BLOOM) 103
Bush Renominates Judicial Picks (WP) 104
Bush Resubmits 6 For Judgeships (WT) 105
House, Senate Pass Stopgap Funding Bill (AP-Y) 106
Past Is Not Prologue For Gates (HILL) 106
Lott Beats Alexander 25-24 For Comeback (HILL) 107
Lott Returns To Senate Leadership (WSJ) 108
Senate Republicans Tap Lott For No. 2 Leadership Job (USAT)109
Republicans Return Lott To Leadership (AP-Y) 110
Trent Lott Rejoins Senate GOP Leadership (LAT) 111
In The End, It's Lott By A Single Ballot (RC) 112
Sen. Lott Returns To GOP Leadership With One-Vote Victory (CQ) 113
In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott (NYT) 114
Lott Rejoins Senate Leadership (WP) 115
Lott Returns To GOP Leadership Position (MCT) 116
The More Things Change ... (NYT) 118
Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents (NCP) 118
Senate GOP Focusing More On Big Picture Than Lame Duck (HILL) 119
May The Best Bulldog Win: GOP Rivals (HILL) 120

DOJ_NMG_0095203

To Learn From '06, We Must Heed Lessons Of '94 (RC) 122
Conservative Democrats Seek Larger Role (AP-Y) 122
'Tuesday Dogs' May Join Forces (RC) 123
What You Heard About 'Conservative Democrats' Winning Was Wrong (RC) 124
Which Bipartisanship Will Bush Choose? (WSJ) 125
Murtha Calls Ethics Bill 'Total Crap' (RC) 126
Many Say Leadership Race Damages Democrats' Image (NYT) 127
House Race Pits Murtha Vs. Ethics (WT) 128
Dem Division And Dismay (HILL) 129
Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions (LAT) 130
Pelosi Faces Leadership Test With Vote (AP-Y) 132
Pelosi Splits Democrats With Push For Murtha (WP) 133
New Congress Vows To Clean Up Act (CSM) 134
Pelosi's First Mistake (WP) 135
Same Old Congressional Hacks (LAT) 136
Pelosi And Pork (WSJ) 137
Black Lawmakers In Line For Key Posts (WP) 137
Blacks Eye Leading 5 House Committees (WT) 138
Reid Plotting Agenda (RC) 139
Time Of Testing For Harry Reid (WP) 140
Can The Democrats Deliver? (WP) 141
Pension Deficit Narrows At PBGC (WP/AP) 142
Government Admits Improper Farm Payments (AP-Y) 143
Rumsfeld Adviser Leaving For Think Tank (AP) 144
Pentagon's Travel System Is Hardly Used (AP) 144
Detroit And Bush (WSJ) 145

Other News:

Fed Points To Soft Landing For Economy (FT) 146
Fed Keeps Policy Attention Firmly On Inflation (WSJ) 146
Fed Bankers All Show Inflation Concerns (USAT) 147
What Slowdown? Stocks March On To Fresh Highs (WSJ) 148
In Second Coal Rush, New Mind-Set In The Mines (WP) 148
Most Students In Big Cities Lag Badly In Basic Science (NYT) 151
Urban Students Perform Worse At Science (AP) 152
KBR Becomes Separate Stock (USAT) 153
Dems May Expand Senate Majority In '08 (HILL) 153
Family-friendly Agenda Urged (WT) 155
Stan Greenberg And James Carville (CSM) 155
Flush Of Victory Past, Democrats Revert To Finger-Pointing (NYT) 156
Carville Says Dems Should Dump Dean Over "Rumsfeldian" Incompetence (AAS) 157
GOP's Simmons Concedes Conn. House Race (AP-Y) 158
Simmons Concedes Defeat To Courtney In Connecticut 2 (CQ) 158
2 Incumbent Dems Keep House Seats In Ga. (AP-Y) 159
Two Democrats Win In Georgia (NYT) 159
Grading The Pollsters (WSJ) 159
Putting Faith Before Politics (NYT) 161
Alabama Lazarus Act (WSJ) 163
McCain Committee Lays Groundwork For '08 Bid (USAT) 164
McCain Takes Step Toward White House Bid (AP-Y) 164
McCain Moves Toward '08 Presidential Run (LAT) 165
Ex-Bush Aide To Explore Presidential Run (AP-Y) 166
Analysis: Clinton Undecided On '08 Run (AP-Y) 167
Political Lessons (WP) 168
Bush's Asia Trip To Focus On Trade, Terrorism (LAT) 168
Asians Ask How Elections Affect Trade (USAT) 169
Bush Seeks To Reassure Allies On Trade (AP-Y) 170
Blow To Bush As Vietnam Trading Bill Rejected (FT) 171
Trade Bills Now Face Tough Odds (NYT) 172
Bad Start For Bipartisanship On Trade Issues (FT) 173
Bush, In Asia, Faces A Test Of Diplomatic Muscle (NYT) 174
Bush, Putin Discuss Iran, Korea (WT) 175
Bush's Visit To Vietnam Sparks Hope In Little Saigon (LAT) 175
Rice Backs Trying To Restart Trade Talks (AP) 176
Vietnam Studies Roots In Corruption Battle (WT) 177
Foreign Students Trickling Back To US (CSM) 178
Open Campuses (WP) 179
President Visits Briefly With Putin On Way To Asia (AP) 179
Bush And Putin To Sign WTO Deal In Hanoi (FT) 180
Democrats Blast Bush Policy On N. Korea (WP) 180
Democrats Urge N. Korea Nuclear Talks (AP) 181
Rice Urges Terror Finance Crackdown In NKorea Allusion (AFP) 182
North Korean Officials Proud Of Their Nuclear Test, U.S. Experts Say (MCT) 182
US Senator Seeks 10 Billion Dollars For North Korean Human Crisis (AFP) 183
White House Hunts For Way Into Iran Talks (FT) 184
As Pressure For Talks Grows, Iran And Syria Gain Leverage (WP) 184
Abba Olmert (WSJ) 185
Six Major Powers Fail To Bread Deadlock On Proposed UN Sanctions (AFP) 187
Iran Dismisses U.N. Report On Uranium (AP) 187
China Could Find Congress A Chillier Place (WSJ) 188
Palestinian Rocket Fire Kills Israeli Woman (WP) 189
Gaza Rocket Kills Israeli; Retaliatory Strike Launched (WT) 190
Hamas Claims Responsibility For Fatal Rocket Attack (CHIT) . 191
'Human Rights' Council (WSJ) 192
War Between Islamists, Government Is Brewing In Somalia (MCT) 192
GAO Audit Finds Waste In Cuban Aid Program (WP) 194
Report Cites Flaws In Cuba Aid Program (AP-Y) 195
More Cubans Take Trip To USA, Using Alternate Routes (USAT) 195
Empowering, Not Muzzling, Our Ambassadors (WP) 197
Kabila Wins Election Runoff In Congo (AP) 197
Incumbent Declared Winner In Congo Vote (WP) 198
'Glamorous' Socialist Seeks French Presidency (USAT) 199
Annan Faults 'Frightening Lack Of Leadership' For Global Warming (NYT) 200
Talks By India And Pakistan Make No Gains On Train Blasts (NYT) 201
Pakistan Moves Toward Altering Rape Law (NYT) 202
Pakistan Moves To Amend Rape Laws (WP/AP) 203
Support Builds For Libyan Dissident (WP) 204
Presidential Candidate Bucks Chavez Tide (AP) 205

DOJ_NMG_0095204

No Apartheid For Gays, Either (LAT)..... 206

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Prosecutors Urge Jurors To Convict Colombian Rebel Leader (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press
AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON – The government urged jurors Wednesday to convict Colombian rebel leader Ricardo Palmera, saying he should be held responsible in a plot to keep three Americans hostage, whatever his politics.

But the defense portrayed Palmera as a man who deserves jurors' benefit of the doubt as a tangential leftist sympathizer caught in the middle after trying to negotiate a deal between guerrilla fighters and the U.S.-backed Colombian government.

"By definition, if you're a rebel, no state is ever going to recognize you. By definition, a prosecutor is always waiting for you," said Palmera attorney Robert Tucker. "It tells you, 'Don't go for the labels of terrorist. Don't go for the misstatements of evidence.'"

In closing arguments, Justice Department attorney Kenneth Kohl exhorted the jury to look past the "political smoke" in the five-week trial of Palmera, who has called the aims of his FARC leftist group noble and peaceful.

"FARC is not above the law," Kohl said, as Palmera, dressed in khaki pants, a navy blazer and green tie, quietly scribbled on a notepad. "Holding people against their will for political purposes is what terrorism is."

Chief U.S. District Judge Thomas Hogan instructed the 12-member jury to begin deliberations Thursday in a case in which the lives of the three Americans – who are still being held in the thick jungles of south Colombia – may hang in the balance.

"You should not speculate on the impact your verdict might have on their situation," Hogan said, as relatives of the hostages – Marc Gonsalves, Thomas Howes and Keith Stansell – sat nearby.

Palmera, 56, is charged with hostage-taking, conspiracy and providing material support to terrorists after a plane carrying the U.S. military contractors encountered engine trouble and crashed in Colombia in February 2003.

Palmera, who is better known by his nom de guerre Simon Trinidad, was extradited in late 2004 after his capture in Ecuador. If convicted, Palmera could face 30 years in prison, the maximum allowed under the extradition treaty between Colombia and the United States.

FARC, listed by the U.S. government as a "foreign terrorist organization," is demanding that the Colombia government release all of the group's imprisoned members, including Palmera, in exchange for the release of some 60 hostages.

The hostages include the three Americans on the plane who authorities says were defense contractors involved in a counternarcotics mission.

President Alvaro Uribe recently broke off preliminary negotiations after blaming the rebel group for a car bombing in a military installation that injured more than 20 people, insisting that the hostages would be freed by military operations.

Visiting Washington on Monday, Uribe contended that imprisoning Palmera would ultimately lead to a more stable peace.

"Condemning the terrorists pushes away immediate peace, but constructs a solid peace," he said. "Not condemning the terrorists creates an artificial peace."

A former banker from a wealthy family, the Harvard-educated Palmera says he took up arms to fight social injustice. FARC, along with a smaller leftist rebel group, has battled to topple the Colombian government for 42 years in a conflict that has claimed more than 3,000 lives a year.

In the past six years, the U.S. government has provided $4 billion in mostly military aid to Colombia to fight the insurgency and the country's enormous drug trade.

US Argues Harsh Treatment Shouldn't Undercut Padilla Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey
The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095205

The case of suspected Al Qaeda sympathizer Jose Padilla is raising fundamental questions about whether a US citizen's harsh treatment - and alleged torture - while in US military custody should prevent his later prosecution in the criminal-justice system.

Lawyers for Mr. Padilla charge that he was tortured while being held for three years and eight months as an enemy combatant in a military prison in Charleston, S.C. The lawyers are asking that all criminal charges against him be dropped because of the government's alleged illegal and abusive treatment.

Federal prosecutors responded for the first time this week to the accusations, telling US District Judge Marcia Cooke in a written motion that Padilla was not tortured or abused. But even if he had been tortured, they added, there is no legal support for Padilla's request that all charges against him be dismissed.

"Padilla has not cited a single precedent absolutely barring a federal criminal prosecution because of alleged due process violations committed during a prior military detention," writes Assistant US Attorney Russell Killinger.

Padilla's case, pending in US District Court here, highlights the murky intersection between the Bush administration's open-ended interrogation of enemy combatants to collect intelligence and the subsequent transfer of an enemy combatant who is also a US citizen to face punishment in the criminal-justice system.

Padilla is best known for allegedly plotting with Al Qaeda to detonate a radiological "dirty bomb" in a major US city. But when he was transferred from military custody to the civilian court system in January to face criminal charges, the dirty-bomb plot and other detailed information obtained by military interrogators was excluded from the indictment.

Instead, he is facing a more general charge that he engaged in a loosely-defined conspiracy by becoming a recruit to help wage a violent jihad. Padilla denies the charge.

Padilla's lawyers first made their torture allegations in court papers filed last month. They said military interrogators engaged in torture - including administering the mind-altering drug LSD - to try to force Padilla to reveal all he knew about Al Qaeda.

"He was assaulted, threatened with imminent death, and subjected to myriad other deprivations during his captivity at the Naval Brig," according to a legal motion filed by Acting Federal Public Defender Michael Caruso, one of Padilla's appointed lawyers. "He was drugged and subjected to cruel interrogations" using stress positions, forced hypothermia, and sleep deprivation, the brief says.

But the most painful and damaging tactic, the brief says, was extreme isolation in a windowless 9-by-7-foot cell. "Extended periods of solitary confinement are the most severe deprivation of liberty - short of the death penalty - that the government imposes," Mr. Caruso writes.

Padilla's lawyers are asking Judge Cooke to dismiss all charges against Padilla because of what they say amounts to outrageous government conduct.

Prosecutors dispute the charge. "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture - allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence," writes Mr. Killinger.

He adds, "Even if this court were to believe all of the unsupported allegations in Padilla's motion and thereby concluded that he suffered 'shocking' due-process violations during his military detention (a claim the government disputes emphatically), dismissal of the indictment would nevertheless be unwarranted as a matter of law."

Killinger says the correct remedy for Padilla would be to sue his military interrogators in federal court for civil damages, or to seek government prosecution of the alleged torturers. But Killinger says that Padilla "is not entitled to a free pass from his own criminal conduct."

At issue in the defense motion and the prosecutor's reply brief is what standard the court should apply in assessing whether the government acted so outrageously in its treatment of Padilla that the case must be dismissed.

While the facts of Padilla's harsh treatment (if accurate) favor the defense, existing legal precedents favor the government.

The 11th US Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Miami, has been reluctant in the past to dismiss cases based on allegations of outrageous government conduct. Appeals court judges in the First, Sixth, and Seventh circuits have gone even further, declaring that the outrageous government conduct defense does not exist, according to the prosecutors' brief.

Defense lawyers began their argument in their brief not with a quote from a learned legal scholar but instead from philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. "Whoever fights monsters should see to it that in the process he does not become a monster."

Padilla's lawyers acknowledge that outrageous government conduct motions are rarely justified, and thus rarely granted. But they add: "The treatment of Mr. Padilla, a natural born citizen of the United States, is a blot on this nation's character, shameful in its disrespect for the rule of law, and should never be repeated."

Prosecutors say Padilla was lawfully detained by the military as an enemy combatant and that no information obtained during his interrogations will be used as evidence against him at his trial.

DOJ_NMG_0095206

Analysts who closely follow the case say the torture allegation is a potential blockbuster. "I think the judge is going to take a real serious look at whether this case should go forward or not," says David Oscar Markus, president of the Miami Chapter of the Florida Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "This judge has shown that she is not just going to roll over for what the government says. She's already dismissed some counts in the indictment and she is looking at what they have done very seriously."

Mr. Markus says the lack of existing legal precedents supporting dismissal may not matter in the Padilla torture issue. "There is no precedent for something like this because nothing like this has ever happened before," he says.

How the issue plays out from here may depend on whether Padilla's lawyers are able to present evidence of Padilla's torture in court, Markus says. Medical records from the Navy brig where Padilla was held in South Carolina could offer independent and reliable evidence of abuse, if he was provided medical care as the government claims.

"Padilla's conditions of confinement were humane and designed to ensure his safety and security," the government's brief says. "While in the brig Padilla never reported any abusive treatment to the staff or medical personnel."

Lawyers Try To Stop Gitmo Med Procedure (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky

AP, November 15, 2006

An attorney for a Guantanamo Bay detainee has asked a judge to block a planned medical procedure on the prisoner's heart, saying that performing it at the U.S. base puts his life at risk.

Saifullah A. Paracha, a 69-year-old multimillionaire businessman from Karachi, Pakistan, already had one heart attack while in U.S. custody and in recent days has suffered chest pains, his lawyers said. Doctors plan to perform a cardiac catheterization on Paracha this month at the isolated Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in southeast Cuba.

Gaillard T. Hunt, one of Paracha's attorneys, asked a federal court in Washington Tuesday to block it, saying Guantanamo lacks the medical facilities for the procedure and sufficient backup in case anything goes wrong.

Hunt said it should be carried out in a hospital in the United States or Pakistan.

"There is no excuse for risking petitioner Paracha's life by subjecting him to this procedure at Guantanamo," Hunt said in an emergency petition, a copy of which was provided to The Associated Press.

Transferring Paracha to a hospital in the United States could present legal complications for the Bush administration, which has maintained that because the Guantanamo detainees were picked up overseas and are being held on foreign land, they may be detained indefinitely without charges or trial. A new law strips foreign "enemy combatants" held anywhere by the United States of their right to contest their detention in court. That law is being challenged.

Paracha's legal team has no ulterior motives, said another of his lawyers, Zachary Philip Katznelson.

"Our goal here is not anything duplicitous or underhanded to get court jurisdiction," he said in a telephone interview. "It is to get decent medical care."

The government is to reply to Hunt's petition by Friday. The case was expected to be argued in court on Monday, Hunt said.

Katznelson said he found Paracha chained to a bed at the base hospital when he visited Guantanamo on Nov. 7 and 9.

"All four limbs were shackled to the bed," and there wasn't enough slack in the chains to enable Paracha to turn over, he complained.

During a cardiac catheterization, a doctor inserts a thin plastic tube into an artery or vein in the arm or leg and pushes it into the chambers of the heart or into the coronary arteries to measure blood pressure within the heart and blood oxygen levels.

Army Lt. Col. Lora Tucker said from Guantanamo that its medical facilities "are excellent" and that additional specialists and medical equipment could be brought to the U.S. Navy base as needed.

"We are committed to preserving the health and lives of all detainees," Tucker said in an e-mail to AP. She declined to discuss Paracha because it was against policy to discuss a specific detainee's heath.

There have been three deaths among detainees at Guantanamo since it began taking in men captured in Afghanistan and other areas in January 2002 — all suicides on June 10. Some 430 men are currently held at the prison camp.

On Nov. 7, Paracha suffered chest pains at Guantanamo and a medical technician was brought in. His pulse had dropped to 46 beats per minute and his blood pressure was around 90 over 58, Katznelson said in a statement to the court.

Paracha suffered his first heart attack in 1995 and had a second one in 2003 while in U.S. military custody at Bagram Air Base in Afghanistan, Katznelson said. His family in Pakistan, concerned about his health, has urged Pakistan's government to seek his return home for treatment.

A computer science graduate of the New York Institute of Technology, Paracha was arrested on arrival in Bangkok, Thailand, in July 2003, held in isolation for 14 months in Afghanistan and then sent to Guantanamo.

DOJ_NMG_0095207

Paracha has acknowledged meeting Osama bin Laden twice, but denied making investments for al-Qaida members, translating statements for bin Laden, joining in a plot to smuggle explosives into the United States or recommending that nuclear weapons be used against U.S. soldiers.

German Court Finds Sept. 11 Terrorist Guilty Of Abetting Murder (BLOOM)

By Claudia Rach

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 16 (Bloomberg) -- Germany's highest criminal court found Mounir el-Motassadeq guilty of abetting the murder of more than 200 people in the Sept. 11 attacks in the U.S., overturning part of a lower court's decision.

The Federal Court of Justice today upheld the lower court's ruling that el-Motassadeq, a 32-year-old Moroccan, was guilty of being a member of the Hamburg terror cell that participated in the attacks.

El-Motassadeq's seven-year jail sentence will be reassessed by the Hamburg Higher Regional Court, according to today's decision.

The case number is 3 StR 139/06.

German 9/11 Trial Underscores Need For Better Global Cooperation (CSM)

By Mary Wiltenburg

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

If convicted terrorist-cell member Mounir el-Motassadeq walks free Thursday from a German courtroom, he may have US security policy to thank.

Direct and respectful before his judges, Mr. Motassadeq is less well-known than recently sentenced 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, whose courtroom theatrics drew broad attention to his trial in the US.

But the dramatic legal odyssey of the first man ever tried in connection with the Sept. 11 attacks has been the focus of bitter recrimination between German and US officials, who have denied the case's lawyers access to statements from a key witness.

As both countries attempt to strike the right balance between national security and the rule of law, observers say the case is a prime example of why it will take better global cooperation to succeed in the war on terror.

"The information-sharing problem is the key to fighting international terrorism," says law professor Joachim Wolf of Ruhr University in Bochum. "This [case] has been a disaster. But even a disaster can be a first step for developing something."

Since Motassadeq's first trial opened in 2002, the Moroccan citizen's case has taken numerous turns: In 2003, he was found guilty of abetting the murder of 3,066 people. On appeal, he was declared wrongly convicted. In a second trial, he was sentenced to seven years for membership in a terrorist organization. This February, he was released on bond pending resolution of appeals. Thursday, the German Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling that might clear Motassadeq of all charges, return him to prison, or grant him a third trial that could reinstate the accessory-to-murder charges.

The key question before the court is whether Motassadeq's second trial erred in sentencing him so lightly, given his close association with three of the 9/11 hijackers: Mohamed Atta, Marwan al Shehhi, and Ziad Jarrah.

A one-time roommate and a member of their Islamic study group in Hamburg, Motassadeq handled business affairs for the men while they trained at Al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan, then went there himself to train. When his friends left Germany to enroll in US flight schools, Motassadeq offered to look out for Mr. Jarrah's girlfriend. He paid bills from Mr. al Shehhi's bank account. He signed Mr. Atta's will.

All along, Motassadeq has maintained that one man could prove his innocence: Ramzi Binalshibh. Referred to by the 9/11 Commission Report as the fourth member of the Hamburg cell and a 9/11 plotter, Mr. Binalshibh was held in an undisclosed CIA facility from his 2002 capture until September, when he was one of 14 "high value" suspects moved to the US military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Since 2002, German courts have repeatedly requested access to Binalshibh. Despite numerous appeals, including two personal visits to the US by the German prosecutor, American intelligence services have refused, saying such a move would jeopardize national security.

Consequently, defense lawyer Udo Jacob argues, evidence that might have showed Motassadeq's innocence "was not considered, and I think this is a big fault in the sentence."

In Motassadeq's first trial, a Hamburg court convicted him on the basis of other evidence - evidence which "could hardly have been poorer," wrote University of Erlangen-Nürnberg law professor Christoph Safferling in a 2004 article.

But in February 2004, the same court acquitted Motassadeq's friend, Abdelghani Mzoudi, of identical charges for lack of evidence. The following month, Motassadeq's conviction was overturned.

DOJ_NMG_0095208

These developments drew an outcry from the German press. Judges raged, and federal prosecutor Kay Nehm criticized US lack of cooperation as "incomprehensible." American critics countered that German courts were soft on terrorists.

"I think what is difficult for Americans to understand is how important it is to Germans to keep up the rule of law after the Nazi era," says Loammi Blaauw-Wolf, a lawyer who analyzed the decisions for the German Law Journal. "Even if it's a terrorist, or somebody suspected of such serious crimes, they are always willing to give him the benefit of the doubt and to give him a fair trial."

When Motassadeq's second trial began later that year, the US provided the court six pages of summarized statements by Binalshibh and two other men in their custody - Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Mohamedou Ould Slahi. The summary indicated that Motassadeq had no knowledge of the 9/11 plot.

Although they eventually entered the pages into evidence, German courts were hesitant to do so. There was no way to prove, judges argued, that the statements had not been extracted under torture. The US declined to elaborate on the circumstances under which they were taken.

"This was a very uncomfortable situation," says Dr. Wolf, "uncomfortable for German judges, and for German laws as a whole." Lawyers in the case also expressed reservations about the evidence.

"I don't know if it's trustworthy or not," says attorney Sven Leistikow, who represents 9/11 victims' families. "For me as a European, that's not something I can work with. It's like something from the Inquisition."

Considering the countries' joint histories, says Dr. Blaauw-Wolf, judges' concern with strict fidelity to the Geneva Conventions should come as no surprise. After all, she says, it was America's own Marshall Plan that brought the rule of law to Germany. This week, human rights groups filed suit in Berlin against high-ranking US officials, including outgoing Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, for authorizing torture at Abu Ghraib prison in Iraq.

Now, prosecutors in the Motassadeq case claim they have new evidence that could secure a fair verdict. Some observers wonder whether the US will allow Germany access to Binalshibh, now that he has requested a lawyer. US State, Justice, and Defense Department officials declined to comment on the possibility. Policy analysts have argued that disclosing such intelligence information in court runs the risk of exposing sensitive sources, or of transmitting key information to terrorists not yet apprehended.

A Better Way To Fight Terrorism (WP)

By John Hamre

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

In the warm glow of post-election bipartisanship, Congress and President Bush would do well to take on a crucial task: forging a new legal foundation for the global war on terrorism. The current policy framework is a disaster. While I know it's not true, still, the world believes that America condones torture, prison camps and "disappearance" tactics.

Let me recount an analogy. I remember a day back in 1986, when I was working for the Senate Armed Services Committee. An intelligence officer told me that the Navy had just recovered a Soviet sonobuoy and, in taking it apart for intelligence assessment, our government had discovered an American-designed computer chip -- one that we had not yet even certified for production in our own systems. The Soviet Union clearly had superior intelligence and counterintelligence capabilities.

But these did not make the Soviets strong enough to overcome their fundamental flaw. In fact, they were doomed because their whole social construct was built on a lie. America and its allies were victorious because they embraced transcendent government values of freedom, liberty, accountability and transparency. Our ideals and their practice brought hope to millions around the world and drew our allies closer to us.

The United States will lose the global war on terrorism if we feel we must adopt tactics that undermine our civic values. For generations the world has admired America's commitment to the rule of law and government accountability. Much of the world now questions that commitment.

President Bush was right to say that the previous framework of international legal norms did not anticipate al-Qaeda-type combatants. But the administration failed to follow through to lead the world to a new legal framework. And the policies that led to Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib, secret renditions and warrantless wiretaps have undermined America's towering moral authority.

The compromises of the final days before Congress recessed for the midterm election only muddied the waters. Political urgency infected an honest search for a durable policy framework.

This is an opportunity for constructive bipartisanship. The election is over. Instead of defaulting to the blue-ribbon-commission model, we should ask Congress to work on this problem. Let's ask the leadership to create a special select committee, made up of the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Armed Services, Foreign Relations, Intelligence and

DOJ_NMG_0095209

Judiciary committees, to work together for six months. They should assemble a panel of advisers consisting of politicians and jurists of excellent reputation -- people such as Sandra Day O'Connor, Sam Nunn, John Danforth and John Glenn.

We do need a new framework and a new national consensus, one that meets the challenges of this new enemy and is consistent with our tradition as the most revolutionary nation in history; one that holds the rule of law and government accountability inviolable by even the most powerful politicians.

We can prevail in the long war only if America recovers its tarnished inspirational powers and draws to its side the enthusiastic support of friends and allies.

The writer, a former deputy secretary of defense, is president of the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Dirty Bombs: A Nation Unprepared (KTVT)

By Robert Riggs

KTVT-TV, November 16, 2006

(CBS 11 News) FBI ACADEMY - QUANTICO, Virginia Handheld devices set off the telltale clicking sound that signals the presence of radioactive material as elite FBI units practice collecting evidence from the scene of a "dirty bomb" attack. Agents gather outside the nation's capital at the FBI's Training Academy in Quantico, Virginia to train on how to prevent or identify the perpetrators of such an attack.

Nuclear terror experts consider the dirty bomb is a weapon of choice for inflicting psychological and economic chaos in an urban setting. A dirty bomb uses conventional explosives to pulverize and disperse radioactive material into the air.

Travis Callaway, a nuclear specialist with the FBI, says it's easy for terrorists to get their hands on the key ingredients. "Getting an industrial or medical isotope is not that difficult to come by. There are literally millions of sources around the world. They are used in industry and medical purposes all the time. Most are not guarded at all or under simple lock and key."

Two dozen response teams, based at FBI offices across the country, receive 300 hours of specialized training on weapons of mass destruction. Their detection equipment can pick up rays emitted by everything from low grade radioactive materials to nuclear weapons.

The teams maintain a low profile at high profile events says John Fraga the chief of the Hazardous Materials Response Unit. "The majority of our work in prevention has been deploying to special events or events that would attract the attention of certain groups. Having us on site is certainly the better thing to have so we can assess threats and packages and things like that."

The units spend most of their time assessing the scientific plausibility of threats such as the phony threat posted on a website last month about dirty bomb attacks on NFL stadiums.

A dirty bomb is considered a weapon of 'mass disruption' capable of inflicting devastating economic damage rather than mass casualties. The radioactive contamination could shut down a wide swath of a city's business district, and neighborhoods that were located downwind from the point of detonation, for years, if not for decades. The cleanup could cost billions of dollars and all commercial insurance policies sold in the United States appear to exclude damage from radiation according to a study by the National Defense University.

"It's not going to kill a lot of people but it can cause a lot of contamination. It can cause a lot of social and psychological disruption and economic effects," says Charles Ferguson, Council on Foreign Relations. "I think that's why a lot of terrorist groups might be attracted to the dirty bomb."

Ferguson was a nuclear engineering officer on a U.S. Navy ballistic missile submarine and recently warned, in a report titled Preventing Catastrophic Nuclear Terrorism, that the threat of nuclear attack by terrorists has never been greater.

The physicist says there is a lot of worry that the government is not prepared especially in the wake of its slow response to Hurricane Katrina.

"We are still a long way from having the ability to quickly decontaminate under the most strenuous circumstances," Ferguson says. "We need to be doing more realistic exercises to train our first responders and our political leadership to deal with that kind of event."

Ferguson recommends that the government stockpile decontamination supplies and medications to treat radiation sickness outside major urban areas.

First responders also can't precisely predict where the fallout from a dirty bomb would spread to and who would be exposed to the long term effects of low level radiation.

DOJ_NMG_0095210

"The biggest issue with the aftermath of a dirty bomb is you can't see it, you can't smell it, you can't taste it, and you don't know where it is. If in downtown Dallas we detected radiation, what part of downtown Dallas do we evacuate? My guess is as soon as the word got out that there's a radiation release in Dallas everybody is going to try to get out of that city," said Ron Chesser, Texas Tech University scientist.

Chesser looks for answers in the aftermath of the world's worst nuclear power plant disaster at Chernobyl in the Ukraine. For the past 12 years, Chesser and his colleagues from the Center for Environmental Radiation Studies in Lubbock have traveled to Pripyat in the Ukraine to study the effects of radiation released from Chernobyl's reactor meltdown in 1986.

Radioactive fallout from the explosion forced 135,000 people living downwind in Pripyat to permanently abandon their homes in what was considered at that time the most modern city in the Soviet Union. Chesser points to ghostly photographs.

Pictures taken before and after disaster show a once vibrant life in parks and high rises virtually frozen in time just as frightened residents had suddenly left it twenty-years ago. A poignant sign reads, "Our Home. It will protect us." School children's homework assignments still sit on desks in vacant class rooms, history books about Lenin stand on the shelves.

The Texas Tech scientists measured 2,500 points of radiation around the city and created a three-dimensional computer model of every structure. At the click of a computer mouse, two animated plumes of red colored radioactive fallout blossom from the reactor site and spread across the region showing the path of the radioactive cloud.

Chesser is trying to produce a mathematical model that will help first responders in the U.S. see the dispersal pattern of fallout from a dirty bomb and show what areas need to be evacuated. "The flow of particles through an urban canyon is a complex process mathematically. It's very difficult to estimate because weather and winds are unpredictable, especially winds around buildings and in and amongst buildings and down avenues."

The Soviet experience indicates that a dirty bomb could trigger widespread panic. Chesser says the residents of Scandinavian countries located hundreds of miles away may have over reacted in the absence of accurate information. "In the two or three years after the Chernobyl accident there were over a hundred thousand voluntary abortions by expectant parents. They chose this path because of the fear of congenital birth defects."

U.S. public health authorities are also unprepared to tell people if they will later suffer from cancer, according to Chesser. He says it's hard to get the government to invest in studies about the effects of exposure to low dose radiation. "Unfortunately, all we can give the victims are statistics and statistics are pretty cold when you are talking to an individual about their specific health risk."

Rather than panic and run from a dirty bomb Chesser says, "The safest thing would be to stay put inside a building, closing the windows and the ventilation system so you don't inhale or ingest the radioactive particles."

At the current pace of research and planning, reliable safety advice from the government may be a long time coming.

Feds Bust UMass Student For Sears Tower Bomb Hoax (BOSH)

By O'Ryan Johnson

Boston Herald, November 16, 2006

A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts student sent a booze-fueled bomb hoax to the National Security Agency, claiming a man he'd randomly plucked from facebook.com was planning a suicide attack on the Sears Tower, according to an FBI affidavit.

Agents yesterday arrested Adam Hart of Georgetown, at UMass Amherst, where he now goes to school. He attended UMass-Dartmouth at the time of the incident. He pleaded not guilty to malicious conveying of false information and was released on a $10,000 unsecured bond. A woman at the Hart home declined to comment.

"I was drunk and was searching for a variety of novelty names, (sluts, athletes, ect.. (sic))," Hart wrote in a letter of apology to the National Security Agency. "At one point I searched for Osamah. When the name Osamah Abdallah came up I sent him a message."

That message sparked an exchange with Abdallah, a Loyola University student, that ended when Hart woke up after another long night of drinking and e-mailed the NSA, the affidavit states.

"I had gone out to drink again but this time it was in excess," Hart wrote in his apology letter. 'I was still a little angry from his message and was trying to be funny in front of my roommate . . . At this point I wrote the email to the NSA."

That e-mail, sent April 22, sparked a massive effort to gird the nation's tallest building against a possible suicide bomb attack. Meanwhile, agents from the Joint Terrorism Task Forces hunted down Abdallah and yanked him from a Loyola classroom. He showed agents his facebook.com profile and showed them his response to Hart's e-mail, which he described as sad, since such a hateful person shared the name "Adam" with a biblical prophet, the affidavit states.

Judge Rejects Request To Strike Don't-tell-how-to-make-a-bomb Law (SDUT)

DOJ_NMG_0095211

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, November 16, 2006

SAN DIEGO – A local federal judge has rejected a radical activist's request to invalidate a law making it illegal to tell people how to make a firebomb with the intention that they go out and commit a violent crime.

Rodney Coronado, 40, of Tucson, argued that the law infringed upon the First Amendment protections of free speech.

Judge Jeffrey A. Miller Wednesday sided with prosecutors, who said the law was tailored to apply to specific criminal activity which the government has a responsibility to control.

The law, enacted after the 1995 bombing of a federal building in Oklahoma City, makes it a crime to "teach or demonstrate" how to make an explosive, destructive device or weapon of mass destruction intending that the information be used to commit a federal crime of violence.

On Aug. 1, 2003, Coronado gave a speech in Hillcrest in which, in response to a question from the audience, he demonstrated how he made a gasoline-fueled device he used to burn down a Michigan State University laboratory in 1992.

Hours earlier, an arson fire destroyed a huge housing complex under construction in University City causing $50 million in damage. A group for which Coronado has acted as spokesman, the Earth Liberation Front, or ELF, took credit.

Coronado has not been charged in connection with that arson, but he was charged with breaking the law on telling people how to make a destructive device.

His lawyer, Gerald Singleton, argued that he was within his First Amendment rights to talk about the Michigan arson, for which he served a prison term.

Miller disagreed.

"Here, the deterrent effect of (the statute) on legitimate expression is insubstantial and remote," he said.

He also ruled that other objections to the law will be decided after witnesses testify at a trial, which has not yet been scheduled.

Prosecutor John Parmley was not available for comment Wednesday.

Onell Soto: (619) 293-1280; onell.soto@uniontrib.com

Steven Hatfill Demands Fines For N.Y. Times (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, November 16, 2006

A former Army scientist suing the New York Times for libel has asked a federal judge to fine the newspaper $25,000 a day for refusing to disclose its confidential sources and to increase the fine amount by $25,000 each month in an attempt to encourage the paper to comply.

The scientist, Steven Hatfill, contends that a series of Times columns fingered him as responsible for the anthrax mailings in 2001 that terrorized the nation and killed at least five people. While the FBI searched Mr. Hatfill's home and the Justice Department eventually named him as a "person of interest" in the anthrax case, neither the scientist nor anyone else was ever charged in connection with the crimes.

Last month, a federal magistrate in Alexandria, Va., where Mr. Hatfill's suit was filed, ordered the Times to identify the sources for the five columns in dispute. A federal judge upheld the order, but the newspaper indicated the author of the columns, Nicholas Kristof, would persist in refusing to name his sources.

"There has been a certain 'heads I win, tails you lose' quality to the Times's litigation of this issue so far," an attorney for Mr. Hatfill, Thomas Connolly, wrote in a motion urging the fines. "In order to ensure that the officers, directors, and shareholders of the Times are fully involved in determining whether it wishes to ignore the judicial power of the United States, this court should impose a significant monetary sanction for each day of non-compliance."

Mr. Connolly painted the Times's refusal to comply as brazen and willful. "Courts, not newspapers, decide what evidence must be presented in court when the administration of justice so requires," the lawyer wrote.

In a filing yesterday, counsel for the Times called the proposed fines "extreme, over-reaching and unwarranted."

Attorneys for the Times insist that the newspaper is simply preserving its right to appeal the order to disclose its sources.

The Times also noted that 10 of the 12 sources Mr. Kristof relied on are known to Mr. Hatfill, either because they were not granted confidentiality or agreed to waive it. As a result, the names of only two sources are being withheld. Mr. Kristof has said both were FBI employees.

The Times's lawyers also said Mr. Hatfill deliberately delayed giving his deposition in the case and that his attorneys' bid to block further discovery by the Times is part of "a ruse designed to insulate plaintiff from giving any testimony under oath at all."

A court hearing on the proposed sanctions is set for tomorrow.

DOJ_NMG_0095212

Lawyer Disputes Feds' Claim That His Client Engaged In 'Overt Sexual Activity' On Airliner (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - RALEIGH, North Carolina-A man arrested for allegedly engaging in "overt sexual activity" with his girlfriend on an airliner was lying with his head on her lap because he was not feeling well, his attorney said.

That gesture was misinterpreted by a flight attendant, who humiliated and harassed the couple, said attorney Deb Newton, who represents Carl Persing.

Persing and Dawn Sewell, both of Lakewood, California, face federal charges of interfering with flight crew members, allegedly by disobeying a flight attendant's request that they stop their public displays of affection.

They were arrested on Sept. 15 when they arrived at Raleigh-Durham International Airport on a Southwest Airlines flight from Los Angeles.

"The one witness I've talked to and the defendant dispute almost everything in the government's affidavit as to what happened on that airplane," Newton said.

She said Persing suffers from a chronic disease requiring medication that makes him drowsy, dizzy and irritable. She would not identify the disease to protect her client's privacy.

Newton said she will ask that the charges be dismissed.

Sewell's lawyer did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Allard Lobbies For Supermax Funding (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, November 15, 2006

U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., met today with U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez to seek support in adding $12 million to the Commerce, Justice and State Appropriations bill to fund a perimeter fence at Supermax in Florence.

Allard's office said that during the meeting, Gonzalez pledged to work with Allard to address the funding issue for the fence.

The prison holds a number of the nation's most notorious terrorists such as 9/11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui and 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef.

A Justice Department inspector general's report in September criticized the prison for a number of shortcomings, including a lack of security and failure to monitor the mail.

"Today's meeting was extremely productive," said Allard. "Attorney General Gonzales assured me that the mail deficiencies raised in the inspector general's report are being addressed, and he agreed to discuss the need for a perimeter fence with the Bureau of Prisons director and follow up with me on the potential avenues to funding the fence."

Allard conducted a tour of the facility on Oct. 30 and met with local law enforcement, prison guards and community officials to hear their concerns regarding prison operations.

He then met last Thursday with Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley G. Lappin to explain the issues raised in the meeting.

"I have taken the concerns raised to me during my visit to Supermax and the meeting with Florence citizens back to Washington and have brought them directly to the attention of the director of the Bureau of Prisons and to the attorney general," said Allard.

"Supermax houses some of the most dangerous prisoners in the country and we need to ensure we are doing everything needed to protect the prison personnel and the surrounding communities."

WAR NEWS:

General: Hold Off On Iraq Pullout (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The top U.S. commander in the Middle East urged Congress to resist withdrawing American troops from Iraq any time soon, a stance that drew sharp disagreement from top Republicans and Democrats.

A week after the midterm election in which voters said changing Iraq policy was a top priority, Gen. John Abizaid told House and Senate committees that military commanders are analyzing possible policy options for President Bush.

"We have every option on the table, all the way from increasing our U.S. combat forces down to withdrawing our U.S. forces," Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. Iraq has no more than six months to quell sectarian violence before it rages out of control, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095213

Still, Abizaid said he would not recommend cutting or adding troops. That position drew criticism from two prominent members of the panel contemplating presidential bids in 2008.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think the status quo and the rate of progress is acceptable, when the American people do not," said Arizona Republican John McCain.

Abizaid objected, saying he wanted quicker progress in Iraq. He said a major focus of that effort is working with the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

"We must stick with them until such time as they show us they can't do it," he said.

New York Democrat Hillary Clinton, another possible presidential contender, said that point had passed.

"I see very little indication that there has been a resolution within the Iraqi government that the violence must stop," she said.

Carl Levin, the Michigan Democrat who will take over as committee chairman in January, continued to press his plan to tell Iraqi leaders that American troops will begin to be withdrawn in four to six months. Levin said that's the best way to "stop the march down the path to full-blown civil war."

Abizaid said withdrawing troops would undercut Iraq's government and cause more violence. Adding a large number of U.S. troops also is a bad idea, Abizaid said. "I believe more American forces would prevent the Iraqis from doing more," Abizaid said.

David Satterfield, the State Department's Iraq adviser, told lawmakers the Bush administration was willing to talk to officials in neighboring Iran. Although Satterfield said both Iran and Syria were "negative actors" in Iraq by supporting armed groups, he only ruled out talks with Syria.

The Bush administration has rejected previous calls for talks with Tehran, saying Iran must first stop its uranium-enrichment programs.

General Warns Against Iraq Exit Timeline (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

General John Abizaid, the top US commander in the Middle East, on Wednesday warned that a phased withdrawal of US troops within six months, which some Democrats want, would increase sectarian violence in Iraq.

Gen Abizaid also drew the ire of John McCain, the Arizona senator and Republican frontrunner for the 2008 presidential race, by saying he did not believe more troops would help the US stop the bloodshed in the war-torn country.

"I believe more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, taking more responsibility for their future," Gen Abizaid said at a contentious Senate armed services hearing.

Democrats, and many Republicans, are stepping up pressure on the Bush administration to change course in Iraq in the wake of last week's congressional elections, which were largely seen as a referendum on US policy on Iraq.

"I am…disappointed that basically you're advocating that status quo here today which I think the American people in the last election said that is not an acceptable condition for the American people," Mr McCain told Gen Abizaid.

Gen Abizaid was testifying before the committee for the first time since President George W. Bush announced last week that he was replacing Donald Rumsfeld, defence secretary, with Robert Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

In August, Gen Abizaid told the same committee that Iraq could descend into civil war if the violence in Baghdad was not curtailed. But on Wedneday he said he believed the situation in Iraq had improved since then.

The four-star general said that while the level of violence in Iraq "remain dangerously high" he remains "optimistic" that the US can stabilise Iraq.

Many Democrats, including Carl Levin, who will become chairman of the Senate armed services committee in January, argue that the US needs to pressure the Iraqis by announcing a timetable to start withdrawing troops within four to six months.

But Gen Abizaid stressed that setting timelines for withdrawals would impede the US effort in Iraq. "We need flexibility to manage our forces...Caps and specific timetables limit that flexibility," he said.

Facing Withdrawal Demands, Abizaid Calls For More Troops (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — The commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East said Wednesday that he had requested an increase in the number of U.S. military advisers in Iraq and had sent another 2,000-Marine unit into the country's restive western region.

DOJ_NMG_0095214

In two back-to-back hearings on Capitol Hill, Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, head of U.S. Central Command, resisted calls by Democrats for troop withdrawals, saying it would lead to further sectarian violence.

He defended plans for keeping troop levels at or slightly above the current 141,000 and said he remained optimistic that Iraq could become stable.

Abizaid was met with deep skepticism in the Senate, where even Republicans who have supported the war questioned his judgment on troop levels and his optimistic assessment of Iraqi security forces.

The criticism signaled a more active role by members of Congress in challenging the Bush administration on the war's conduct.

With Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld's pending departure and the Democratic takeover of Congress, top generals are likely to face greater criticism.

"I must say that I come to this hearing with a great deal of skepticism, because, prior to this hearing, there's been a great deal of obfuscation by the witnesses in front of this committee as to what the truth is," said Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla.

The heightened tension, and Abizaid's defense of troop levels, came amid signs that the Pentagon and White House are considering a significant shift in Iraq policy.

In addition to a report from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group and a separate review by the Pentagon's Joint Staff, the administration said Wednesday that President Bush had ordered an internal review by the National Security Council that would bring together the thinking of various government agencies on how to move forward in Iraq.

"(Bush) thought it was high time that these reviews be brought together and put in an integrated form, so he can get a look at it and begin getting in his own mind what the way forward needs to be in Iraq," Stephen Hadley, the national security adviser, told reporters traveling to Asia with Bush on Air Force One.

Against a barrage of questions from some lawmakers calling for phased withdrawals and others advocating an increase in troops, Abizaid defended the status quo, warning against timetables and insisting current troop levels were adequate to quell violence and help prepare Iraqi forces.

"Our troop posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Abizaid said.

The assessment was supported by Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, who argued in testimony later Wednesday that the presence of U.S. forces was the bulwark against the breakdown of central authority in Iraq.

Maples told the Senate panel that sectarian violence was on the rise and was undermining public support for the government and the nascent Iraqi military.

"I think we still have the opportunity for success, but it will be a very difficult process to get us to where we want to be, both from a security standpoint and from a political standpoint, in Iraq," Maples said.

Abizaid said that although sectarian violence remained at unacceptably high levels, it had declined since August, when he told the same Senate committee that Iraq was at risk of sliding into civil war.

Abizaid's steadfastness on troop levels drew ire from lawmakers on both sides of the aisle, particularly Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a probable 2008 presidential contender who has become the most vocal advocate for an increase in U.S. troops in Iraq.

Seizing on Abizaid's acknowledgment that western Anbar province was not under coalition control and that troops who might have been used to secure the Sunni insurgent stronghold had been diverted to Baghdad, McCain said Abizaid was failing to prevent a return of insurgent control.

"Wouldn't it make sense to ... get both Baghdad and al-Anbar province under control before we have another battle of Fallujah and lose many more lives?" McCain said. "I don't understand that tactic, General."

Abizaid conceded that sending 20,000 additional troops into Iraq might temporarily quell violence, but he said it also would upset American efforts to get the Iraqi government to take more responsibility for the country's internal security.

Abizaid added that, even if it were in Iraq's best interest to increase the presence of U.S. forces, it would be difficult for the Pentagon to find additional combat troops without increasing the size of the active-duty military.

Nonetheless, Abizaid acknowledged that he planned to increase troop levels in the near term. Abizaid ordered the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit, which has been on ships in the Persian Gulf for months as a backup reserve force, into Iraq.

A Defense official said the Marines already had landed in Kuwait ahead of their deployment to Anbar, which has continued to see some of the fiercest fighting between American forces and insurgents.

In addition, Abizaid said he would request that the number of military advisers in Iraq be "substantially increased," largely by adding to the size of the nearly 300 embedded teams, now composed of 11 soldiers each. He said the number was still being worked out by his staff.

The general said he believed the United States had four to six months to get violence in Iraq under control before it reached a level at which it might be impossible to contain. Army Gen. George W. Casey, commander of coalition forces in Iraq, said last month that he believed Iraqi forces would be able to take over security operations in 12 to 18 months. Abizaid said he was working to speed up that timetable.

DOJ_NMG_0095215

General Warns Of Risks In Iraq If G.I.'s Are Cut (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon, Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — The top American military commander for the Middle East said Wednesday that to begin a significant troop withdrawal from Iraq over the next six months would lead to an increase in sectarian killings and hamper efforts to persuade the Iraqi government to make the difficult decisions needed to secure the country.

The commander, Gen. John P. Abizaid, made it clear that he did not endorse the phased troop withdrawals being proposed by Democratic lawmakers. Instead, he said the number of troops in Iraq might be increased by a small amount as part of new plans by American commanders to improve the training of the Iraqi Army.

General Abizaid did not rule out a larger troop increase, but he said the American military was stretched too thin to make such a step possible over the long term. And he said such an expansion might dissuade the Iraqis from making more of an effort to provide for their own security.

"We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect," he said. "But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps."

General Abizaid also publicly said for the first time that the American position in Iraq had been undermined by the Bush administration's decision not to deploy a larger force to stabilize the country in 2003. That decision was made after Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, the Army chief of staff at the time, told Congress that several hundred thousand troops would be needed. His testimony was derided by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, and the general was ostracized at the Pentagon before his retirement a few months later.

"General Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations," General Abizaid said. "I think you can look back and say that more American troops would have been advisable in the early stages of May, June, July."

The testimony, given to the Senate and House Armed Services Committees, was the first by the American commander since August, and it followed several months of setbacks in Iraq that helped to fuel the Democratic victories in last week's election. Skepticism among lawmakers from both parties was palpable, and the concerns of the lawmakers were reinforced by intelligence officials who testified later in the day and who painted a more pessimistic portrait of the violence in Iraq than General Abizaid did.

Among the Iraq policy reviews now under way is an effort by the Iraq Study Group, led by James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, and a separate administration study ordered by President Bush.

Under the immediate initiative that General Abizaid described, the number of American military advisers working with Iraqi forces will be increased, with advisers to be assigned even to small Iraqi units with fewer than 200 soldiers.

"We need to put more American capacity into Iraqi units to make them more capable in their ability to confront the sectarian problem," General Abizaid told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "It is possible that we might have to go up in troop levels in order to increase the number of forces that go into the Iraqi security forces, but I believe that's only temporary."

The next steps in Iraq were very much on the mind of lawmakers on Wednesday. Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, cited the concerns of Marine Corps officers in Anbar Province in complaining that General Abizaid had not dispatched enough forces to defeat the insurgency there. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, said the Iraqi government was not taking the steps needed to win the trust of the population and improve security.

In their testimony on Wednesday, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said they agreed with General Abizaid that American forces were one of the few elements keeping a lid on violence in Iraq and that withdrawing troops would only increase sectarian violence.

But General Maples said that the violence continued to increase in "scope, complexity and lethality" and that it was "creating an atmosphere of fear and hardening sectarianism, which is empowering militias and vigilante groups."

In all of Iraq, attacks against allied troops last month averaged 180 per day, up from 170 per day in September and 70 per day in January, General Maples said in written testimony. Daily attacks on Iraqi civilians averaged roughly 40 per day last month, four times higher than the average in January. General Maples also noted that recent operations in Baghdad had achieved only a moderate success, because after American officials had turned neighborhoods over to the Iraqis, "attacks returned to and even surpassed preoperational levels."

DOJ_NMG_0095216

Reinforcing this view, General Hayden said the C.I.A. station in Baghdad assessed that Iraq was deteriorating to a chaotic state, with the political center disintegrating and rival factions increasingly warring with each other. “Their view of the battlefield is that it is descending into smaller and smaller groups fighting over smaller and smaller issues over smaller and smaller pieces of territory,” he said.

The two intelligence officials said Wednesday that there were only an estimated 1,300 foreign fighters in the country and that the number of Sunni Arab insurgents actively planning and carrying out attacks on American forces was probably more than 10,000.

Senator Jack Reed, Democrat of Rhode Island, asked General Abizaid how much time the United States had to bring down the violence in Baghdad before events there were beyond the control of the Iraqi government. General Abizaid said the answer was four to six months.

Securing Baghdad, the general said, was the main effort. But there are other difficult missions ahead, he said. One is supporting an Iraqi-led effort to disarm the Mahdi Army, the Shiite militia nominally loyal to the cleric Moktada al-Sadr.

Another is securing Anbar Province, the seat of the Sunni Arab insurgency. General Abizaid said that to try to hold the line there, he had decided to dispatch a 2,200-strong Marine Expeditionary Unit. “Al Anbar Province is not under control,” General Abizaid said.

Many experts have advocated talking directly to Iran and Syria to help stabilize Iraq, an approach the Iraq Study Group is expected to endorse. General Hayden said that Iran’s ambitions inside Iraq seemed to be expanding and that Iran had been conducting a foreign policy of “dangerous triumphalism.”

David M. Satterfield, the State Department’s coordinator for Iraq, told the Senate committee that the United States was prepared “in principle” to discuss the situation in Iraq with Iran, but the timing was uncertain.

“We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq,” Mr. Satterfield said. “The timing of such a direct dialogue is one that we still have under review.”

Abizaid Says Withdrawal Would Mean More Unrest (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The top U.S. commander for Iraq told Congress yesterday that a phased withdrawal of American troops would unleash more sectarian strife, and instead he advocated a "major change" in strategy that would beef up U.S. military teams training Iraqi forces.

Gen. John P. Abizaid, chief of the U.S. Central Command, said bolstering the training effort could require a further increase in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, already higher than expected at more than 140,000, and said no cuts are planned.

Facing searing questions from Democrats and Republicans alike, some of whom voiced disappointment in Abizaid and questioned his credibility, the general acknowledged mistakes in the war effort. But he voiced optimism that Iraq's military can stabilize the country, given enough U.S. backing and political support from Iraq's government.

"We haven't misled people. We have learned some hard lessons," he said in one tense exchange before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

The first major Iraq hearings since the Nov. 7 midterm elections revealed blunt impatience among Democrats as well as open frustration from Republicans, and produced the rare spectacle of presidential hopefuls from both parties taking aim at the general.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) took exception with Abizaid's talk of all the steps that the Iraqi government needs to take. "Hope is not a method," she told him. "We've had testimony now for four years about what 'must be done' -- and it doesn't get done."

Abizaid shot back: "I would also say that despair is not a method."

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), another presidential contender, voiced disappointment that Abizaid seemed to be clinging to the "status quo" -- an assertion the general rejected.

In an unusual admission, Abizaid said there should have been more U.S. troops, as well as Iraqi and foreign forces, to stabilize the country immediately after the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. "General [Eric] Shinseki was right that a greater international force contribution, U.S. force contribution and Iraqi force contribution should have been available immediately after major combat operations," he said.

Abizaid also said the policy of "de-Baathification" of Iraq society introduced in 2003 by then-U.S. Proconsul L. Paul Bremer was too severe.

Under hard questioning from McCain, Abizaid spoke frankly about the stress on U.S. forces, which he said constrains any major troop increase. "We can put in 20,000 more Americans tomorrow and achieve a temporary effect. But when you look at the overall American force pool that's available out there, the ability to sustain that commitment is simply not something that we have right now with the size of the Army and the Marine Corps," he said. He later told a House panel that exceeding current troop levels would place "a tremendous strain" on the Army.

DOJ_NMG_0095217

McCain, who favors a significant boost in U.S. forces, quizzed Abizaid on why more troops have not been sent to the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Anbar province, where U.S. casualties are among the highest in Iraq and Marine commanders say they lack sufficient forces.

"General Abizaid, is al-Anbar province under control?" McCain asked.

"Al-Anbar province is not under control, Senator," Abizaid replied. He said he recently released a Marine expeditionary unit of more than 2,000 troops from the Middle East to reinforce troops in Anbar. Still, he said that Baghdad and not Anbar will remain the main military effort, and that Iraqi forces will have to do more.

"I regret deeply that you seem to think that the status quo and the rate of progress we're making is acceptable. I think most Americans do not," McCain concluded. Abizaid disagreed, saying his new emphasis on training is "a major change."

Other Republicans showed a new skepticism about U.S. policy in Iraq. "It's taking us a lot longer than we thought," said Saxby Chambliss (Ga.). Even John W. Warner, the courtly Virginian who chairs the committee, opened by noting that on Nov. 26, U.S. troops will have been fighting in Iraq longer than they fought in World War II.

On the broader debate over Iraq strategy, Abizaid said partitioning the country, as some analysts have suggested, is "not viable." "I can't imagine in particular how a Sunni state could survive," he said, predicting it would devolve into an al-Qaeda terrorist haven. A Shiite state would fall under domination by Iran, he said.

Amid widespread criticism by lawmakers of the Iraqi government's leadership, Abizaid stressed he has confidence in Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and had urged him in a meeting this week to disarm Shiite militias "soon." By that, Abizaid testified, he meant in four to six months.

The Iraqi army will take the lead in pacifying militias, he said, emphasizing that is one reason the U.S. military should redouble efforts to train Iraqi forces. That option is said to be favored by several members of the Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel led by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former representative Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.), which is expected to make recommendations next month.

Teams of U.S. military trainers embedded with Iraqi units "need to be substantially expanded" so they can reach down to the company level, Abizaid said. He indicated he will try to find troops for that expansion from the existing U.S. force in Iraq but said he is not sure whether that is possible.

Abizaid said adding U.S. troops to Iraq would discourage Iraqis from taking the lead in their own security -- something he predicted they may be ready to do in as little as 12 months. He acknowledged the current U.S. force level in Iraq of 15 brigades is already three to five brigades -- or 10,000 to 20,000 troops -- higher than what he projected it would be before sectarian fighting erupted in Iraq in the spring.

Top General Hits Pullout Plan By Democrats (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

The top U.S. commander for Iraq rejected yesterday proposals from Senate Democrats to immediately pull troops from Iraq or do it on a specific timetable starting in March.

"Our troops' posture needs to stay where it is as we move to enhance the capabilities of the Iraqi security forces," Gen. John Abizaid, the head of U.S. Central Command, told the Senate Armed Services Committee, "and then we need to assess whether or not we can bring major combat units out of there."

His response was, in effect, a dismissal of a proposal from incoming Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat, for a phased withdrawal to begin in four months, and from Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, for an immediate pullout.

Gen. Abizaid said current troop levels, and an improving Iraqi security force of more than 300,000, are sufficient to eventually win.

"I believe that we can move forward," he said.

But Democrats, and at least one Republican, expressed skepticism.

"It's not encouraging to those of us who heard time after time that things are, quote, 'progressing well,' that we're making progress, et cetera, because we're hearing from many other sources that that's not the case," said Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican.

Sen. Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, who won re-election as an independent, displayed how difficult it will be for Mr. Levin to get a majority of senators to agree to specific withdrawal dates.

DOJ_NMG_0095218

"I agree with both of you that a congressional mandate to begin a withdrawal from Iraq in a time certain would be a disaster for the Iraqis and, more directly, for the U.S.," he said.

Gen. Michael V. Hayden, CIA director, later provided a sober picture of Iraq.

"Even if the central government gains broader support from Iraq's communities, implementing the reforms needed to improve life for all Iraqis will be extremely difficult," he said. "Iraq's endemic violence is eating away at the state's ability to govern. The security forces are plagued by sectarianism and severe maintenance and logistics problems."

The hearing also found the Bush administration signaling a postelection change in policy toward Iran, which the U.S. says is fueling the Shi'ite insurgency and deaths squads in Iraq. Coupled with Sunni terrorists, the groups have spun Baghdad into waves of violent sectarian killings that threaten to throw the country into a civil war. October was one of the deadliest months for U.S. troops, and more than 2,800 have been killed in the war.

David Satterfield, the top adviser on Iraq to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said the United States is ready to talk directly with Iran about achieving peace in Iraq. Mr. Satterfield did not open the door to the other problem neighbor, Syria.

Yesterday's hearing came at another pivotal time for the 3½-year-old war. Absent at the witness table was outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who resigned under pressure on an Election Day that saw Democrats retake Congress largely on frustration with the Iraq war. Defense Secretary-designate Robert M. Gates is to undergo confirmation hearings before the committee next month.

Democrats take control of Congress in January and are expected to debate legislation that would speed a troop exodus. Republicans and the White House, so far, oppose such measures. All Washington eyes are on the Iraq Study Group, a congressionally created panel of former government officials. It is set next month to lay out a list of options for winning in Iraq.

Two widely speculated ideas are a timetable for troop withdrawal and direct talks with Syria and Iran, both U.S.-designated terror states. Gen. Abizaid seemed to rule out the first option; Mr. Satterfield accepted part of the second.

Gen. Abizaid confirmed an Associated Press report that when he met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shi'ite, in Baghdad this week, he pressed him to begin ordering his forces to disarm the Mahdi's Army, from which cells have spun off into death squads.

The Mahdi's Army is led by radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, a political ally of Mr. al-Maliki. Gen. Abizaid said Mr. al-Maliki has begun disarming the militia, and U.S. forces have raided suspected death squads in Sadr City, Sheik al-Sadr's stronghold.

The general said Iraq must curtail violence in six months or risk losing any chance of a political settlement. He acknowledged that there are not enough U.S. forces in Iraq to control the entire Anbar province, a sprawling Sunni region west of Baghdad that has become a base for al Qaeda terrorists.

This remark brought a sharp rebuke from Mr. McCain. Although many Democrats want troops called home, and Republicans generally back the current 140,000, Mr. McCain advocates sending more forces.

"Wouldn't it make sense to say it might be well to get both Baghdad and al Anbar province under control before we have another battle of Fallujah and lose many more lives?" Mr. McCain said.

Gen. Abizaid answered, "It's easy for the Iraqis to rely upon us to do this work. I believe that more American forces prevent the Iraqis from doing more, from taking more responsibility for their own future. They will win the insurgency, they will solve the sectarian violence problem, and they'll do it with our help."

Gen. Abizaid has recommended a temporary increase of U.S. trainers embedded with Iraqi units.

With Politics As Subtext, Senators Clash On Iraq (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — For much of the first postelection hearing on the war in Iraq on Wednesday, the Republican side of the table was largely empty. But the room was still crowded — with competing agendas.

There were three contenders for president, including the Democratic and the Republican titans for 2008 and the one from Indiana who is hoping to cast himself as the Democrats' compromise candidate.

There was the self-described "Independent Democrat — capital I, capital D," who is at risk of bolting and taking his party's new narrow majority with him. (Was that red tie a hint?) And there were the two parties, trying to bolster their positions on the war after an election that each side seemed to interpret in wildly different ways.

In contrast to the Republicans, who arrived late and left early (if they arrived at all), all but one of the Democrats arrived early and stayed late, filling up their side of the Armed Services Committee table quickly, eager to assert their new strength. As the hearing began, Senator Bill Nelson, a Florida Democrat, flashed a thumbs-up to the incoming Democratic chairman, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0095219

But no sooner had Mr. Levin outlined his case for a phased pullout of troops beginning in four to six months than the new Independent Democratic hero of the hawkish wing, Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, began acting the role of cross-examiner, leading Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American military commander in the Middle East, to say that such a withdrawal would increase violence and instability.

"I take it by your answer that you profoundly disagree?" Mr. Lieberman asked. With the Democrats, he meant. "We have a window of opportunity and, really, responsibility now, after the election," he said, "to find a bipartisan consensus for being supportive of the efforts of our troops and our diplomats there to achieve success."

To this, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the leading Democratic contender for the 2008 race, knocked back the remains in her coffee cup.

Her leading Republican rival, Senator John McCain of Arizona, pressed his argument that more troops were needed in Iraq. When General Abizaid disagreed, Mr. McCain called attention to the remarks of retired military officers who characterized Congressional proposals for phased withdrawal as "terribly naïve." Mr. McCain's protégé, Senator Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, backed him up; when the general insisted that more troops were not the solution, Mr. Graham cut him off, saying, "Do we need less?" forcing General Abizaid to say that no, that was not the solution, either.

Mrs. Clinton pressed the Democrats' case that a change in military strategy was necessary to prod the Iraqis into taking responsibility for their own country. "Hope is not a strategy," she told the generals. "Hortatory talk about what the Iraqi government must do is getting old. I have heard over and over again, 'The government must do this, the Iraqi Army must do that.' Nobody disagrees with that. The brutal fact is, it's not happening."

She showed she could play bipartisan with the best of them, noting that the new Iraq had failed to meet the benchmarks demanded by Mr. Nelson and Senator Saxby Chambliss of Georgia, a Republican.

"Can you offer us more than the hope that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi Army will step up to the task?" she asked.

Mr. McCain, who would have been the committee chairman had the Republicans maintained control of the Senate, arrived almost an hour late, heralded by the accelerated click of cameras.

As Mr. Nelson questioned General Abizaid, the Arizona senator stood up to confer with Senator Susan M. Collins, a moderate Republican from Maine. At this, Mr. Lieberman got up and walked to the Republican side to join them in a brief, chuckling huddle, then ambled back to his party's side with a glance at his colleagues as if to say, "You watching?"

In his questions, Mr. Lieberman noted that he was "picking up on" points Mr. McCain and Mr. Graham had made.

Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, the other Democratic presidential hopeful, who advocates moderation between the party's liberal and hawkish wings, tried to emphasize that the Republicans had lost a national referendum on Iraq.

"We just had an election in our country in which the American people expressed less than total confidence in the effectiveness of our own government," Mr. Bayh said, introducing the idea that the Iraqi government did not deserve much confidence, either.

"I mean, they say the right things," he said, "but when the going gets tough and they have to make the hard decisions, they sort of retreat into their corner and they're just not able to find that common ground."

But while Democrats argued that the election had been a signal from American people that the military solution was not working, Mr. McCain said it was a message that they were unhappy with the status quo — and that only more troops could shake the stagnation.

"Many of us believe that this may not be a long-term commitment," he said, "but at least a commitment to bring Baghdad under control, and that is not happening today."

General Abizaid gave something to both sides, arguing for making the American teams helping to train the Iraqi military "more robust." But he said Iraqis looked unkindly on a major increase in American troops. "They believe it undermines their gaining greater and greater authority and responsibility," he said.

The Republican side was anchored by the departing chairman and the protector of Senate decorum, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia. He congratulated Mr. Levin, noting that they came to the Senate together 28 years ago. When Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, the only committee member seeking re-election to lose, arrived on the Republican side, Mr. Warner walked over to shake his hand.

New Armed Services Chairs Oppose Iraq (AP)

By Anne Plummer Flaherty

AP, November 15, 2006

The two Democrats who will lead the Armed Services committees next year indicated Wednesday they will not relent in opposing President Bush's Iraq policies and may turn up the heat.

DOJ_NMG_0095220

Michigan Sen. Carl Levin and Missouri Rep. Ike Skelton, in the first hearings on Iraq since Democrats regained power in last week's elections, said the Bush administration had bungled the war and the U.S. soon should begin to pull out some troops.

Levin, 72, and Skelton, 74, have been the leading voices among Democrats on the war. Known as staunch supporters of the military and its budget, the lawmakers have a tough road ahead.

Their fellow Democrats are divided on exactly how to stabilize Iraq. Democratic leaders agree only that pulling out an undetermined number of troops soon would help to put political pressure on the Iraqis to assume more responsibility.

Also, Gen. John Abizaid, the top commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, warned on Wednesday against setting a withdrawal timetable. Abizaid told the House and Senate committees that the troop levels should stay roughly the same as now, with more emphasis needed on training Iraqi forces.

But Levin told reporters he was encouraged the general said all options should remain on the table.

"The only way for Iraqi leaders to squarely face that reality is for President Bush to tell them that the United States will begin a phased redeployment of our forces within four to six months," Levin said. The senator, recognizable by the reading glasses he always wears on the tip of his nose, is known for his dogged style of questioning witnesses.

At the House hearing, Skelton said he was not feeling optimistic about Iraq.

"The administration must look carefully at our objectives in Iraq: whether they are achievable, by what means and whether they are worth the cost in money, lives and military readiness," he said.

Skelton, who focuses his efforts on improving combat readiness of troops, backs a plan that would set a formula to send home troops. For every three Iraqi units deemed proficient, one U.S. unit should come home, he said.

U.S. Military Leaders Oppose Timetable On Iraq (MCT)

By Nancy A. Youssef, Drew Brown

McClatchy, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - U.S. military leaders in Iraq and in Washington on Wednesday rejected the calls for a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces from Iraq, underscoring the difficulty of reaching any consensus on a new Iraq policy.

In an exclusive interview in Baghdad, Army Gen. George W. Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, told McClatchy Newspapers that the situation in Iraq remains too unstable to withdraw troops and that setting a date for U.S. troops to start leaving would "just allow folks to wait us out."

In Washington, Army Gen. John Abizaid, chief of U.S. Central Command, went further, telling the Senate Armed Services Committee that more U.S. troops could be needed to stabilize the country.

"We have every option on the table, and we will present them to the chain of command," Abizaid said.

Asked by Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., if that meant sending more troops to Iraq, Abizaid said, "To include that."

The comments highlighted the conflict that's likely to divide Congress and the military over Iraq policy as newly empowered Democrats push the Bush administration to start bringing some troops home.

Levin, who'll chair the Senate Armed Services Committee when the new Congress convenes in January, said President Bush should tell Iraqi leaders that U.S. forces will begin gradually withdrawing in four to six months.

"We should put the responsibility for Iraq's future squarely where it belongs - on the Iraqis," Levin said. "We cannot save the Iraqis from themselves."

In the wake of the Democrats' election victory last week and the resignation the next day of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, expectations for a change in Iraq strategy have grown. On Monday, Bush met with former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and other members of the Iraq Study Group, a 10-member panel that's studying options for Iraq policy and is expected to make a recommendation in early December.

But it's unclear whether the group will recommend substantial changes or whether Bush will accept its recommendations. The military officers' comments suggest they see little choice but to pursue present policy.

In his interview, Casey said the United States must draw down troops only when Iraqi forces can stand on their own. U.S. forces have been working for three years to build Iraqi army and police units that are capable of fighting insurgents, but the results have been mixed.

"We have always thought that we would gradually reduce our forces. So I am not against reducing troops," Casey said. "It's just got to be balanced with the Iraqi security forces and the situation on the ground. That's always been the strategy."

Casey also repeated what U.S. commanders have been saying for some time - that the U.S. has enough troops in Iraq and that increasing troops wouldn't improve the situation. "As I have said from the beginning, I will ask for what I need to get the job done, and I have," he said. "Right now, we have what we need."

DOJ_NMG_0095221

Casey said U.S. military strategy in Iraq was working, even though it may be too slow for some. He said that the Baghdad security plan, which was initiated in August, has reduced violence between Shiites and Sunnis, though he acknowledged that the number of deaths in October - 1,600, according to Baghdad's morgue - was "high."

"But those are not as high as what we saw in the summer," he said.

The situation in Iraq remains too volatile for the United States to set a timetable to start withdrawing troops, Casey said.

"I don't think that's a good idea at all," he said. "That just allows folks to wait us out."

In Washington, little new information came out of the Senate hearing.

David Satterfield, a senior adviser to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the State Department's coordinator for Iraq, said the administration could be ready to discuss the situation in Iraq with neighboring Iran, something Baker has hinted in television interviews that the study group might recommend. The administration hasn't decided under what conditions it might be willing to do so.

"We are prepared in principle to discuss Iranian activities in Iraq," Satterfield said. "The timing of such direct dialogue is one that we still have under review."

The Bush administration accuses Iran of supporting radical Shiite militias in Iraq and charges that Syria turns a blind eye to Sunni insurgents sneaking across its borders. Bush has said he'll talk to Iran if it abandons its nuclear program, which it has refused to do.

As for troop levels, while Abizaid said it was possible that the U.S. would consider increasing the number of soldiers in Iraq, his basic position was unchanged.

Asked by Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., if more U.S. troops were needed in Iraq, Abizaid said he believed that troop levels "need to stay where they are."

Later, he told Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., that sending 20,000 more U.S. troops to Iraq might "achieve a temporary effect," but that he didn't believe the Army and the Marine Corps could "sustain the commitment."

Abizaid also told McCain that he'd met with Casey and every division commander in Iraq and asked them if more U.S. forces would "add considerably to our ability to achieve success in Iraq."

"And they all said no," Abizaid said. "And the reason is because we want the Iraqis to do more."

Dems Call For More Urgency On Iraq (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

The leadership of the new Senate Democratic majority expressed concern Wednesday that President Bush does not understand the urgency of the situation in Iraq, and does not appear to be planning for change beyond replacing Donald Rumsfeld as secretary of Defense.

"We are bound and determined to change course in Iraq," Sen. Harry Reid (D) of Nevada, who will be Senate majority leader in the new Congress, told a Monitor breakfast. "We have a plan, we have enunciated that plan, we have done it through legislation and a lot of talk, and we'll continue to do that."

Senator Reid was accompanied by his deputies in the Democratic leadership, Richard Durbin of Illinois, Charles Schumer of New York, and Patty Murray of Washington. Senator Durbin spoke of a meeting he and Reid had attended with the president last Friday, in which he said he thought Mr. Bush was "sensitive to the fact that the political dynamic in this town has changed."

But, Durbin added, "I did not hear in the president's response on Iraq that he was preparing for change beyond the replacement of Secretary Rumsfeld. I hope that that changes in the weeks ahead with the Iraq Study commission and the president's own investigation, because ... Iraq is deterioriating by the day."

All four senators expressed hope for bipartisanship when the Democrats take control of the House and Senate in January. Reid was complimentary of the Republicans' new leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, calling him "a creature of the Senate" who has been there a long time and understands it.

As for working with the White House, Senator Schumer offered some advice for the president: "Frankly, I hope George Bush works with us in a bipartisan way, but that means he's going to have to break from [Vice President] Dick Cheney, who does not believe in bipartisanship, who believes he is right and the rest of the country is going wrong and he has a mission to take it back."

Later, the senators added that they were not pushing for impeachment, of either Bush or Cheney.

"One of the things that we were able to cut off pretty quickly is the 'impeach Bush' program," said Reid, referring to some Democratic activists who have that goal. "That was because of two words: Dick Cheney," he joked.

DOJ_NMG_0095222

Schumer blamed the administration for not listening to multiple points of view, saying that when someone does, "they kneecap him."

"They call him names, they attack their integrity or their loyalty to America," Schumer said. "And it seems to me, that's what Dick Cheney has done over and over again, in terms of not listening to other people, and the president seems to listen to Dick Cheney. So my hope is he'll listen to multiple voices, because there's a lot out there and I think it's one of the reasons they had such trouble in 2006."

The "Stay Or Leave" Debate In The US Finds A Mirror In Baghdad (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 — While Americans in a faraway land debate their fate, Iraqis have already decided on the cure. The only problem is that there is more than one set of Iraqis. Shiites want their country back. Sunni Arabs want a strongman. They cannot agree.

"We don't want to see them in the streets," a wiry man named Tariq said of American troops as he measured cloth in a tailor shop.

Saad Abdul Razzaq, a Sunni whose brother was killed by Shiite militiamen a week ago, was of the strongman school: "Democracy is not working. Only power can control Iraqis."

As the United States grapples with difficult decisions over the war, Iraqis are also debating. But just when they need to band together, they have never been further apart. Their government has ground to a halt, paralyzed by disagreements between Sunni and Shiite parties. Militias are at the root of the security problem, but as long as the state remains helpless, many consider them its only solution.

The landscape is that of a country sliding into war, and Sunnis and Shiites, like Republicans and Democrats, desperately look for ways out.

Shiites agree with many Democrats: American soldiers should withdraw to their bases. Sunnis say total control by the Shiite-dominated government could mean massacres.

"It's a disaster if the American forces stay in Iraq, but it's also a disaster if they go," said an elderly man named Ayad, who was discussing politics with friends in central Baghdad.

Abbas Fadhel, a college professor sitting in a social club in central Baghdad, spoke of the widening division and dim prospects for the future. "The seriousness of this is that the sectarianism has penetrated to the educated people," he said. "They deny it, but when push comes to shove, you can see that they have become so."

The mass kidnapping at a government ministry on Tuesday by gunmen in Iraqi military uniforms was symbolic of the breakdown. "It was really something humiliating," said Husham al-Madfai, an architect who was sitting in his garden drinking beer Wednesday afternoon. "They went into a ministry and kidnapped tens of people. That means the government does not exist."

But the kidnapping was interpreted in different ways. Sunnis laid much of the blame with the government. Reflecting a broad shift that has taken place among Shiites, Sunnis had more sympathy for what they saw as the government's plight. Militias, they said, were like parasites that the government would not be able to get rid of until it gained more control over security tasks now handled by Americans.

"It's like organized crime," said Tariq, gesturing animatedly with a thimble on one finger. "If the government had sovereignty, it could combat all these things that are going on."

Violence that many see as having been carried out by Sunnis has hardened attitudes. Muhammad Faisal, a Shiite whose brother and seven friends were shot to death in southern Baghdad on Sept. 23 while they were putting up a poster of a Shiite cleric, said the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki was like "a surgeon without his instruments."

Meanwhile, militias are seen as a necessary protection against aggression by the other side.

As Shiites have risen to power and filled the ranks of the security forces, Sunnis, who used to condemn the American forces, now often see them as a primary safeguard against Shiite violence. They do not trust the government, a concern that was underscored by Tuesday's kidnapping.

The sheer magnitude of the violence since Mr. Maliki took office in the spring has swept away what trust they had. In all, five members of Mr. Abdul Razzaq's extended family have died in violence since 2003.

He would like to see a military coup, to be headed by a strongman, possibly Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister and secular Shiite with a past tied to the Baathists, the ruling party under Saddam Hussein.

"He worked with Saddam," Mr. Abdul Razzaq said. "He knows his way."

Mr. Madfai, the architect, disagreed. A coup would not work. The new government would be besieged. "All those militias will turn to fight against them," he said, speaking by telephone.

DOJ_NMG_0095223

He paused as two helicopters thundered overhead. The beer was running out, he said, a problem he blamed on the Americans. All the alcohol sellers in his area, Mansour, have been killed, and most shops are now closed.

"Who's responsible for that? Rumsfeld," he said. "He should send us some beer."

Alcohol, a target of some of the Islamic militias, was not in short supply at the social club, where Shiek Mazin al-Khalaf, an Iraqi Sunni who speaks British-accented English, was enjoying a vodka. Iraqis are destined to fight, he said, because after years of abuse, they are capable only of abusing.

"Iraqis have been in prison since 1958," the year the monarchy was overthrown, he said. "The prisoners got out, they smelled the air, saw cars and cellphones. But they are criminals."

A Shiite sitting on the other side of the table took issue with the description. "Victims, not criminals," he hissed, after Mr. Khalaf left the table.

A Shiite sheik from Amara, Abd al-Karim al-Muhammadawi, offered an extreme prescriptive. He said the only solution would be to ban the major political parties, declare martial law and begin again.

The alternative, he said, is for the American military to leave Iraq completely and let the Iraqis begin a full-on civil war. "This is better than the Iraqi condition now," he said.

Faaz, a student in Sadr City, the largest Shiite neighborhood in Baghdad, agreed. "I'd prefer to have what they had in Lebanon — a declared civil war," he said. "There is a lot of killing, but no one confesses what he is really doing."

Sabah, a Shiite whose husband, a Sunni, was killed by Shiites in early September, said a full-scale pullout would be a disaster. "If the American forces leave Iraq, we will walk on bodies," she said, sitting in her tiny living room in Karada, in central Baghdad. "The war would be face to face."

For Tariq, all this talk of sects was irritating. It is bad manners in Iraqi society to ask somebody's sect. His response, when asked on Wednesday, was simply, "Muslim."

But the clunky yellow-stone building across the street, the ministry where the employees were kidnapped Tuesday, seemed a looming reminder that in Iraq, more and more often, sects count.

He was relieved to know that one of the kidnapped employees, a senior official and a wearer of his suits, had been released. The man, he said, was a Shiite.

Sectarian Strife In Iraq Imperils Entire Region, Analysts Warn (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD -- While American commanders have suggested that civil war is possible in Iraq, many leaders, experts and ordinary people in Baghdad and around the Middle East say it is already underway, and that the real worry ahead is that the conflict will destroy the flimsy Iraqi state and draw in surrounding countries.

Whether the U.S. military departs Iraq sooner or later, the United States will be hard-pressed to leave behind a country that does not threaten U.S. interests and regional peace, according to U.S. and Arab analysts and political observers.

"We're not talking about just a full-scale civil war. This would be a failed-state situation with fighting among various groups," growing into regional conflict, Joost Hiltermann, Middle East project director for the International Crisis Group, said by telephone from Amman, Jordan.

"The war will be over Iraq, over its dead body," Hiltermann said.

"All indications point to a current state of civil war and the disintegration of the Iraqi state," Nawaf Obaid, an adjunct fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies and an adviser to the Saudi government, said last week at a conference in Washington on U.S.-Arab relations.

As Iraq's neighbors grapple with the various ideas put forward for solving the country's problems, they uniformly shudder at one proposal: dividing Iraq into separate regions for Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds, and then speeding the withdrawal of U.S. forces.

"To envision that you can divide Iraq into three parts is to envision ethnic cleansing on a massive scale, sectarian killing on a massive scale," Prince Turki al-Faisal, the Saudi ambassador to the United States, said Oct. 30 at a conference in Washington. "Since America came into Iraq uninvited, it should not leave Iraq uninvited."

"When the ethnic-religious break occurs in one country, it will not fail to occur elsewhere, too," Syrian President Bashar al-Assad told Germany's Der Spiegel newsweekly recently. "It would be as it was at the end of the Soviet Union, only much worse. Large wars, small wars -- no one will be able to get a grip on the consequences."

In an analysis published last month by the Center for Strategic and International Studies, Obaid said sectarian conflicts could make Iraq a battleground for the region.

DOJ_NMG_0095224

Obaid described widespread interference by Iranian security forces within Iraq. He urged Saudi Arabia, which is building a 560-mile wall on its border with Iraq, to warn Iran "that if these activities are not checked," Saudi Arabia "will be forced to consider a similar overt and covert program of its own."

In Damascus, a Syrian analyst close to the Assad government warned that other countries would intervene if Iraq descended into full-scale civil war. "Iran will get involved, Turkey will get involved, Saudi Arabia, Syria," said the analyst, who spoke on condition he not be identified further.

"Regional war is very much a possibility," said Hiltermann, the analyst for the International Crisis Group. Iraq's neighbors "are hysterical about Iranian strategic advances in the region," he said.

U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad last month ranked Syria and Iran with al-Qaeda in Iraq, one of the country's principal Sunni Arab insurgent groups, in terms of destabilizing influences in Iraq. Despite that assessment, the United States has not held substantive talks with Syria regarding Iraq since 2004 or with Iran since the war began in 2003.

Diplomats and analysts increasingly are urging the Bush administration to reach out to both countries as part of a regional approach to quelling Iraq's troubles. Former secretary of state James A. Baker III, leader of a panel preparing a set of policy recommendations for the Bush administration, already has endorsed the idea of seeking the help of Iran and Syria.

"The thing is, because Iran and Syria both have spoiling power in Iraq, if you could neutralize them," it would ease some of the many pressures within Iraq, Hiltermann said. But he said the two countries may demand a mighty trade-off: for Syria, U.S. help with its biggest stated aim, winning back the Golan Heights from Israel; for Iran, U.S. compromise over its nuclear program.

Hiltermann acknowledged the difficulty. "I'm saying it's required," he said. "I'm not saying it's possible."

In Baghdad's Shiite stronghold of Sadr City late last month, aides to one of the country's leading Shiite clerics held a rally to urge followers to bide their time until the American forces leave the country. The rally was called by followers of Moqtada al-Sadr, a strongly anti-occupation figure whose bloc is a leading partner in the current Shiite-led government and who is one likely claimant to power should the Americans withdraw.

"Will America win?" a speaker in a brown turban demanded before the more than 1,000 protesters, as a brewing storm whirled dirt and trash and pelted ralliers with drops of cold rain. Loudspeakers shot his question back across the square.

The men thrust their fists in the air, shouting their answer out to a grim, gray sky: "No, no! America will not win!"

Between 2 percent and 5 percent of Iraq's 27 million people have been killed, wounded or uprooted since the Americans invaded in 2003, calculates Anthony H. Cordesman of the Center for International and Strategic Studies.

"This is civil war," he said.

Since midsummer, Shiite militias, Sunni insurgent groups, ad-hoc Sunni self-defense groups and tribes have accelerated campaigns of sectarian cleansing that are forcing countless thousands of Shiites and Sunnis in Baghdad to seek safety among their own kind.

Whole towns north and south of Baghdad are locked in the same sectarian struggle, among them the central Shiite city of Balad, still under siege by gunmen from surrounding Sunni towns after a bloody spate of sectarian massacres last month.

Even outside the epicenter of sectarian strife in the central region of the country, Shiite factions battle each other in the south, Sunni tribes and factions clash in the west. Across Iraq, the criminal gangs that emerged with the collapse of law and order rule patches of turf as mini-warlords.

Since the war began, 1.6 million Iraqis have sought refuge in neighboring countries; at least 231,530 people have been displaced inside Iraq since February, when Shiite-Sunni violence exploded with the bombing of a Shiite shrine in the northern city of Samarra, according to figures from the United Nations and the U.N.-affiliated International Organization for Migration.

There used to be a time when Sunnis and Shiites "were living like family. We were married to each other, we all had Sunni friends, we all had Shiite friends. It was all like a balloon that exploded," a gaunt, weeping Sunni woman said in her bare apartment.

Until this year, the 41-year-old widow and former teacher -- who would identify herself only as Um Mohammed, fearing retaliation -- lived in Husseiniyah, a Shiite district of Baghdad. But after Shiite militias forced all the Sunnis out, she fled to a too-costly, too-small place in the overwhelmingly Sunni neighborhood of Sadiyah, on the western side of the Tigris River.

The Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, two militias loyal to the Shiite religious parties now governing Iraq, had taken over her old neighborhood by this spring, she said. Mahdi Army officials commandeered the two rental homes she relied on to support herself and her children. They forced the Sunni tenants out and installed Shiite families, who paid her rent through the Mahdi Army office, at a greatly reduced price set by the militia, the widow said.

Letters placed at the doors of Sunni families -- sometimes with bloody bullets tucked inside the envelopes -- warned Sunnis to leave. Shiite boys as young as 10 took to wearing the black clothes of the militias, and they promised her 10-year-old son, Ahmed, they would burn him alive in his house at night as he slept.

DOJ_NMG_0095225

Um Mohammed reluctantly took her only other child still at home, a 15-year-old daughter, out of school and married her off to an older man in Sadiyah in a bid to provide her protection among fellow Sunnis. When Um Mohammed received a third letter threatening death, she and Ahmed finally moved to Sadiyah. Longtime Shiite neighbors sadly watched her leave but were too afraid of the militias to help her move, she said.

"I want to return to my home. But we are safer here," she said.

Across the Tigris River from Um Mohammed, another widow, Zayneb Khatan, a Shiite, sat in her equally plain new home. After gunmen shot and killed her husband in front of their home in the Sunni neighborhood of Cairo as he went to buy bread, Khatan fled with her 2-year-old daughter and the clothes on their backs.

"Some Sunnis are good," she said as she sat on a secondhand divan. "But I cannot say I will ever live among them again."

Iran Hints That US Shouldn't Withdraw From Iraq Too Soon (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

LONDON — Iran has consistently opposed the presence of U.S. forces in Iraq, but new prospects of a stepped-up American withdrawal are prompting growing unease in the Islamic Republic, where many fear the repercussions of a dangerously unstable neighbor.

Officially, Iran's policy remains flatly opposed to American troops in Iraq and characterizes them as a key contributor to the escalating violence. Iran's government says it wants the U.S. to withdraw at the earliest possible opportunity.

But the U.S. elections this month that swept in a Democratic majority to Congress and subsequent talk of a phased pullout have touched off a discussion in Tehran about the outright anarchy that could result.

On Tuesday night, Tehran's English-language news channel featured commentary from political scientist Pirouz Mojtahedzadeh, who called for the U.S. to remain in Iraq until it has established a strong, stable central government capable of providing adequate security.

"The Americans can't simply withdraw from Iraq, leaving the mess as it is," Mojtahedzadeh said in a telephone interview from the Iranian capital afterward. "Who's going to look for the safety of the Iraqis there? The Iranians can't do it. The Turks can't do it.... This is not a question of political rivalry between Iran and the West. It has to do with the fact that the society has to have a government structure in place."

Analysts familiar with official thinking say there is growing support for views like Mojtahedzadeh's within Iran's professional foreign policy establishment, if not within the hard-line circles closest to President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and a feeling that a drawn-out timetable for withdrawal would be preferable to a quick pullout.

"They've not said it directly and openly as an official policy line, that they'd like the U.S. to stay, but I think there's a sense among the Iranians that they understand that the U.S. cannot just leave immediately," said Hadi Semati, an Iranian political analyst who is a visiting fellow at the Brookings Institution.

"If you're talking about the officials and the foreign policy establishment, I think they're more these days cognizant and aware of the possible dangers and repercussions of civil war and the collapse of what is left of Iraqi governance on Iran. The fact [is] that if the bloodshed gets out of hand, they might at some point feel compelled to intervene to support their Shiite co-religionists against extremists and death squads and mass killings," Semati said.

"At the same time, they don't want to be seen as the one that supports a U.S. occupation force. That's why they're conflicted," he said.

'Source of instability'

An official Iranian source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Iran's position was unchanged and continued to urge a quick U.S. withdrawal.

"We oppose the Western forces continuing the occupation there. As long as they are there, we think the violence in this situation will continue, and it does not help whatsoever the stability in the region," he said.

Another official source echoed that view. "Why would the U.S. think that their rapid withdrawal would be rejected by Iran? Do they think their presence is a help? Iran thinks it is not," he said.

"Some in the U.S. argue that Iran wants the U.S. to stay because it is a good target for Iran, and will every day face new problems there. But I think their presence also is a source of instability for the region, and Iran is rather a supporter of the Iraqi government and people and doesn't want to witness their daily pain."

Still, Mojtahedzadeh, who also operates a think tank in London, said the fact that he was invited to argue against a rapid U.S. withdrawal on Iranian television suggested some level of official sanction of the view.

"I think the official position is in agreement with this," he said. "It works very subtly, in ways that are not quite obvious.

DOJ_NMG_0095226

"But someone like me being on the record on Iranian radio and TV saying it's not wise to push the U.S. out of Iraq because the aggressor, according to international laws, has the duty of putting things back in place, this tells you everything," he said.

Iranian analysts said senior officials would never vary from Iran's established line opposing U.S. intervention. And, they said, no one in Iran is in favor of a long-term U.S. presence in Iraq. There appears to be unanimity in the government that the upper Persian Gulf is Iran's domain and that there certainly should be no U.S. bases there.

But on the issue of the timing of a withdrawal, there are various constituencies to whom Iran must speak, said Ali Ansari, a professor of Iranian studies in Britain and author of "Confronting Iran: The Failure of American Foreign Policy and the Next Great Crisis in the Middle East."

"To the Arab Middle East, Iran says yes, the Americans are part of the problem, get out. But then there are the Iranians who say, 'When we say get out, we don't mean get out and leave it in a mess,' " Ansari said.

He said that although the official line of Ahmadinejad remains unchanged, "there's a strong class of bureaucratic thinkers, strategic thinkers in the Foreign Ministry, who think that actually it serves our interests better [if U.S. troops remain a bit longer]. Because let's face it, if the Americans leave, all this inside fighting in Iraq might turn on the Iranians. As long as the Americans are still there, they are acting as a lighting rod for that."

'A paradox'

The range of opinion also extends to hard-liners, analysts said, who have opposed the occupation but relish seeing the U.S. bogged down and embarrassed in Iraq, and distracted from going after Iran's nuclear program.

"There are some in the hard-liners who say while the Americans are there, they're within reach [of Iranian missiles] if we need to retaliate," Ansari said.

The schizophrenic thinking on the issue was clearly reflected in the recent visit of former reformist President Mohammad Khatami to the U.S., where he advised against a speedy exit from Iraq.

"We are at a paradox," he told an audience at the University of Virginia. "The occupation must end so there can be peace. But also, you can't leave the present Iraqi government at the mercy of the terrorists. If you ask me should the Americans leave tomorrow, I'd say, 'No, don't do it.' "

Kaveh Afrasiabi, author of "After Khomeini: New Directions in Iran's Foreign Policy," said a rapid U.S. pullout would jeopardize the two "pillars" of Iranian policy on Iraq: Iraq's "national unity" and territorial integrity, goals that are shared with the U.S. That has prompted some to recognize the need for "a more nuanced foreign policy balancing act."

Yet that stance is far from a full about-face, he said. And some Iranian officials say privately that some in the U.S. appear to be using threats of a speedy pullout as a way of inducing Iran to make concessions in other areas, namely its controversial nuclear program.

In the end, Semati said, Iran would be most happy if a joint solution to the Iraq conflict was engineered by the U.S. and Iran in tandem, leading to a withdrawal of U.S. troops on the basis of "a shared success."

"They would like to see the U.S. succeed in stabilizing Iraq, but they would like to share in that success," he said. "They're the major player inside Iraq, they have lent their support to the Iraqi [democratic] transition, and they think the Americans have paid very little attention to their contribution," he said.

US Should Add Troops To Prevent Disaster In Iraq (RC)

By Morton M. Kondracke

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

To salvage stability from what looks like inevitable chaos in Iraq, the United States needs a new strategy that produces security, political reconciliation and hope.

That should involve sending more U.S. troops — at least on a temporary basis — while pressuring the Iraqi government for reform and mounting a massive jobs project to reduce unemployment in the country.

It would be politically impossible for the Bush administration to increase U.S. troop levels after Democrats won the recent elections, but conceivably it could be done if the idea is blessed by the Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.).

Even though only 16 percent of Americans favor sending more U.S. troops, according to election exit polls, they're desperately needed to secure Baghdad, to train Iraqi forces and undercut the population's increasing dependency on sectarian militias.

The offer to send more troops ought to be contingent on the Iraqi government's willingness to take steps, at long last, toward national reconciliation and its willingness to bring the militias under control.

To undergird the case, Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki should be told that if he doesn't take necessary steps — and soon — U.S. withdrawal will be inevitable, with disastrous consequences for him and his country.

DOJ_NMG_0095227

The only major U.S. politician who is calling for more U.S. troops is Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), but he's made a powerful case for years that the Bush administration was refusing to supply enough forces to secure the country.

As McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday, "We're paying the price for the failure of our policy in the past and the question, then, before the American people is, are we ready to quit? And I believe the consequences of failure are chaos for the region, which will spread."

Clearly, some Americans, mainly liberal Democrats, are ready to quit and have been ready for a long time, some even before hostilities began. The exit polls showed that 30 percent of Americans want to withdraw all U.S. troops, and that this group voted Democratic by a margin of 83 percent to 15 percent.

Among the raft of books analyzing the Bush administration's mistakes in Iraq, Thomas Ricks' "Fiasco" makes a compelling case that the anti-Iraq War side had it right at the beginning: Not only did Saddam Hussein not have weapons of mass destruction, but the Clinton administration's much-criticized 1998 bombing raids nearly toppled his regime and made it entirely possible to contain Iraqi aggression.

And Ricks' extensive interviews with (mainly retired) military commanders makes it sickeningly plain, for any supporter of the war like me, how carelessly former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and his "neo-conservative" top civilian aides planned the war's aftermath.

In Ricks' telling, Rumsfeld and Co. were determined not to listen to any advice from any war doubters — notably, former CENTCOM commander Gen. Anthony Zinni and Secretary of State Colin Powell — and discarded extensive post-invasion plans drawn up by Zinni and the State Department.

Rumsfeld also fired or intimidated commanders who called for higher troop levels, seemingly determined to disprove the "Powell Doctrine," that U.S. operations should be undertaken only with massive force.

The result was that, while allied forces won a quick a military victory, they could not establish security for the population and massive looting, destruction and insurgency quickly followed.

The Rumsfeld decision to disband the Iraqi army — or not call its lower echelons back into being after it dissolved — also left hundreds of thousands of armed men unemployed and ready for mobilization by insurgent groups.

Despite widespread calls for Rumsfeld's ouster, Bush stuck with him until last week — and might well have kept him aboard indefinitely, had Democrats not captured both chambers of Congress.

As any number of Republicans have privately complained, firing Rumsfeld much earlier — say, in September — would have signaled that Bush really meant to change strategies and might have tempered GOP losses in the elections.

Regardless of past errors, however, Bush, along with newly empowered Democrats, have to figure out a strategy that does not result in total chaos in Iraq, regional conflict among Iraq's neighbors, creation of a terrorist state and an utter strategic defeat for the United States.

Even though the Baker-Hamilton commission hasn't reported its recommendations yet, Democrats are calling for troop withdrawals, some leading to a full U.S. departure on a fixed deadline while others are on a phased basis beginning in four to six months with no fixed deadlines.

An increase in the U.S. troop presence — by, say, 50,000 personnel for Baghdad duty in 2007 — will be possible only if it comes with strong backing from the bipartisan commission. Such an idea has been rumored as among the steps being considered by the panel.

But no stability is possible in Iraq without a political settlement that ensures minority Sunnis adequate oil revenues and political representation. Democrats such as Sen. Carl Levin (Mich.) want to force Iraqi action by moving toward troop withdrawals.

Brookings Institution scholar Michael O'Hanlon says that Bush could well leverage the Democratic victory, and the prospect of withdrawals, to prod al-Maliki to take needed action, playing "good cop" to the Democrats' "bad cop."

O'Hanlon also told me he had recommended to the Baker-Hamilton commission that the U.S. mount a large-scale jobs program to reduce Iraqi unemployment from its astronomical levels of 30 percent to 50 percent.

One good result of the 2006 elections is that both parties are now responsible for Iraq policy. Bush and the Democrats should work together to achieve something that can be called success — or even victory.

About 70 Freed After Mass Iraq Abduction (AP)

By Thomas Wagner

AP, November 15, 2006

Kidnappers released about 70 people snatched in a mass abduction by suspected Shiite militiamen who answer to a key backer of the prime minister — a sign the militants went too far and Iraq's leader may be yielding to intense U.S. pressure to crack down on sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0095228

But Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki clearly has more work to do. Iraqi police, hospital and morgue officials reported 105 new violent deaths Wednesday; 54 of the victims were tortured and shot, their bodies dumped in Baghdad.

The quick release of many of the captives — less than 24 hours after the abductions — was surprising in a country where hundreds of Iraqis have been kidnapped, murdered and dumped in streets or rivers each month. In two recent mass kidnappings, both of about 50 people, the victims were never heard of again.

It was unclear how many Iraqis remained captive from Tuesday's assault. Government ministries have given wildly varying figures on the number of people seized, with reports ranging from a high of about 150 to a low of 40 to 50.

"We have information about the kidnappers and where the rest of the hostages are being held. Work is going well to release them," Higher Education Minister Abed Theyab told Al-Arabiya television.

The mass abduction took place in broad daylight when gunmen disguised in the blue camouflage uniforms of police commandos raided the Higher Education Ministry in Karradah, a primarily Shiite area of downtown Baghdad, handcuffed their victims and took them away in about 20 pickup trucks.

The assault was widely believed to have been the work of the Mahdi Army, the heavily armed militia of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, and it raised questions about al-Maliki's commitment to wipe out the Shiite militias of his prime political backers: the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq and al-Sadr's Sadrist Movement.

The mass abduction was seen as retaliation for the recent kidnapping of 50 Shiites south of Baghdad.

But al-Maliki's public criticism of the kidnappers, and the fact that his Shiite-dominated government quickly won the release of many captives, appeared to be a sign that the militants had gone too far and the prime minister was ready to comply with U.S. demands to corral the militias and their death squads.

Many of the fighters are believed to operate within the country's police and security forces, both of which are run and dominated by Shiites.

On Monday, Gen. John Abizaid, chief of the U.S. Central Command, became the third Washington heavyweight in two weeks to tell al-Maliki that the armed groups had to be disbanded and disarmed and the United States wanted proof.

Frustration has been growing inside the Bush administration over al-Maliki's perceived disregard for the country's Sunni Arab minority, which dominated the country until the fall of Saddam Hussein.

The United States has struggled since it invaded in 2003 to build a democratic and multi-sectarian and multiethnic government. Al-Maliki has been increasingly seen as a reluctant partner, if not a hindrance.

Until about nine months ago, the Shiite majority had resisted major acts of revenge against some Sunni insurgent groups and al-Qaida in Iraq and its allies that were behind the killing of U.S. troops and thousands of Shiites in bomb and mortar attacks.

But after the Feb. 22 bombing of a major Shiite shrine in Samarra, north of Baghdad, enraged Shiites began fighting back — primarily members of the Mahdi Army who stormed out of Baghdad's Sadr City Shiite slum bent on revenge. Al-Maliki is heavily dependent on al-Sadr, the militia's benefactor, for his political survival.

When al-Maliki became prime minister in May at the head of a nominal national unity government, he put forward a 24-point reconciliation plan that was optimistically seen as a bid to draw disaffected Sunnis into the political fold.

But as the months passed, extreme violence blamed on the Mahdi Army and to a lesser degree on the Badr Brigade, another Shiite militia, spiraled out of control. The brutal sectarian killings brought Iraq to the edge of civil war.

The unleashing of the militias and their death squads only compounded anger among moderate Sunnis over the prime minister's seeming inaction on concrete moves toward national reconciliation.

But al-Maliki's handling of Tuesday's mass kidnapping suggested that he has realized he can no longer ignore U.S. demands regarding the militias, now that Democrats have taken control of the U.S. Congress and with President Bush reconsidering the goals and mission of U.S. forces in Iraq.

Al-Maliki first appeared to minimize the importance of kidnappings Tuesday, saying on television: "What is happening is not terrorism, but the result of disagreements and conflict between militias belonging to this side or that."

But on Wednesday he said, "Most of the hostages were freed, but that is not enough for us. We will chase those who did this ugly criminal act."

Authorities arrested six top police officers who served in the Shiite region where the kidnapping occurred and the Mahdi Army is increasingly powerful.

Meeting with professors and students at Baghdad University to show of support for the country's educational institutions, the prime minister said: "We regret what happened yesterday. The government's reaction was strong."

Higher Education Ministry spokesman Basil al-Khatib said 40 employees of the Higher Education Ministry, which handles academic grants and exchanges, were released Tuesday and 32 more were freed Wednesday.

Al-Khatib said Theyab, a Sunni, had suspended his participation in the government until all the kidnap victims were released.

DOJ_NMG_0095229

Among the 105 who were killed or found dead in Iraq on Wednesday, 11 died in the deadliest single attack — a car bomb that also wounded at least 32 near a gasoline station in central Baghdad's Bab Shargi area, police said.

The day's fatalities included journalists Fadia Mohammed al-Taie in Mosul and Luma al-Karkhi in Baqouba.

At least 91 journalists have been killed in Iraq since hostilities began in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count based on statistics kept by the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Also, 36 other media employees, including drivers, interpreters and guards, have been killed — all of them Iraqi except for one Lebanese.

The U.S. military also announced the combat deaths of three U.S. Army soldiers and three U.S. Marines, raising the number of American war dead to 2,858. So far this month, 40 American service members have been killed or died in Iraq.

The six all died Tuesday, four fighting in the insurgent stronghold of Anbar Province in western Iraq and two whose convoy was hit by a roadside bomb in Baghdad.

Kidnappings Stir Political Dispute In Iraq (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 — A dispute erupted Wednesday between Iraqi officials over the fate of dozens of captives abducted from a government building, undermining an effort by Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki to project an image of authority during the crisis.

A spokesman for Abed Dhiab al-Ajeeli, the minister of higher education, said nearly 100 of about 150 captives were still being held a day after the kidnapping, at the ministry's compound. But the government's chief spokesman, Ali Dabbagh, contended that only 39 people had been kidnapped and that all but 2 had been released. Both men angrily dismissed the other's comments as false.

Late Wednesday, Mr. Dhiab, one of the few Sunni Arabs in Mr. Maliki's Shiite-dominated cabinet, announced that he was stepping down from his post until all the captives had been rescued. In a written statement, apparently directed at the Maliki administration, he said that any effort to make the kidnapping "a political issue" would be "unacceptable behavior."

The disagreements emerged as Mr. Maliki and his aides sought to convey a sense of governmental cohesion and resolve in response to the abductions. Mr. Dabbagh attributed the releases to an aggressive series of overnight raids and persistent pressure on the kidnappers by Iraqi security forces. Mr. Maliki told an audience at the University of Baghdad that he would bring the kidnappers to justice.

Mr. Maliki has been accused by American officials and some Iraqi leaders of failing to act decisively to curb surging violence, eliminate rampant corruption and improve public services. In particular, he has been criticized for his inability, or unwillingness, to dismantle Shiite militias linked to the governing Shiite parties yet responsible for staging sectarian attacks in cooperation with Iraqi security forces or with access to government uniforms and vehicles.

Mr. Maliki and other Shiite leaders have tried to deflect attention away from the militias, insisting that the greatest threat to public security still remains the insurgency, led by Sunni Arabs, which is responsible for the vast majority of casualties inflicted on American and Iraqi government forces. At the same time, the prime minister has pressed American officials to give him more authority over the country's security.

But the mass kidnapping on Tuesday, conducted inside a government building during office hours, underscored the profound weaknesses of Iraq's security forces and put further strain on Mr. Maliki's relationships with the Americans and his Sunni Arab critics.

The kidnapping, by gunmen wearing Iraqi police commando uniforms and driving more than 20 vehicles with Interior Ministry markings, was similar in style to several other mass abductions this year. The captives, who included Shiites, Sunni Arabs, Kurds and Christians, were driven to a predominantly Shiite area of eastern Baghdad, officials said, probably passing through numerous police checkpoints unimpeded.

Hours after the abduction, the Interior Ministry, which oversees the nation's police forces, arrested several police commanders in charge of the area where the ministry site is. And late Tuesday, Mr. Maliki, in an appearance on state-run television, said he had ordered an intensive search for the kidnapping victims.

But the identity of the kidnappers remained unclear on Wednesday, as did their motive.

Mr. Dabbagh said the kidnapping had been conducted by a "gang of criminals that belongs to a certain militia," and was intended to foment sectarian tensions, but he did not identify the militia. He said he could not explain why the kidnappers had attacked the Ministry of Higher Education. The attackers were "trying to break the stability between the Shiites and Sunnis," he said in a telephone interview.

The ministry has long been viewed as a Sunni Arab bastion. During Saddam Hussein's rule, it was known mockingly among non-Sunnis as "the Ministry of Al Ani and Al Rawi," after two towns in the overwhelmingly Sunni Arab province of Anbar, said Dr. Abdullah Kendoush, a longtime physicist in the Ministry of Science and Technology who recently left Iraq to take a temporary post at the University of Florida in Gainesville.

DOJ_NMG_0095230

In the argument over numbers, Basil al-Khateeb, the spokesman for the Ministry of Higher Education, said late Wednesday that “about 150 people” had been kidnapped and 52 of them had been released. He said the ministry had arrived at its tallies by debriefing witnesses and victims who were freed.

Mr. Dabbagh said that in all, 16 ministry employees, 18 guards and five visitors had been kidnapped from the building and that 37 had been released by late Wednesday under pressure from Iraqi security forces conducting operations in eastern Baghdad. He described Mr. Khateeb’s comments by saying, “That is not an official statement of the government.”

The American military command put the number of kidnapping victims at about 55.

Balal Hassan, a Sunni Arab who said his brother Walid worked for the ministry and was one of those kidnapped, said he and his relatives had been desperately trying to find out information about the kidnappings but had received no help from government officials. “So far they have done nothing,” he said in a telephone interview. “Hopefully they will do something significant.”

The United States military on Wednesday announced the deaths of six Americans. Three marines and one soldier were killed on Tuesday during combat operations in Anbar Province, the military said, and two soldiers were killed by a bomb in northwestern Baghdad.

A car bomb exploded on Wednesday at a gas station near the Interior Ministry, killing eight people and wounding 32, according to a ministry official. A suicide bomber joined a crowd of mourners at a funeral in Dora, in southern Baghdad, and detonated his explosives, killing three people and wounding 12.

In Iraqi Colleges, Fear For An Already Shrunken Realm (WP)

By Sudarsan Raghavan

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

BAGHDAD, Nov. 15 -- Over the past six months, Professor Amir Hassan's world has been shrinking. Two colleagues were assassinated, one with his family. Another was kidnapped. Two received death threats, forcing one to flee to Jordan. And since September, six other senior members of his political science department at Baghdad University have left Iraq.

Now, Hassan, a slim, carefully groomed man with a snowy mustache and owlish glasses, expects his world to condense even more. On Wednesday, in words filled with deep foreboding, he said the mass abduction of scores of people from a government educational agency a day earlier would persuade more academics to flee, further weakening a crucial, if fragile, pillar of Iraq.

"We are living in the killing stage," Hassan said, seated behind a neat desk in a spare, dimly lit office. "We know that our chance of dying is now greater than our chance of staying alive."

The emotions unleashed by one of the biggest mass kidnappings since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion reverberated across Iraq on Wednesday, splitting the cabinet along sectarian lines and spawning a heated dispute over how many men were abducted. But the most profound effect of what many Iraqis view as a national calamity was felt in university halls and campuses across Iraq. Here, the abductions highlighted the plight of academics and an educational system besieged by sectarian tensions, lawlessness and government ineffectiveness.

"What happened in Baghdad yesterday was a catastrophe that could destroy the entire educational process," said Fikret Mahmoud Omar, an instructor at a technical college in the northern city of Kirkuk. "It shows that the process in Iraq is on the verge of collapse and confirms that terrorists and militias are the ones who are in control of events."

By late Wednesday night, it was still unclear how many Iraqis remained captive after Tuesday's brazen daylight raid on a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad's upscale Karrada neighborhood. About 80 gunmen, dressed in blue police commando uniforms and driving police vehicles with no license plates, handcuffed, blindfolded and carried off male employees and visitors. They locked women up in rooms before driving away in their official-looking convoy.

Less than 24 hours later, captives were being freed, an unusual development in a nation where kidnap victims are often held for months or killed. A Ministry of Higher Education spokesman, Bilal al-Khatib, said about 70 of as many as 150 kidnap victims had been released. But Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said about 40 had been set free and only a few remained captive. Higher Education Minister Abed Thiyab, a prominent Sunni Muslim, declared he would suspend his "membership in the Maliki government until all hostages are released."

Even as politicians bickered, they voiced a common belief that the assault could have serious repercussions in educational institutions across the country. Already, Khatib said, at least 160 professors have been killed since the U.S.-led invasion and more than 1,500 have fled the country, part of the growing exodus of middle-class professionals. Hassan, the professor, said he believes the kidnappers targeted the agency Tuesday because it granted scholarships to Iraqi professors and students applying to study abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0095231

"This was the means to have contact with other countries. So if they cut this, they cut life," said Hassan, who said he himself had no plans to flee Iraq.

On Wednesday, Maliki visited Baghdad University, one of Iraq's most prestigious academic institutions, to show his commitment to bolstering security and stopping sectarian strife.

Addressing students and professors, he described the kidnappers as "worse than extremists" and said the attack was a product of militia rivalries. Although no group has asserted responsibility, many people say they believe Shiite Muslim militias -- especially the Mahdi Army, linked to cleric and political kingmaker Moqtada al-Sadr -- were behind the abductions. Shiite groups have staged previous mass kidnappings and are widely believed to have infiltrated Iraq's security forces.

"We will chase those who did this ugly criminal act," Maliki promised.

But his audience was more interested about his plans for Iraq's universities. Several students and professors stood up to ask him questions about how he would shield them from the chaos infecting Iraq. Maliki said he would ban pictures, leaflets, placards or other politically inspired materials from campuses "because the universities shall remain outside partisan politics or sectarian affiliation." He also promised that the government would "allocate funds to support students" and that professors and students would be protected.

"I hope you will continue your studies vigorously and not bow in front of those who want to paralyze our universities," Maliki told the gathering. "We regret what happened yesterday, but the government's reaction was strong."

In Kirkuk, Essam Muhedeen Arzad, a student at the College of Education, said Maliki's words calmed him. "I feel very sad for what has happened, particularly since we are in Iraq, which is the land of civilization and learning," Arzad said. "We need to capture those who are responsible for this act and bring them to justice to show the world that we are a nation of civilized people and will not accept such terrorist acts."

But for other college students, the abductions were a tipping point. For months, Faiha Abdul Jabar, in her second year studying science at Diyala University, said she was thinking of quitting her studies and staying home. A few hours after the assault, she was convinced.

"As a girl, I have a lot of fears from what happened yesterday," Abdul Jabar said. "Those armed men were able to storm into a governmental office and kidnap all the employees, and no one was able to save them or protect them. So what will happen to us if armed men stormed our college and kidnapped us?"

"The government is responsible for what is happening, and the government is responsible for making me lose this year," she added.

Zaman Adam Ali, who is studying English at Diyala University, also quit her studies on Tuesday, along with her two sisters, Eman and Hanan. "The government is responsible for destroying our future," Ali said.

Like almost every upheaval nowadays in Iraq, the kidnappings are being viewed through a prism of sectarianism. Muhammad Jamal, a law student at Tikrit University, sees the political disputes as an attempt by Shiite officials, hardened by sectarian divisions, to "lessen the importance" of the assaults. "This action is proof that we have a sectarian government," he said.

In a parking lot at Baghdad University on Wednesday, Lena Sadhi and Fatima Salim were standing next to a white car. Two hours earlier, they and other students had staged a protest. They heard that the Ministry of Higher Education was considering shutting down universities in the capital in the wake of the abductions, citing poor security. But they were hungry for education.

"The government doesn't want to continue our studies. That's why we protested," said Salim, who wore an aquamarine head scarf. "Why can people in the north and in the south be able to finish their studies and we can't?"

But Salim was also angry at the kidnappers. "They want our life to collapse," she said. "The only life we have is the university."

US Troops Look For An Inside Man In Iraqi Slayings (LAT)

By Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

Baghdad — The U.S. soldier looked around a crowded Iraqi home and watched as an old man in a green dishdasha robe scooted across to an interpreter and whispered in his ear.

"The guy says if you don't take action, they're going" to do it themselves, the interpreter told Capt. Rob Murdough. The threat of vigilante revenge caused Murdough's face to flush.

"That's not justice," he said sharply, and turned to a young man sitting on a couch with half a dozen elders.

DOJ_NMG_0095232

Murdough normally led a mortar platoon, but in a city awash in killings he had become a detective trying to solve a mass kidnapping and slaying that may have been ordered by Iraqi police officials. After two frustrating days, Murdough thought he was finally near a break in the case: The young man he had come to see might be able to lead him to a suspect.

At least 22 Iraqi men had been kidnapped from a meatpacking plant, and six who were Sunni Arab Muslims had been shot dead. Investigators were trying to find an inside man — a Shiite Muslim employee at the plant — who they thought had helped the killers.

The employee, named Hussein, was believed to have contacts with the Al Mahdi army, the Shiite militia loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

If Murdough could get the young man to lead him to Hussein's house, the Army would arrest the suspect. But the young man had good reason to be leery. There was a sniper in Hussein's neighborhood, which was filled with Al Mahdi militiamen, he said. When a stranger walks in, they call each other by cellphone, he told the American soldier.

Murdough urged the young man to ride in a U.S. armored vehicle, promising he would remain hidden. After a time, he agreed and drew a crude map to Hussein's street, warning that the Al Mahdi army members there didn't want "anything to do with American soldiers."

Inside, the young man crouched on one of the vehicle's low benches, next to the interpreter and a soldier. His eyes grew wide as he examined the jumble around him: high-tech communications gear, weapons, an ice chest, a garbage bag. As the vehicle moved down the street, a soldier gave him a helmet and combat shirt and an olive blindfold. He tied it over his nose like a movie outlaw. Only his eyes showed.

The armored vehicle made a few turns and stopped. The soldiers got out and moved down a street of low walls and iron gates, taking a few minutes to chat with each man they encountered, just as they would on a routine patrol.

"Hi, we're here to help," Murdough said time and again. "Do you have any information about bad guys?"

Murdough noticed several men and boys gathered at one of the houses. He told Pfc. Julia Thompson, the team's only woman, to quietly take a photo. Thompson then took the camera back to the armored vehicle. The young man inside studied the image on the camera screen. One of the men was Hussein's father, he said, another his brother.

Murdough and his men moved on, casually stopping at several houses and sidewalk shops. Then they strolled back to the group. "Could we take a picture of your family?" he asked.

The men looked surprised, but agreed. While they posed, Murdough asked casually about the family. One of the men introduced two sons and said a third was at work. "What's his name?" Murdough asked.

"Hussein," the man said.

Murdough had located the suspect's home. Now he hoped that he had concealed his purpose enough to avoid scaring Hussein off. In a few days, he would return and try to make an arrest.

By now, Murdough and his commanding officer, Lt. Col. John Norris, were making progress in the investigation. They had evidence that pointed to police involvement in the slayings: In the empty lot where six of the kidnapping victims had been found shot to death, U.S. soldiers discovered shell casings that bore the characteristic square indentation made by a Glock handgun, a sidearm rare in Iraq except among the American-armed security forces.

Norris already had ordered one Iraqi police unit off the streets and back to its barracks for retraining. But he knew the unit would one day return to patrol, and he was concerned about its leadership.

On the fourth day after the kidnappings, Norris went to police headquarters to have what he thought would be a "face to face" with the Iraqi battalion's new commander.

Instead, after Norris cooled his heels in a dreary reception room, a large Iraqi man in a brown suit strode in followed by a videographer and a photographer. The man sat regally in the commander's chair and announced himself as Brig. Gen. Najim. Norris was surprised. Najim had been in command of three Iraqi police battalions, but Norris thought he had been dismissed.

Najim spoke to the American in a strident voice, keeping his eyes focused on the camera. Speaking through Norris' interpreter, the general insisted that Iraqi media had made up the story of police involvement in the kidnappings. The Iraqi police had conducted their own investigation, he declared.

"Everyone knows now we had nothing to do with that."

Norris disagreed. "They were Iraqi national police in Iraqi national police vehicles who conducted the kidnapping," he said.

"Only one vehicle," the general said.

"They carried Motorolas" — the type of portable radio used by Iraqi police — Norris said. "It was an organized Iraqi national police force."

Growing agitated, Norris recounted a killing he had witnessed the day before the kidnappings about 200 yards from an Iraqi national police checkpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0095233

"An Iraqi citizen was murdered on this street in cold blood," he said. "A vehicle stopped. Two individuals stepped out, shot him in the head several times. They got in the car and drove away."

Norris grabbed three soda cans to illustrate what he had seen.

"Iraqi national police headquarters," he declared, plunking down the first can on a coffee table. "Iraqi national police checkpoint," he said, putting the second down nearby. "Local national murdered in cold blood," he said, banging the third can on the table in front of the second.

"I have an Iraqi national police vehicle drive by while I'm standing there. I personally ask him to help. He said, 'It's not my job,' " Norris said. "Does this sound like the performance we want of the Iraqi national police? Is this somebody deserving of the respect of the Iraqi people?"

Najim seemed unimpressed. "What kind of vehicle was it?" he asked, sidestepping Norris' question.

As if on cue, an Iraqi officer entered the room, interrupting to announce that the battalion had been assembled.

"Do you want to see my men?" the general asked.

About 200 men came sloppily to attention as Najim and his American visitors walked out to the drill yard behind the building. "At ease," Najim said, displaying his authority. The men squatted on the concrete.

"Don't pay attention to the media," he said, as Norris looked on, astonished at the Iraqi's audacity. "They always say the wrong thing. Keep up the good work. You are all patriots."

As he moved to leave, police officers approached and kissed his cheek.

Third of four parts. Next: A little victory.

Nurture Iraqi Democracy, From The Ground Up (LAT)

By Michael Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

THE DEMOCRATICALLY elected government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri Maliki has proved a grave disappointment. Security has worsened since Maliki has been in power. Ignoring the pleas of U.S. officials, he has been unwilling to crack down on the militias and death squads that fuel sectarian violence — and the mass kidnapping from a Ministry of Higher Education building in Baghdad on Tuesday by gunmen in police uniforms shows the consequences.

Last month, Maliki's government refused to cooperate with U.S. troops searching for a kidnapped comrade. A week later, Maliki ordered U.S. forces to lift a blockade of Sadr City, where the missing soldier was believed to be held.

Corruption remains corrosive. Maliki's administration has hemorrhaged hundreds of millions of dollars. Oil revenues and foreign aid disappear. Maliki and his allies treat ministries as mechanisms for patronage. They dispense jobs to political loyalists, not able technocrats. Officials in the Shiite-dominated Health Ministry, for example, have replaced experienced doctors with uneducated militiamen.

But does this mean that the U.S. ambition to bring democracy to Iraq was a mistake? As a supporter of the war, and later an advisor to the U.S. occupation authority, I don't think so. Despite our disappointment with Maliki, the strategic rationale for promoting democracy in the Middle East — and in Iraq in particular — remains sound. But it needs to be a long-term strategy, as demonstrated by our success in Korea, where more than 35,000 American servicemen sacrificed their lives. Half a century later, the juxtaposition of totalitarian, destitute and nuclear North Korea with thriving and peaceful South Korea shows the value of a long-term strategy to build democracy.

With chaos growing, impatience in Washington should not come as a surprise. In March, Congress charged a bipartisan commission chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) to look at Iraq with "fresh eyes," but it's already clear that its final recommendations will not make a priority of preserving democracy. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the incoming chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has said he has no confidence in Maliki and has called for Iraq's division. Others seek to scrap the constitution or impose a strongman. Rumors circulate in Baghdad that the CIA plans a coup.

But to give up on democracy would affirm our adversaries' conspiracy theories, betray the Iraqi people and undercut U.S. diplomacy for decades. Rather, Washington should leave the elected government in place but stop funding it. If Maliki wants to treat ministries as fiefdoms, let him do it without our money. American taxpayers are under no obligation to subsidize an ineffective government that is hostile to U.S. interests.

Some who advocate shock therapy to reform the Maliki government, such as Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), argue that the way to force it to take responsibility is through a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops. But only the best-armed groups would benefit. Ending subsidies to the central government, though, would promote better government, more efficient tax collection and greater transparency over oil revenues (without, most likely, actually bringing down the Maliki government). Accountability, not elections, is the bedrock of democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0095234

I'm not suggesting that aid to Iraq should be cut off entirely. Rather, it should be redirected away from the central government through the U.S. military to Iraq's municipalities, especially those that are run by democratically elected city and town councils. Democracy is best built from the bottom up.

Shortly after Saddam Hussein's ouster, I spent a few days with the 173rd Airborne Brigade around Kirkuk, an ethnic and sectarian flashpoint. The U.S. troops offered aid, but the councils determined how it would be spent. For example, Kurds might be a plurality, but they could not dictate. In order to win consensus, they had to compromise with Turkomen and Arabs. Technocrats and those willing to compromise rose as Iraqis pushed the populists aside.

Can this local emphasis work given the ongoing sectarian violence? Yes. Many Iraqis support ethnic militias because they provide services and security the central government is unable to supply. The greatest impediments to reconstruction now are corruption and security. But every day, U.S. servicemen go on patrol across Iraq. They visit every city, town and village. They know what is possible and can keep tabs on the money they are handing out. While billions spent by Green Zone diplomats have evaporated into the ether, U.S. troops can provide accountability.

Injecting money directly to local projects works. Indeed, it is how Muqtada Sadr and the militias have won hearts, if not minds, and at a far lower cost. Rather than ignore our enemies, we should copy their model of success. The stakes for Iraq and U.S. national security are simply too high to throw in the towel.

Unleash The Shiites? (LAT)

By Laura Rozen

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

AS SECTARIAN violence rises in Iraq and the White House comes under increasing pressure to revamp its strategy there, a debate is emerging inside the Bush administration: Should the U.S. abandon its efforts to act as a neutral referee in the ongoing civil war and, instead, throw its lot in with the Shiites?

A U.S. tilt toward the Shiites is a risky strategy, one that could further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and that could backfire by driving its Sunni population into common cause with foreign jihadists and Al Qaeda cells. But elements of the administration, including some members of the intelligence community, believe that such a tilt could lead to stability more quickly than the current policy of trying to police the ongoing sectarian conflict evenhandedly, with little success and at great cost.

This past Veterans Day weekend, according to my sources, almost the entire Bush national security team gathered for an unpublicized two-day meeting. The topic: Iraq. The purpose of the meeting was to come up with a consensus position on a new path forward. Among those attending were President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security advisor Stephen Hadley, outgoing Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

Numerous policy options were put forward at the meeting, which revolved around a strategy paper prepared by Hadley and drawn from his recent trip to Baghdad. One was the Shiite option. Participants were asked to consider whether the U.S. could really afford to keep fighting both the Sunni insurgency and Shiite militias — or whether it should instead focus its efforts on combating the Sunni insurgency exclusively, and even help empower the Shiites against the Sunnis.

To do so would be a reversal of Washington's strategy over the last two years of trying to coax the Sunnis into the political process, an effort led by U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad. It also would discount some U.S. military commanders' concerns that the Al Mahdi army, a Shiite militia loyal to the radical cleric Muqtada Sadr, poses as great a threat to American interests as that presented by the Sunni insurgency centered in western Iraq's Al Anbar province.

So what's the logic behind the idea of "unleashing the Shiites"? It's the path of least resistance, according to its supporters, and it could help accelerate one side actually winning Iraq's sectarian conflict, thereby shortening the conflict, while reducing some of the critical security concerns driving Shiites to mobilize their own militias in the first place.

"As an alternative Plan B, it has the virtue of possibly being more militarily effective," said Thomas Donnelly, a military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

"When you are trying to police [a civil war], all you can do is contain it," said Monica Toft, a professor specializing in ethnic conflict at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. "Whereas if you're backing one side, there are not as many variables to control."

But such a strategy brings with it significant dangers. Washington might pick the wrong leaders on the side it chooses to back. Should it, for instance, continue to back Iraq's Shiite prime minister, Nouri Maliki, or tilt in favor of his Shiite rival, Abdelaziz Hakim, and his party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq? Either choice could lead to more intra-Shiite infighting and violence.

DOJ_NMG_0095235

Or the strategy could drive Iraq's Sunni tribes to align themselves more closely with Al Qaeda. And it seems certain to further alienate Iraq's Sunni neighbors and erstwhile U.S. allies such as Saudi Arabia, Turkey and Jordan — while strengthening Iran's hand in Iraq.

Among the risks of an unleash-the-Shiites strategy is that if it were adopted, the White House would be unlikely to publicly acknowledge that such a choice had been made. Like so much else that has contributed to the U.S. difficulties in Iraq, it would be a decision taken in the dark, outside the realm of public debate.

Police In Anbar Province Lack Protection, Pay (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, November 16, 2006

HADITHA, Iraq — Shaaban al-Obeidi, a police chief in a small town in western Iraq, is regularly the target of assassination attempts.

On one recent attack, he was shot in the chest and left for dead.

But al-Obeidi refuses to give up his job as police chief of Baghdadi, a Euphrates River valley town about 100 miles northwest of Baghdad.

"We will sacrifice our lives for our country," al-Obeidi says.

Anbar province, a Sunni stronghold west of the capital, is lightly held by about 33,000 U.S. troops spread across 53,000 square miles.

Marine Maj. Gen. Richard Zilmer, commander of forces in western Iraq, has said he doesn't command enough forces to defeat the insurgency. Instead, American forces are training Iraqi soldiers and police officers to do it.

Recruiting police officers and protecting them is difficult. Locals are reluctant to join the police because insurgents are waging an effective intimidation campaign and there aren't enough American forces to protect every recruit.

"Nobody from this area wants to join the police until they feel safe," says Marine Brig. Gen. Robert Neller, deputy commander of U.S. troops in the region. "We've seen a lot of positive signs. The police will give us information about insurgents. We just need to keep them alive."

During a recent tour of towns in Anbar, the challenges were evident: police officers complained of being outgunned by insurgents and often going unpaid.

Gen. John Abizaid, the U.S. commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, acknowledged during congressional testimony Wednesday that paying police officers in the province has been a problem. Anbar is a mostly Sunni province. The central government is dominated by Shiites. Abizaid also acknowledged Anbar was not under control. "I believe that you can't have a main effort everywhere and that the preponderance of the military activity needs to go into the Baghdad area," Abizaid said.

Insurgents wage an aggressive fight in Anbar. About 40% of the U.S. deaths this year in Iraq occurred in this region, which stretches from Baghdad to the border of Syria. The Pentagon announced Wednesday that insurgents had killed three Marines and one soldier in Anbar on Tuesday.

Insurgents work hard to scare locals from joining the police or helping the local government. In Rawah, a small town on a bend of the Euphrates River, insurgents killed a police officer in June and rolled his head through a marketplace, said Eloy Saenz, 55, a U.S. civilian adviser to the Rawah police. At the time, there were 28 police officers in the town. Now there are seven.

The force could use about 150 cops, says Saenz, a retired police sergeant from Houston who is stationed with Marines in Rawah. "People are afraid to be police here," he says. "They fear they'll be killed."

U.S. forces have put more troops in strategically important towns. In Qaim, about a mile from the Syrian border, a police force has been established and a municipal government is in place. U.S. forces have loosened the grip of insurgents and reduced violence in the town.

Marine Lt. Col. Scott Shuster says driving down Market Street, the town's main thoroughfare, used to be "a firefight the whole way."

Now, local vendors line the sidewalks. On one side, red-and-green wheelbarrows and generators are set out in front of a hardware store. On the other side, women sell radishes and bags of onions.

Still, outsiders are viewed warily. Pedestrians glare at a convoy of American Humvees. No one smiles or waves at the passing vehicles.

In his crowded office, Qaim Mayor Fahran Fahran complains that he receives no support from the national government. He needs fuel, equipment and salaries for his police force. The economy also needs a boost, he says.

On a recent visit, Neller says he'll provide equipment and is working on the pay issues with the government in Baghdad. He says Qaim needs about 2,000 police officers and has about 1,400. He promises to help recruit more.

DOJ_NMG_0095236

Marines elsewhere in the province also point to progress. Patrolling a six-lane highway near Fallujah whose lanes are blackened from roadside bomb blasts, Cpl. Scott Peterson says he sees Iraqi soldiers assuming more responsibility and becoming more capable.

"From our perspective, it is getting better," Peterson, 22, of Mobile, Ala., says over the clatter of an armored amphibious assault vehicle as it rumbles down the highway. "They're taking over."

Soldier Pleads In Iraq Rape, Murder Case (AP)

By Ryan Lenz

AP, November 15, 2006

One of four U.S. soldiers accused of raping a 14-year-old Iraqi girl last spring and killing her and her family pleaded guilty Wednesday, and agreed to testify against the others.

Spc. James P. Barker agreed to the plea deal to avoid the death penalty, said his civilian attorney, David Sheldon.

The military judge presiding over the case, Lt. Col. Richard Anderson, asked Barker why he participated in the attack in Mahmoudiya, a village about 20 miles south of Baghdad. It was among the worst in a series of alleged attacks on civilians and other abuses by military personnel in Iraq.

"I hated Iraqis, your honor," Barker answered. "They can smile at you, then shoot you in your face without even thinking about it."

Anderson accepted the plea agreement, which calls for Barker to serve at least life in prison. The judge will decide in a hearing Thursday whether Barker should be allowed to seek parole.

Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, and Pfc. Jesse V. Spielman, 22, members of the 101st Airborne Division with Barker, also are charged in the case. Cortez deferred entering a plea during his arraignment Wednesday morning. Spielman will be arraigned in December. The fourth soldier, Pfc. Bryan L. Howard, 19, also deferred entering a plea at his arraignment in October.

A fifth person, former Army private Steve Green, 21, pleaded not guilty last week to civilian charges including murder and sexual assault.

Green was discharged from the Army for a "personality disorder" before the allegations became known, and prosecutors have yet to say if they will pursue the death penalty against him.

The group is accused of raping the girl and burning her body to conceal their crimes, then killing the girl's father, mother and 6-year-old sister.

After entering his plea Wednesday, Barker gave the court a vivid account of the events.

Barker said he and the others were drinking and playing cards while they manned a traffic checkpoint. Green brought up the idea of raping the girl and killing her family, he said.

"He brought it up to me and asked me what I thought about it. At a couple of points, I told him he was crazy," Barker said.

Barker said he and Green then approached the others with the idea, but there never was a verbal agreement to do it.

"Things just got set in motion, we just started changing (clothes), myself, Cortez and Green," Barker said. "By the time we started changing clothes, it was more or less a nonverbal agreement that we were going to go along with what we were discussing."

Barker said he, Green and Cortez raped the girl, and Green killed the girl, her parents and her sister.

Barker did not name Spielman and Howard as participants in the rape and slayings, though he said they were at the house when the assault occurred and had come knowing what the others intended to do.

Under military law, soldiers who are present when a crime is committed can be charged with that crime even if they did not play an active role.

Cortez, who could face the death penalty if convicted, and Howard watched from the audience as Barker described the assault. They were accompanied by their defense attorneys and declined to comment.

Taliban, Al-Qaeda Resurge In Afghanistan, CIA Says (WP)

By Dafna Linzer, Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Al-Qaeda's influence and numbers are rapidly growing in Afghanistan, with fighters operating from new havens and mimicking techniques learned on the Iraqi battlefield for use against U.S. and allied troops, the directors of the CIA and defense intelligence told Congress yesterday.

Five years after the United States drove al-Qaeda and the Taliban from Afghanistan, Gen. Michael V. Hayden, director of the CIA, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that both groups are back, waging a "bloody insurgency" in the south and east of the country. U.S. support for the Kabul government of Hamid Karzai will be needed for "at least a decade" to ensure that the country does not fall again, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0095237

At yesterday's Senate hearings, devoted mostly to Iraq, Hayden and Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, painted a stark portrait of a struggling Afghanistan and a successful al-Qaeda capable of operating on two battlefields.

"The direct tissue between Iraq and Afghanistan is al-Qaeda," said Hayden, who visited both countries recently. "The lessons learned in Iraq are being applied to Afghanistan."

Senators noted the increased use of roadside bombs and the relatively new phenomenon of suicide attacks, which had not been seen in Afghanistan before the Iraq war.

Hayden told the Senate panel that the Taliban, aided by al-Qaeda, "has built momentum this year" in Afghanistan and that "the level of violence associated with the insurgency has increased significantly." He also noted that Karzai's government "is nowhere to be seen" in many rural areas where a lack of security is affecting millions of Afghans for whom the quality of life has not advanced since the U.S. military arrived in October 2001.

Maples said the insurgency "had strengthened its capabilities and influence" with its base among Pashtun communities in the south, as violence this year has almost doubled since 2005. U.S. troop levels in Afghanistan began dropping earlier this year as NATO arrived to take over the bulk of the fighting. Meanwhile, U.S. Special Forces continue to search for al-Qaeda bases in Afghan-Pakistani border areas.

The CIA director said that region has become a new "physical safe haven" that al-Qaeda uses as a "jump-off point for its guerrilla forays into Afghanistan."

Bush administration officials have repeatedly said that the battle against al-Qaeda has led to the death or capture of more than half of Osama bin Laden's top people.

Hayden said yesterday that "the group's cadre of seasoned, committed leaders" remains fairly cohesive and focused on strategic objectives, "despite having lost a number of veterans over the years." Bin Laden himself, and his deputy Ayman al-Zawahiri, continue to play a crucial role while hiding out somewhere along the Afghan-Pakistani border.

Hayden said the organization had lost a series of leaders since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. But the losses have been "mitigated by what is, frankly, a pretty deep bench of low-ranking personnel capable of stepping up to assume leadership positions." Hayden said the lower ranks are dominated by men in their early 40s with two decades of experience fighting.

The two intelligence chiefs said that al-Qaeda, through propaganda and attacks, has been increasingly successful in defining Afghanistan and Iraq as critical battlegrounds against the West.

"We have radical groups like al-Qaeda and its affiliates sponsoring terrorists, insurgents in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere that seem to be able to preempt governments and eclipse the moderate actors in the region. There remains in Iraq today a broad and vicious al-Qaeda offensive targeting us and innocent Iraqis," the CIA director said.

In Iraq, Maples said, al-Qaeda accounts for a fraction of the daily attacks. "Yet the high-profile nature of these operations have a disproportionate impact on the population and on perceptions of stability," he said. The death earlier this year of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, did not stop what Hayden described as an "al-Qaeda campaign of almost satanic terror" in that country.

In Iraq, Maples said, al-Qaeda has managed to "capitalize on the current cycle of sectarian violence, by creating the perception that its attacks are designed to aid and defend the country's Sunni minority."

Both men said a U.S. military failure in Iraq would effectively turn the country into al-Qaeda's next haven, providing the group with the kind of security it had in Afghanistan for years before 2001.

Christmas Tree Growers Want To Give U.S. Troops Abroad A Little Bit Of Home (USAT/AP)

By William Kates

USA Today, November 16, 2006

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — With U.S. troops facing another holiday season in foreign war zones, Christmas tree growers across the nation are donating thousands of trees to them and their families stateside.

“It's a special time of year. This is a small way to help lessen the pain of separation and say thank you for the sacrifices we are asking them to make,” said Richard Moore, a tree farmer who coordinates the collection for the Christmas Tree Farmers Association of New York. “Any American would want to help out.”

The “Trees for Troops” effort is part of a campaign by the National Christmas Tree Association's Christmas Spirit Foundation to collect more than 11,000 trees in 27 states, said Lee Ann Friga, a spokeswoman for the Missouri-based foundation.

DOJ_NMG_0095238

Last year, the foundation delivered more than 4,300 Christmas trees to soldiers' families at five Army posts, Friga said. It sent 175 trees overseas.

This year, the trees will be distributed among 20 military installations representing all four branches of the service, Friga said.

Four hundred trees will be sent to units stationed in Iraq, Afghanistan, Kuwait and Qatar, she said.

"The interest just exploded. This year, we had to include more growers and more pickup locations," Friga said.

In New York, growers can donate trees at any one of 10 drop-off locations across the upstate region, said Moore, a vice president of the national organization.

From those locations, the trees will be transported to tree farms in Ballston Spa and Scottsville, where FedEx has volunteered to pick them up and deliver them to the U.S. Army's Fort Drum near Watertown, and to other military installations, he said.

Last year, New York tree growers donated 145 trees.

"This year, we are trying to get more growers to contribute. We would rather have 150 growers give two or three trees each, rather than have one farm give 75 or 80 trees," said Moore, who is giving five trees. "The more, the merrier. We want to share the joy of giving."

The New York association has 450 members.

Moore said there are probably more than 1,000 other small tree farms in the state. Non-farmers can contribute trees by signing up on the national organization's website, Friga said.

The drop-off locations will collect trees through Nov. 28. All types of Christmas trees will be accepted, but Moore said they should not exceed 7 feet in height for shipping purposes. Pine trees and fir trees are recommended because they have the best needle retention, he said.

"Last year, my church sent a small Christmas tree to a soldier in Iraq who was from our congregation," he said. "He decorated it, put it on the back of his M1 (tank) and sent us back a photo. He came home this summer and told us how touched he had been by what we had done.

"Imagine touching thousands of people like that."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Enron's Causey Sentenced To 5 1/2 Years (AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - HOUSTON-Richard Causey, the last of the top Enron Corp. executives to learn his punishment, was sentenced Wednesday to five-and-a-half years in prison for his role in one of the biggest corporate scandals in U.S. history.

Causey, the company's former chief accounting officer, pleaded guilty in December to securities fraud two weeks before he was to be tried along with Enron founder Kenneth Lay and former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy, fraud and other charges related to the company's collapse.

Causey, 46, had agreed to serve seven years in prison. Prosecutors indicated they could have recommended it be reduced to five if they were pleased with his cooperation.

The maximum penalty for securities fraud is 10 years in prison and a fine of $1 million or twice the amount illegally gained.

Causey also agreed to fork over $1.25 million to the government and forfeited a claim to about $250,000 in deferred compensation as part of his plea deal. Unlike others at Enron, Causey didn't skim millions of dollars for himself from shady deals.

Prosecutors dropped their plan to seize Causey's home, a $950,000 two-story, red brick house in a Houston suburb.

Causey, the government's 16th cooperating witness who entered a guilty plea, had faced more than 30 counts of conspiracy, fraud, insider trading, lying to auditors and money laundering.

In his guilty plea, Causey admitted that he and other senior Enron managers made various false public findings and statements.

He did not testify in the Lay-Skilling trial earlier this year, though he was on the defense witness list.

Skilling and Lay were convicted in May of conspiracy and fraud. Lay's convictions were wiped out with his July death from heart disease. Skilling was sentenced last month to more than 24 years in prison.

Andrew Fastow, Enron's ex-chief financial officer whose schemes helped doom the company, was sentenced in September to six years and is serving his term in a federal prison in Louisiana.

DOJ_NMG_0095239

On Friday, Mark Koenig, Enron's former investor relations director, and Michael Kopper, an Enron managing director and Fastow's once-trusted top aide, were set to be sentenced.

Enron, once the nation's seventh-largest company, crumbled into bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Case Closed: Last Top Enron Exec Sentenced (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, November 16, 2006

A federal judge in Houston sentenced Richard Causey, former chief accounting officer of Enron, to 5½ years in prison Wednesday, bringing an end to the government's prosecution of top managers at what was once the nation's seventh-largest company.

Causey's sentence includes $1.25 million in forfeiture and a fine of $25,000. He could have received up to seven years under the plea deal he entered last year.

Earlier this year, a jury in Houston convicted Enron's two former CEOs, Ken Lay and Jeff Skilling, of lying to the public about the company's financial health. For his role in the fraud, Skilling was sentenced to 24 years and four months in prison. Lay's conviction was vacated because he died in July before he had the chance to appeal the verdict.

Causey was originally scheduled to go to trial as a co-defendant with the two men.

Former Enron chief financial officer Andrew Fastow, the other member of the company's inner sanctum of management, pleaded guilty in early 2004, agreeing to serve a 10-year sentence for crimes he committed at the company. But because of his cooperation, which culminated in one week of trial testimony on behalf of the government against Lay and Skilling, a federal judge in September reduced his sentence to six years.

Christopher Bebel, a Houston attorney who has followed the Enron proceedings, says it wouldn't have made any sense for U.S. District Judge Sim Lake to give Causey a stiffer sentence than Fastow.

"Judges strive for consistency," Bebel says. "Causey was less culpable than Fastow."

Enron collapsed into bankruptcy five years ago after acknowledging that Fastow, the CFO, had entered into numerous business deals with the company that helped prop up Enron's earnings. Fastow later admitted that he embezzled close to $30 million from the company. Enron's market capitalization, which at one point exceeded $60 billion, was wiped out in the ensuing sell-off of stock.

In January 2002, the Department of Justice formed the Enron Task Force. Since then, prosecutors induced 16 former executives to plead guilty to related crimes, while several others were convicted at trial. Two former Enron executives have been acquitted of all charges, and three Merrill Lynch bankers, convicted in 2004, had their convictions overturned on appeal.

Two other former Enron executives who pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government, Michael Kopper and Mark Koenig, are scheduled to be sentenced in Houston on Friday. But with Causey's sentencing, the last of the big Enron cases has been disposed of.

"This closes out an era," says Philip Hilder, a Houston attorney who represented internal Enron whistleblower Sherron Watkins. "Everything else will be a footnote."

Former Enron Accountant Gets 51/2 Years For Fraud (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The former chief accountant for Enron Corp. received a 5 1/2 -year prison sentence yesterday, becoming the last member of the energy trader's upper echelon to face judgment for a fraud that cost thousands of employees their jobs and left investors billions of dollars poorer.

Richard A. Causey, 46, pleaded guilty to a single count of securities fraud in December, weeks before he was to face trial on conspiracy and fraud charges in a case that government lawyers have called the most complex white-collar prosecution in history. Causey, who must also serve two years of probation, remained free yesterday while prison officials determined whether to send him to the facility he requested, in Bastrop, Tex.

Causey's sentence follows prison terms recently handed to two other key Enron figures. Former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling was sentenced last month to 24 years and four months, while onetime finance chief Andrew S. Fastow was sentenced in September to six years. Company founder Kenneth L. Lay died of heart disease in July, less than two months after a jury convicted him and Skilling of misleading shareholders and employees about Enron's mounting financial problems before its December 2001 bankruptcy.

DOJ_NMG_0095240

Corporate insiders portrayed Causey, a former accountant at Arthur Andersen LLP known for his genial personality and his love of golf, as a man cowed by Enron's aggressive, rules-bending culture. But prosecutors on the Justice Department's since-disbanded Enron Task Force contended that fraud could not have flourished without Causey's actions and his failure to blow the whistle on others.

His get-along attitude helped Causey steadily climb the corporate ladder, and he became Enron's top accountant in 1998, three years before the company's demise. Causey and his wife, Elizabeth, last year forfeited $1.25 million in a bank account, and he gave up the rights to about $250,000 more in deferred pay from Enron.

Under the terms of his plea agreement, Causey could have faced as many as seven years in prison, one more than Fastow, who was considered an architect of the Enron scheme and who used business partnerships to siphon as much as $60 million for himself and his friends. In September, a judge shaved four years off his possible sentence.

Prosecutor Kathryn H. Ruemmler requested a reduction of three to six months for Causey. Ultimately, U.S. District Judge Simeon T. Lake III gave Causey an 18-month credit for, among other things, helping to streamline the government's case.

Reid H. Weingarten, Causey's lawyer who is based in the District, said in an e-mail that it was "hard to be happy when a thoroughly decent man you like a lot gets 66 months, but we are relieved given how much worse it could have been."

On Friday, two more members of Enron's middle-management team are scheduled to be sentenced as the nearly five-year-old scandal draws to a close. Former investor relations official Mark E. Koenig and former finance executive Michael J. Kopper, the first man to admit criminal wrongdoing at Enron four years ago, will be sentenced by separate federal judges in Houston.

SEC Intensifies Probe Into Dell's Accounting (AAS)

By Dan Zehr, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin American-Statesman, November 16, 2006

Company postpones quarterly report at last minute

Federal securities regulators have launched a formal investigation into Dell Inc.'s financial record-keeping, upgrading an informal inquiry they started a year ago.

Dell disclosed the development Wednesday evening. At the same time, it said it would postpone its third-quarter financial report, which had been scheduled for today, until the end of the month.

Dell said the move was related to ongoing reviews of its accounting, not the upgrading of the Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

"It really is just a high degree of prudence that's being placed on all our financial reporting right now," said spokesman Jess Blackburn. "There's just a high degree of care being given to reviewing that material and being certain of what we want to report before we report it."

The SEC does not comment on investigations, and there have been few clues about what the probe involves. Dell previously has said the reviews focus on "issues related to accruals, reserves and other balance-sheet items."

A formal investigation indicates the agency has reason to believe there are problems with Dell's books and gives the agency the authority to subpoena testimony and documents.

"It's an important difference," said Jim Asperger, a partner with O'Melveny & Myers LLP, a Los Angeles-based law firm. "What that means is there could be third-party witnesses, former employees or some other persons or entities they want to compel to testify.

"It doesn't necessarily mean they're not satisfied with Dell's compliance in the investigation."

Blackburn said the company will continue to cooperate fully with the SEC, as well as U.S. Justice Department investigators who also are reviewing the company's record-keeping.

The formal investigation and postponed earnings come just as Dell appeared to have shrugged off the most serious effects of a yearlong stretch of setbacks.

It has seen its sales slow and profits fall. And it recently has lost ground to rivals, especially to Hewlett-Packard Co., which recently replaced Dell as the world's biggest computer maker.

Its shares hit a four-year low of $20.75 in July, but have been recovering as of late, closing Wednesday at $25.75. The shares fell almost 3 percent in after-hours trading following the SEC news.

In the past week, several analysts had brightened their outlook for Dell. While the company's computer shipments slowed, they said, it had sold more expensive machines and probably would report a stronger-than-expected profit.

They now will have to wait until later this month to find out how the turnaround at Dell is progressing.

DOJ_NMG_0095241

"It's not ideal to have to issue a delay . . . but they want to make sure they're not coming out and saying things they'll have to change later," said Sam Bhavnani, an technology analyst with Current Analysis in San Diego. "You definitely don't want to read too much into it. As a company, Dell has operated above board historically, so it's a wait and see type of thing."

Investors will also have to continue to wait for Dell's official second-quarter report to the SEC. Under the rules of the Nasdaq market on which Dell shares trade, its stock could be pulled from listing if it doesn't file the report in a timely manner.

Analysts have said the likelihood of Dell being delisted is remote, and Blackburn said the company has "no immediate concern of being delisted." Dell will file the official report when once its board's audit committee finishes its review of the company's books, he said.

Dell first revealed concerns about its financial reporting in August, when it said it had been the subject of an information investigation by the SEC. In response to that inquiry, Dell said it had found some accounting problems stretched back before the investigation started and asked the audit committee to begin an independent probe.

By September, the reviews had raised the interest of the Justice Department. The U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York asked for documents going back to 2002.

Dell initially downplayed the problems and said they likely would have little significant impact on its earnings. However, after the Justice Department launched its inquiry, Dell's audit committee said it had made no determination on how significant the impact of the investigations might be.

At the time, Bear, Stearns & Co. Inc. Andy Neff said, "Now that you have the U.S. attorney involved, this is becoming a concern."

Since the Justice Department opened its investigation, several prominent national law firms have announced class-action lawsuits on behalf of Dell shareholders. To date, none of those complaints has been granted class-action status.

Dell To Delay Results As SEC Begins A Formal Probe (WSJ)

By Christopher Lawton

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

Dell Inc. said the Securities and Exchange Commission had stepped up an informal probe into its accounting to a full-fledged investigation and that its fiscal-third-quarter earnings report will be delayed because of the "complexity" surrounding the inquiry.

The Round Rock, Texas, company disclosed it was being investigated by the SEC in August in what at the time was described as an informal probe. In advancing to what Dell now calls a "formal order of investigation," the SEC is given power to subpoena company officials and documents.

Neither Dell nor the SEC has disclosed the exact nature of the issues being investigated. In September, Dell issued a statement noting that the probe could involve potential issues "relating to accruals, reserves and other balance- sheet items." Companies use accruals and reserves when they sell services but deliver them at a later date. In Dell's case, the company typically sets aside funds from current operations to cover the cost of future warranty claims.

Dell declined to make executives available to comment. An SEC spokesman didn't return a call for comment. The announcement of the earnings-report delay and the SEC investigation came late yesterday, sending Dell's stock down 2.8% to $25.04 in after-hours trading from a 4 p.m. price of $25.75.

The intensifying investigation is the latest in a series of setbacks for Dell. Over the past year, the onetime highflier has suffered slower growth and falling profits amid a struggle to compete against resurgent rivals such as Hewlett-Packard Co. Dell recently lost its position as the world's largest personal-computer seller, according to market researchers IDC and Gartner. It also announced a battery recall involving millions of laptops in August because the batteries were a potential fire hazard. Dell's stock has fallen 14% so far this year.

The SEC investigation, when initially disclosed, was characterized by Dell as unlikely to materially affect its earnings. At that time, Dell's board also launched its own inquiry into the company's accounting at the request of management. But in September, the company said it would delay the filing of its second-quarter report with the SEC. Dell also disclosed it had been subpoenaed by the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York for documents going back as far as 2002. The second-quarter report still hasn't been filed with the SEC.

In a statement yesterday, Dell said it would report earnings by the end of the month and that future earnings would be announced one week later than previously scheduled. The company had been expected to announce its fiscal-third-quarter results today. Analysts had projected that the company would report improved profit for the quarter, thanks to more disciplined pricing.

DOJ_NMG_0095242

Charlie Wolf, an analyst with Needham & Co., said yesterday's news reflects confusion among Dell's senior management and casts further doubt on the future of Kevin Rollins, Dell's chief executive, who rose to the top spot in 2004. "It's like no one is running the ship," Mr. Wolf said. "Ever since Kevin became CEO, it's been a downward trajectory in this company."

Earlier this week, Dell's founder, Michael Dell, was quoted in a BusinessWeek.com article saying that he was searching for an executive to run Dell's services business in a bid to restore sales and profit growth to the company. Mr. Dell also reiterated his support for Mr. Rollins in that article.

Write to Christopher Lawton at christopher.lawton@wsj.com1

Dell Accounting Inquiry Made Formal By S.E.C. (NYT)

By Damon Darlin

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

Dell said yesterday that the Securities and Exchange Commission had started a formal investigation into its accounting practices, but provided no other details of the inquiry that began in August.

As a result, the computer company said it was delaying the release of its third-quarter financial results until the end of the month. It had planned to announce them today after the markets closed. The company said the delay was not because of the new status of the investigation, but rather because of the difficulty of answering government queries, conducting its own inquiry and quickly compiling complex financial information.

A spokesman for the company, Robert Pearson, said the company was “fully cooperating” with the S.E.C. But the company has refused to provide details to its investors about what has attracted the government’s attention. Mr. Pearson said it had nothing to do with options backdating, an accounting problem that has ensnared many high-growth companies in recent months. “We have to let it play out,” he said.

The announcement surprised analysts, as had previous announcements about the accounting investigations. Dell had announced preliminary results for its second quarter in August, but has not yet filed the required 10-Q quarterly report of those earnings with the S.E.C. The company also canceled an analysts’ meeting in September at the last moment, citing the S.E.C.’s investigation.

The company said that it would announce its third-quarter results in a news release at the end of the month and its top executives would not hold the customary conference call with analysts and journalists.

Despite the uncertainty of the investigation, many analysts had started to change their opinion of the company’s stock this month. Laura Conigliaro of Goldman Sachs lifted her recommendation in early November to neutral, from sell. Ben Reitzes, a UBS analyst, recently raised his rating on Dell to neutral from reduce on the ground that the company appears to have made steps to improve its margins.

The shares closed yesterday at $25.75, up 35.9 percent from its 52-week low of $18.95. Shares fell 2.7 percent in after-hours trading after the announcement.

A. M. Sacconaghi Jr., an analyst with Sanford C. Bernstein & Company who rates the company as outperforming the stock market, said in a research report published Monday that net income dropped 27.8 percent in the third quarter compared with last year. He also predicted that the company would show slower revenue growth of 1 percent compared with 5 percent in the second quarter.

On the plus side, the company may be seeing an improvement in profit margins because of less aggressive pricing of its PCs, he said. Gross margins, which had dropped in the second quarter to 15.7 percent, from 18.6 a year earlier, might have rebounded to 16.3 percent in the latest quarter, Mr. Sacconaghi said.

Mr. Sacconaghi also said that “further stock appreciation is likely to require patience as Dell takes action to stabilize its business, which may take several quarters.”

Dell continues to have problem selling computers in the United States, particularly to consumers. As a result, Dell has lost its berth as the world’s largest PC vendor to its rival, Hewlett-Packard, according to market analysts at IDC and Gartner.

Dell continues to lose share in the one segment of the PC market, notebook computers, that is growing significantly, said Tony Berkman, executive director of Majestic Research, which conducts equity research of technology companies. He said North American unit sales of notebooks declined in Dell’s third quarter by 4.9 percent. Much of that decline was the result of weakness in the company’s Inspiron line aimed at consumers.

The average selling price of the Inspiron notebooks was falling faster than the rest of the category, 19.2 percent in the last 12 months to $720, said Mr. Berkman. He did say that the company was seeing strength in its printer line, with unit sales up 28 percent year-over-year and unit sales of high-margin printer cartridges rose 43 percent.

Unlike many of the Wall Street securities analysts, he is not an optimist. “I believe in momentum,” said Mr. Berkman. “I just don’t know what that catalyst is for Dell.”

DOJ_NMG_0095243

Former HP Chairwoman Pleads Not Guilty In Spying Scandal (AP)

By Jordan Robertson, Ap Business Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN JOSE, California-Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn pleaded not guilty Wednesday to four felony identity theft and fraud charges for allegedly instigating the company's ill-fated spying probe into boardroom leaks.

Dunn appeared briefly for her arraignment in Santa Clara County Superior Court and was released on her own recognizance after her lawyer entered the plea for her.

She and her attorney, Raj Chatterjee, declined to comment as they left court.

Dunn, 53, is one of five people charged in the computer and printer maker's clandestine efforts to unmask board members who discussed company business with reporters. Investigators used a shady ruse known as "pretexting" to obtain the confidential phone logs of directors, reporters and others to trace the source of the leaks.

Testifying before a congressional in September, Dunn said she was repeatedly reassured by HP's lawyers about the legality of its detectives' subterfuge.

She resigned from HP's board after the scandal broke in early September. The two-time cancer survivor recently began chemotherapy for ovarian cancer.

Kevin Hunsaker, HP's former ethics chief who allegedly directed the probe, pleaded not guilty last week and was released.

Three private investigators - Ronald DeLia, Matthew DePante and Bryan Wagner - have also entered not guilty pleas and were released.

Lawyers for all the defendants are scheduled to appear in court again Friday to discuss the schedule for future hearings.

The defendants each face four counts: use of false or fraudulent pretenses to obtain confidential information from a public utility; unauthorized access to computer data; identity theft; and conspiracy to commit each of those crimes.

Each charge carries a fine of up to $10,000 (â‚¬7,817) and three years in prison.

Audit Clears SEC's Financial Statements (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Auditors gave the financial statements of the Securities and Exchange Commission a clean bill of health, a sign that the market watchdog has taken steps to fix problems that prompted a lawmaker last year to chide the agency for what he called "hypocrisy."

The Government Accountability Office, which reviewed the SEC's books for the fiscal year ended in September, said in documents issued yesterday that the SEC had come close to fully resolving past weaknesses in its financial controls.

The GAO had cited problems with how the SEC tracks penalties it levies, with its information systems controls and with its financial reporting process. Now, auditors say, those issues are far less serious than they were.

This is the third year the SEC has allowed outside audit of its books and financial controls, which are designed to help prevent fraud and mistakes.

The problems were exposed in March 2005, the same time securities regulators were imposing stiff new rules that forced managers at publicly traded companies to assess their own controls. The rules have proven expensive and controversial and are the focus of an aggressive and well-funded business lobbying campaign. This week, leaders at the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board, which oversees the audit industry, have been working to resolve differences in their approach to modifying the rules.

Word of the clean audit comes as SEC is facing new challenges. Under the direction of Senate Finance Committee Chairman Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa), the GAO is studying the agency's enforcement operations, including how it tracks cases and makes referrals to criminal authorities. The agency filed 9 percent fewer enforcement cases in fiscal 2006 than it did in 2005, according to statistics released earlier this month. The GAO report is to be completed in June.

Ousters Can Raise Chance Of Charges (LAT)

By Tom Petruno, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The firings of KB Home CEO Bruce Karatz and others in the corporate stock-option scandal make them possible targets for prosecutors.

By ousting KB Home chief Bruce Karatz over inflated stock option awards, the Los Angeles company's board instantly made the executive a high-profile potential target for federal prosecutors, legal experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0095244

More than 50 corporate officers nationwide have resigned or been fired in the continuing scandal over alleged option manipulation, but most of those have been at relatively small companies.

As the head of a business with $10 billion in annual sales, Karatz automatically would present a higher priority to government investigators than executives who ran much smaller firms, several attorneys said.

"Especially if it's someone senior, I think those go to the top of the list" for prosecutors, said John Olson, a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Washington.

Authorities have not accused Karatz of wrongdoing, and spokesmen for both the U.S. attorney's office and the Securities and Exchange Commission declined to comment Wednesday on Karatz or KB Home. The company in August disclosed that the SEC was conducting an informal investigation of its option practices.

On Sunday, the company's board announced that Karatz had resigned following an internal investigation that determined he was responsible for setting "incorrect" stock option grant dates from 1998 to 2005. The effect was to boost the value of those grants for Karatz and other KB Home executives.

"It's a huge thing for a board to kick out a CEO," said Thomas Curran, an attorney at Ganfer & Shore and a former assistant district attorney in New York.

The directors said that Karatz and Gary A. Ray, who had been the company's human resources chief, chose the option grant dates.

Ray also was fired Sunday, and the company said that Richard B. Hirst, its chief legal officer, had resigned.

Karatz, 61, had served as chief executive of KB Home since 1986.

"Bruce Karatz believed he was acting properly, with the knowledge and approval of legal counsel," his attorney, Daniel Bookin, said Wednesday.

The mispricing of option grants is at the heart of company and government investigations now covering more than 150 firms nationwide.

Options are rights to buy stock at a set price within a certain time period. Securities regulations generally require that the purchase price of an option be the stock's market price on the day the option is granted by the company's board.

The probes are focusing on so-called backdating, whereby some executives looked back weeks or months and reset grant dates to coincide with their stock's lowest price in a particular period. Doing so could give the executives instant paper gains on their options. It could also understate a company's compensation costs and overstate earnings.

Thus far, the SEC and Justice Department have filed civil and criminal cases against executives of two companies.

At a number of companies, however, board investigations have concluded that options were mispriced because of sloppy bookkeeping rather than intentional misconduct, and that there was no reason to fire executives even if previous earnings had to be restated.

Legal experts say companies naturally would prefer not to dismiss executives because doing so can imply wrongdoing by the company and invite lawsuits from angry shareholders.

"What company puts a gun in their mouth unless they really didn't have a choice?" Curran asked.

Directors' decision to fire executives, many attorneys say, is primarily motivated by a desire to show federal authorities that the firm is serious about fixing what went wrong. The hope is that the company can avoid a government lawsuit if it forcefully addresses alleged abuses.

"The reason that companies typically terminate executives is to take a step to avoid prosecution of the company itself," said Matthew Jacobs, a criminal defense lawyer at McDermott Will & Emery in Palo Alto.

But by conducting a detailed probe that exposes possible wrongdoing by executives, companies may also increase the likelihood of government charges against the dismissed officers, lawyers say.

In recent years, the SEC and the Justice Department have made it clear that they expect companies to aggressively investigate alleged executive wrongdoing — and to share that material with prosecutors. That can give government investigators a head start if they choose to pursue cases against individuals.

"It's a great advantage to a company to have a thorough investigation, and it's also a great benefit to regulators," said James Doty, a partner at Baker Botts in Washington.

Still, the act of mispricing option grants alone doesn't give the government a slam-dunk case of securities fraud, legal experts caution. One major hurdle is showing that an executive had an intent to deceive the company's directors and shareholders, and knew that the mispricing broke the law.

"It's one thing for a company to cut the cord to an executive and restate earnings, but it's not a straight line between that and the ability to indict and convict," Jacobs said.

tom.petruno@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0095245

CRIMINAL LAW:

Disgraced Lobbyist Jack Abramoff Reports To Prison (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - CUMBERLAND, Maryland-Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, convicted of federal charges after using expensive gifts, campaign donations and exotic trips to win access to the powerful in Washington, went to prison Wednesday.

Abramoff was the key figure in a government corruption scandal that contributed to the Republican Party's nationwide defeat in last week's midterm election.

Abramoff arrived at about 6:30 a.m. EST (1130 GMT) at a relatively secluded prison facility in western Maryland to begin serving a nearly six-year prison sentence for a fraudulent deal to buy a fleet of casino ships in Florida.

Abramoff was delivered out of sight of waiting reporters and camera crews and his arrival was announced in a two-paragraph statement by a prison representative.

The part of the camp where Abramoff will be kept is a 334-bed minimum security facility located near an industrial park along the north branch of the Potomac River.

The camp is all male. It consists of a number of two-story dormitories that are light red cinderblock structures. Each dormitory contains a number of six-bed cubicles, and Abramoff was being assigned to one of those. The prison is nearly surrounded by Appalachian Mountain ridges rising along either bank of the Potomac on the Maryland and West Virginia sides of the river.

Stephen Finger, executive assistant at the prison, said all inmates work while there. Incoming inmates such as Abramoff typically are assigned to menial jobs such as food service work. Finer said that inmates can work their way up from low-level jobs paying 12 cents an hour to better positions paying up to 40 cents an hour.

Abramoff also is awaiting sentencing for corrupting government officials and their staff members. He made a name for himself on Capitol Hill by lavishing politicians with football tickets or whisking them away on faraway golf junkets, and thus became the face of government corruption.

If it were up to the Justice Department, however, Abramoff would not be heading to prison - at least not yet. He could hold the key to a sweeping corruption case involving Congress, members of the Bush administration and their aides, and prosecutors said putting their star witness behind bars would impede the investigation.

But a Miami federal judge refused to delay the sentence, meaning Abramoff's cooperation will have to continue from prison, where he will be inmate No. 27593-112. Abramoff's lawyers had no comment.

Abramoff was originally assigned to a federal prison in Pennsylvania about four hours away from Washington. Prosecutors wanted him assigned, instead, to the prison here, which is about two hours away.

Abramoff enjoyed access and influence across Capitol Hill, from his close ties to congressmen to his hundreds of contacts with White House officials. He kept his powerful friends flush with campaign cash, gifts and trips such as a $92,000 chartered jet to Scotland for a golf outing with Representative Bob Ney, Bush administration official David Safavian and congressional aides.

Ney, an Ohio Republican who recently resigned, became the first congressman convicted in the case when he admitted last month that he took official actions on behalf of Abramoff's lobbying clients in exchange for his gifts and campaign donations.

The investigation had already ensnared Ney's former chief of staff as well as two aides to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. The investigation cost DeLay his leadership seat before he ultimately resigned, and it contributed to the Election Day defeat of Republican Senator Conrad Burns of Montana.

Safavian was sentenced in October to 18 months in prison for lying to investigators about his ties to Abramoff. He is asking a federal judge to postpone his sentence until he can appeal his conviction.

Burns, who received about $150,000 in Abramoff-related donations and whose aides traveled on the lobbyist's jet to the 2001 Super Bowl, has denied any wrongdoing. Though two of DeLay's aides have pleaded guilty, the former majority leader maintains his innocence and has not been charged.

Also under scrutiny are Representative John Doolittle, a California Republican, who accepted campaign money from Abramoff and used the lobbyist's luxury sports box for a fundraiser without initially reporting it, and former Deputy Interior Secretary Steven Griles, who senators and a former colleague said gave preferential treatment to Abramoff and his Indian tribe clients.

Abramoff Begins Serving Sentence At Maryland Prison (LAW)

By Anna Palmer, Legal Times

Legal Times, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095246

Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff reported to prison Wednesday in Cumberland, Md., to begin serving a sentence of almost six years for defrauding banks of $23 million when buying a Florida casino cruise line in 2000.

Abramoff also faces jail time after pleading guilty in Washington to fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe public officials. Justice Department lawyers have put off Abramoff's sentencing related to those charges, citing his cooperation with the department's ongoing corruption probe. He is expected to be sentenced in that case next year.

Although Abramoff was originally supposed to report to prison in Pennsylvania, the Justice Department intervened in late October, suggesting the Federal Correctional Institute in Cumberland as its preferred choice. Located in western Maryland, the medium-security facility is within driving distance of Washington, allowing federal prosecutors easy access to Abramoff.

Abramoff was sentenced in March by U.S. District Judge Paul Huck in the Southern District of Florida after pleading guilty to wire fraud, conspiracy to commit wire fraud, and mail fraud. He was also sentenced to three years of supervised release.

Abramoff's lawyers, from Chadbourne & Parke, declined to comment Wednesday.

Abramoff, formerly a top lobbyist at Greenberg Traurig's D.C. office, is at the center of a lobbying scandal that has already ensnared six other lobbyists and government officials, including former Rep. Robert Ney, R-Ohio, who pleaded guilty to criminal fraud charges in September.

Four of the six have pleaded guilty to bribery charges: Abramoff business partner Michael Scanlon, a former staffer to then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, R-Texas; Neil Volz, former chief of staff to Ney; Abramoff's Florida business associate Adam Kidan; and former Alexander Strategy lobbyist Tony Rudy. David Safavian, former chief procurement officer for the Office of Management and Budget, was convicted in June of making false statements and obstructing justice in connection with his work with Abramoff. He was sentenced to 18 months in prison last month.

Abramoff, former Greenberg Traurig lobbyists Jon Van Horne and Neil Volz, and former head of the Christian Coalition Ralph Reed Jr. still face a suit in Texas brought by the Alabama-Coushatta Tribe of Texas in July for allegedly defrauding the tribe, which had hired Abramoff to assist in keeping its gaming operation open.

Another Guilty Plea In 2002 Phone-jam Case (MANUL)

By John Distaso, Senior Political Reporter

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, November 15, 2006

Concord – A third conspirator has agreed to plead guilty to federal criminal charges in connection with a Republican operation that jammed Democratic get-out-the-vote telephone lines on election day, 2002.

Shaun Hansen, whose former telemarketing firm placed the hundreds of line-jamming calls after being hired by a Republican operative, admits violating federal statutes outlawing telephone harassment and conspiracy to commit telephone harassment.

He faces maximum penalties of $250,000 and five years in prison for the harassment charge and a fine of $250,000 for the conspiracy charge. But under an agreement filed in U.S. District Court in Concord this week, federal prosecutors agreed not to oppose Hansen's request for sentence reduction "based upon the defendant's apparent prompt recognition and affirmative acceptance of personal responsibility for the offense."

The Justice Department also agreed not to prosecute Hansen on any additional charges.Hansen owned the former Idaho-based Mylo Enterprises, a telemarketing firm that was paid $2,500 by GOP consultant Allen Raymond to place hundreds of hang-up calls to five Democratic Party offices and the Manchester firefighters union headquarters to jam their get-out-the-vote and rides-to-the-polls telephone lines. The operation proceeded for about 90 minutes on the morning of election day, 2002, before being called off by the former GOP state chairman.According to previous court documents and testimony, Raymond was hired by former state Republican executive director Charles McGee for $15,600 to find a firm to make the calls. McGee and Raymond also spoke with former Republican National Committee official James Tobin about the operation, according to court documents and testimony.

McGee and Raymond pleaded guilty to harassment and conspiracy charges and served seven and three months in prison, respectively. Tobin was convicted by a jury a year ago on federal conspiracy charges and is free pending appeal.

Hansen's plea agreement was filed less than three weeks before he was to stand trial on Dec. 5.

A civil suit filed by the state Democratic Party against the state Republican Party, the Republican National Committee and other GOP entities and officials is pending in state Superior Court. Democrats are trying to discover whether national GOP figures had any involvement in the phone-jamming operation, while Republicans say the suit is a political stunt meant to embarrass the party.

State Democratic Chair Kathy Sullivan yesterday called Hansen's plea "a sad reminder of the type of politics rejected by the voters last Tuesday," when Democrats registered major victories on Capitol Hill and in New Hampshire.

DOJ_NMG_0095247

Judge Sentences TV Advertiser To 86 Months For Selling Faulty Computers (AP)

By Maryclaire Dale, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - PHILADELPHIA-A TV pitchman who defrauded customers, banks and vendors out of $39 million by selling them faulty computers was sentenced to more than seven years in prison by a judge who called his conduct "unforgivable."

George Capell, 51, continued to scheme until the end, tapping a secret bank account even after his bankruptcy and guilty plea to indulge a taste for strip clubs, fancy cars and a Florida condominium, authorities said.

"This to me is unforgivable," U.S. District Judge Anita B. Brody said Tuesday in handing down an 86-month sentence, near the top of the sentencing guidelines.

Capell's lawyer, Scott DiClaudio, blamed the losses on "a failed business model."

After seeing Capell's TV infomercials, some customers spent upward of $2,000 apiece on computer systems that arrived, if at all, with broken or missing parts. Many of the customers were disabled or unemployed, and needed the computers to find jobs, the judge said.

Others lived in rural areas far from an electronics store, and were forced to buy computers sight unseen, said bankruptcy court trustee Lawrence Lichtenstein.

The bilked customers, from more than a dozen states, have received restitution of 25 cents on the dollar, Lichtenstein said. He hopes to eke out another 10 cents on the dollar for them through the sale of Capell's condominium and half the proceeds of Capell's $1 million home.

Capell's wife Lynn is entitled to the other half of the house proceeds. She was in court Tuesday with the couple's three children, ages 20 through 23.

"I'm truly sorry for those people that were hurt in this case. I thought I could make it work, but I was wrong," Capell told the judge.

Capell pleaded guilty to 41 fraud and money laundering counts in April. His company, which did business as the Video Computer Store, ran a call center and warehouse from 1999 to 2001.

Capell was ordered to pay nearly $32 million in restitution, but Lichtenstein doubts victims will see anything close to that amount, even after Capell leaves prison. The trustee has recovered just over $1 million so far.

Capell's chief financial officer, Patrick Buttery, pleaded guilty to similar crimes and is scheduled to be sentenced on Jan. 30.

Authorities Form Multinational Unit To Hunt Pedophiles (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — U.S. agents are joining authorities in Canada, Britain and Australia to form a global police unit that will help monitor the Internet for child molesters who seek victims online.

Law enforcement representatives from each country met here Wednesday to discuss the program, one of the latest in a series of initiatives aimed at countering the rising number of ways in which pedophiles and pornographers use the Internet to harm children.

Under the program, known as the Virtual Global Taskforce (VGT), agents from each nation will take turns monitoring a London-based website (www.virtualglobaltaskforce.com) that responds to reports from youths and others about suspected predators, says VGT Chairman Jim Gamble, chief executive officer of the United Kingdom's Child Exploitation and Online Protection Center.

Investigators can immediately trace a suspect's location through his Internet connection and contact a local police agency to further investigate the case or make an arrest, Gamble says. As authorities have done in anti-child-pornography programs, VGT investigators also will go undercover in chat rooms and on websites where pedophiles are likely to be, he says.

The VGT is one of dozens of ways police and child protection groups try to catch predators and stem the trade in pornographic photos of children. The groups work with Internet service providers and credit card companies to identify websites used to trade such photos. Congress has boosted funding for investigations and prosecutions aimed at child porn.

VGT has operated in Britain and Australia since January 2005. U.S. authorities have been involved in planning the site since the concept arose in 2002 but have not been full participants. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) will staff the U.S. part of the operation beginning in January from the agency's cybercrime center in Virginia, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers says.

DOJ_NMG_0095248

Youths and others can report suspicious conversations or contacts to the VGT's website. Several popular chat sites feature the VGT's icon, so people can link immediately to the site to file a report, Gamble says. The website fielded 2,000 reports in the first six months of 2006, he says, more than 75% of which came from children.

The first online offender caught through the global policing program was sentenced June 22 to nine years in prison in England. Lee Costi, 21, of Haslemere, Surrey, pleaded guilty to sexual activity with a child, making indecent images of children, possessing more than 40 such images and several other charges.

According to the Nottinghamshire police in England, Costi was arrested after a teenage girl whom Costi had approached in a chat room had reported the information to the VGT website. Clive Michel, spokesman for the U.K.'s Online Protection Center, says investigators tracked down Costi and the case led authorities to identify at least one other pedophile in Eastern Europe.

In another case, U.S. authorities received information about a man in England who said in a chat room that he planned to molest children, ICE spokeswoman Jamie Zuieback says. U.S. authorities shared the information with VGT investigators. U.S. and British investigators quickly traced the man's location, and British police arrested him at his house, where they found child pornography, she says.

"VGT is the multinational, online police station," Gamble says.

"We really need to ignore the territorial boundaries because the Internet doesn't have territorial boundaries."

Judge Rejects Challenge To Evidence In Cuban Agent Case (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

MIAMI - A federal judge refused Wednesday to throw out a lengthy statement given to the FBI by a college professor charged along with his wife with acting as illegal agents of Cuba's communist government.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Barry Garber, whose recommendation must be approved by another judge, ruled that Florida International University psychology professor Carlos Alvarez gave the statements voluntarily, was free to leave the FBI interviews any time and was never promised immunity from prosecution.

The statements Alvarez gave to the FBI in summer 2005 are the cornerstone of the federal case against he and his wife, Elsa, also an FIU employee. They were arrested in January on charges of failing to register with the U.S. as agents of Cuban President Fidel Castro's government and have pleaded not guilty.

Transcripts of the statements show that Alvarez admitted to decades of involvement with Cuba. Prosecutors say they spied for Cuban President Fidel Castro's government, mainly on activities of Cuban exiles and prominent people in Miami and on U.S. political developments and public opinion.

Alvarez testified during hearings in August that he viewed himself as a "collaborator" with the Havana government but not as foreign intelligence agent. Prosecutors also have evidence from telephone wiretaps and at least one listening device placed in the Alvarez's Miami home.

Alvarez's lawyer will have a chance to contest the ruling before U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore, who is overseeing the case, issues a final decision.

Officials Cannot Confirm Whitey Bulger 'Sighting' (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, November 16, 2006

The tip sounded like a scene out of a movie: Fugitive gangster James "Whitey" Bulger was believed to have been spotted at a San Diego theater last month, checking out Jack Nicholson's portrayal of him in the new gangster film, "The Departed."

A deputy sheriff's belief that he trailed the Bulger look-alike from the theater on Oct. 6 before losing him on a trolley sent the FBI and San Diego police scrambling to review surveillance tapes from the theater and surrounding area, according to law enforcement officials.

But yesterday, the US attorney's office in Boston, which is overseeing the hunt for Bulger, 77, one of the FBI's 10 Most Wanted, said the sighting remains uncorroborated.

"Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego," Robert Krekorian, executive assistant US attorney, said in a prepared statement.

"At this time, no one has concluded that the individual in question is, in fact, James Bulger."

Krekorian added that, as with every lead in the manhunt, all "logical and appropriate investigative steps" are being taken to follow up on the sighting.

Bulger, a longtime FBI informant, fled before his 1995 racketeering indictment and has since been charged with 19 murders.

The last confirmed sighting of the South Boston crime boss was in London in September 2002, according to the FBI.

DOJ_NMG_0095249

There was another reported sighting in California, which the FBI said it never resolved.

In January 2000, Bulger and his girlfriend, Catherine Greig , were allegedly seen at a hair salon in Fountain Valley, Calif., less than 100 miles from San Diego.

Feds To Be On Alert At Whitey Galpal's Mom's Burial Today (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, November 16, 2006

The South Boston mother of James "Whitey" Bulger's girlfriend, Catherine Greig, will be laid to rest today, presumably never to know if her fugitive daughter is dead or alive.

Jenit L. Greig, 78, died Monday. A memorial service will be held this morning at the O'Brien Funeral Home in South Boston. Sources said federal authorities, who have been hunting for Bulger and Greig nearly 12 years, will be watching.

Meanwhile, Whitey watchers are debating the authenticity of an alleged San Diego sighting of America's most-wanted fugitive mob boss last month.

"Bulger Fugitive Task Force investigators have reviewed all relevant material related to the recently reported sighting of James Bulger in San Diego," executive Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Krekorian in Boston said yesterday in a prepared statement.

"At this time, no one has concluded that the individual is in fact James Bulger."

An off-duty cop claimed he saw Bulger leave a showing of "The Departed" at the UA Horton Plaza 14 movie theaters in downtown San Diego, then board a trolley. Bulger was reportedly alone.

Theater manager Robert Livingston said the cineplex is less than 15 miles from the Mexico border. He said FBI agents in San Diego subpoenaed the theaters' security tapes.

"The Departed" stars Jack Nicholson as a psychotic South Boston Irish crime boss, believed to be based on Bulger, 77, a suspect in at least 19 murders.

Friends said Jenit Greig, whose now 55-year-old daughter Bulger took on the lam, was "a very nice, very quiet" woman.

Her sister, Iva Harrington, 81, declined to comment. Catherine Greig's twin sister, Margaret McCusker, did not return a call.

Peter Gelzinis, Howie Carr and Michele McPhee contributed to this report.

Official Admits Accepting Bribe (NSL)

By John P. Martin, Star-ledger Staff

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), November 16, 2006

A former West Long Branch councilman yesterday admitted taking a $1,500 bribe in an FBI sting, the latest conviction in a long-running investigation of municipal corruption in Monmouth County.

Joseph DeLisa, 50, pleaded guilty to a single count of extortion during a hearing before U.S. District Judge William Martini in Newark.

Under questioning from Assistant U.S. Attorney Marc Larkins, DeLisa acknowledged taking the bribe in November 2003 from a cooperating FBI witness posing as a demolition contractor. He said he had been introduced to the contractor by then mayor Paul Zambrano.

In return for the money, DeLisa promised his support on no-bid township contracts.

Both men were among nearly 20 elected officials and businessmen in Monmouth County charged or convicted of public corruption since early 2005. DeLisa, a councilman since 1998, immediately resigned. Zambrano was the first to enter a plea more than a year ago; he admitted taking $15,000, but has not yet been sentenced.

DeLisa's plea was similar, but it left unresolved one of the most notable allegations in his case: that he also accepted payoffs from developers Jack Westlake and Jack Morris when Morris wanted to build a drugstore in the town.

Those accusations emerged in a new indictment last spring, when federal agents were intensifying their investigation into former state Senate President John Lynch, a close friend and business partner to both Westlake and Morris.

Lynch and Westlake have since pleaded guilty to unrelated tax and fraud counts. Morris has never been charged.

Larkins and Assistant U.S. Attorney Rachel Honig declined to comment yesterday on the alleged drugstore plan bribe.

DeLisa left the courtroom without commenting. His attorney, John McDonald, noted that the ex-councilman's plea didn't include any reference to the project or developers. He declined to say more, except that DeLisa isn't cooperating and hoped to put the case behind him.

West Long Branch Councilman Admits Taking Bribe (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095250

NEWARK, N.J. (AP) _ Former West Long Branch Councilman Joseph DeLisa admitted Wednesday that he took a $1,500 cash bribe in an Atlantic City hotel room from someone he believed to be a corrupt contractor seeking business with the borough.

DeLisa, 50, pleaded guilty to extortion, and could receive as much as 20 years in prison when sentenced in March.

A councilman from January 1998 through February 2005, DeLisa admitted that on Nov. 19, 2003, he met the man he believed to be a demolition contractor and accepted the cash from him.

DeLisa told U.S. District Judge William J. Martini that former West Long Branch Mayor Paul Zambrano introduced him to the contractor, who was actually an FBI cooperating witness.

DeLisa said he and Zambrano agreed that DeLisa would assist the contractor in obtaining demolition and other public contracts from the borough. Zambrano pleaded guilty to the same charge in August 2005, and is awaiting sentencing.

John Dougherty's Home Searched In Federal Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Michael Currie Schaffer

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 16, 2006

Federal agents executed a search warrant at the home of labor union leader John J. Dougherty last week as part of their tax-fraud investigation into a local electrical contractor, sources said.

The sources, who declined to be identified because the matter remains under investigation, said agents entered the South Philadelphia home of Dougherty, a possible 2007 mayoral candidate, early Friday morning.

Philadelphia FBI spokeswoman Jerri Williams said she could neither confirm nor deny the raid.

Dougherty's spokesman, Frank Keel, did not return repeated calls for comment.

Friday's search represents the most recent turn in the sprawling investigation of the contractor, Donald "Gus" Dougherty, who is a close friend of but no relation to John Dougherty.

The probe became public Jan. 28, when FBI, IRS and Labor Department agents raided Gus Dougherty's large home on Pierce Street.

As the investigation proceeded, it also shined a light on the well-connected contractor's dealings with several prominent city political figures - notably John Dougherty, who leads the local electricians' union. Until earlier this year, he also was the treasurer of the city's Democratic Party.

Sources said agents have asked whether electricians' union leaders knew about an alleged scheme by Gus Dougherty to avoid paying federal taxes and union health and pension payments by paying union electricians in cash.

They also said investigators have scrutinized financial transactions between the contractor and the union leader, including renovations at John Dougherty's home and the sale of a Jersey Shore condo by Gus Dougherty to John Dougherty.

Last spring, subpoenas also were issued to the city Redevelopment Authority and to the Pennsport Civic Association - both of which are led by John Dougherty. The Pennsport subpoena was reported by the Philadelphia Daily News.

John Dougherty has repeatedly said he did nothing wrong, insisting in a May interview that he "paid through the nose" for the home renovations because he told Gus Dougherty "to do it by the book."

"There has been no new development with regard to any matter involving my client," Gus Dougherty's attorney, Nicholas J. Nastasi Sr., said yesterday.

Over the years, Gus Dougherty's projects have included the 2000 Republican National Convention, Center City hotels, and the implosion of Veterans Stadium. He also did electrical work for a number of leading local Democrats, including U.S. Rep. Bob Brady and State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

Though allies had distributed bumper stickers and T-shirts touting his mayoral candidacy, John Dougherty has maintained a lower profile over the last few months. Aides say he was busy working behind the scenes on state political issues.

FBI Joins Johnson School Inquiry (LEXHL)

By Lee Mueller, EASTERN KENTUCKY BUREAU

Lexington Herald-Leader (KY), November 16, 2006

Ex-official's son paid while in jail

PAINTSVILLE - The FBI has joined a Johnson County grand jury investigation into allegations that a former school district finance director allegedly had her son on the system's payroll while he was in jail.

Peggy L. VanHoose, 56, of Tudor Key allegedly paid her son, Michael D. VanHoose, thousands of dollars between 2000 and 2005, although he spent 92 weeks of that time in the Big Sandy Regional Detention Center, according to jail records and a recent audit conducted for the school district.

Assistant Commonwealth's Attorney David Blankenship said yesterday that an FBI agent had contacted Johnson County prosecutors about the case.

DOJ_NMG_0095251

An FBI agent in Pikeville identified by Blankenship could not be reached.

Meanwhile, a Johnson County grand jury is scheduled to meet Thursday to question witnesses, including new schools Superintendent Steve Trimble, a school board member and VanHoose's former payroll officer, Shelby Jean Coleman.

VanHoose, who was being paid $96,000 a year, had worked 33 years for the district. Board officials said they began an internal investigation shortly after Superintendent Orville Hamilton died of cancer in October 2005.

Trimble, who became superintendent of Johnson County schools on Jan. 1, was not in his office yesterday morning and did not return two phone calls.

A recent audit by a Paintsville firm, Wells & Company PSC, did not identify VanHoose's son by name, but reported that an employee -- with no record of being hired -- had been paid from Jan. 1, 2000, to Dec. 31, 2005, although Big Sandy Regional Detention Center records show he was in jail for 92 weeks during that time.

The Paintsville Herald reported recently that school district finance records show Michael VanHoose was paid $64,723.72 between Nov. 28, 2002, and Dec. 31, 2005. For the first 141/2 months of that period, he was incarcerated on drug charges, jail records show.

The district's records showed he received a pay raise while in jail in July 2003, the newspaper said. His two-week paychecks eventually rose from $675.68 to $961.42 by December 2005.

The audit report said no time sheets were submitted, but payroll checks were given to another employee and later cashed.

Peggy VanHoose was paid about $7,000 a month from July 2002 to August 2005, but her pay slowly decreased to $1,751 by March of this year, the paper said.

Coleman, 47, a tenured classified employee who had worked almost 20 years in VanHoose's office, was fired in May. She is challenging her dismissal, but a due-process hearing scheduled for this week was postponed after she was subpoenaed by the grand jury, said Michael Schmitt, a Paintsville attorney who represents the school district.

"We just want to see if the grand jury's going to wrap up its business soon or whether it's going to go on," said Coleman's attorney, Mary Ruble of Lexington. Hearing officer Bayard Collier has not yet rescheduled the hearing, she said.

Coleman has a high school General Educational Development certificate. Investigators say she was being paid $47,000 a year.

Reach Lee Mueller at (606) 789-4800 or at lmueller1@herald-leader.com.

NY Authorities Bring Down Huge Gambling Ring, Arrest Poker Player (AP)

By Tom Hays, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — More than two dozen people, including a former professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged Wednesday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books.

The massive illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a site called Playwithal.com, run by the poker player, James Giordano, 52, of Pine Crest, Fla., Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown said.

A break in the case came last year when New York Police Department investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early Wednesday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortess-like Florida compound.

Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, on Long Island, a one-time scout for the Washington Nationals and for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," Kelly said at a news conference. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Though the gambling ring relied on a Web site, it was different from the online betting operations targeted by recent federal legislation, said Deputy Inspector Brian O'Neill, who supervised the investigation.

The scheme involved placing sports bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the restricted Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, car racing and golf.

The defendants allegedly laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, Brown said. The prosecutor called the $500 million asset forfeiture case "among the largest such cases ever filed."

A total of 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with enterprise corruption, money laundering, promoting gambling and other counts. Giordano had waived extradition in Florida and was expected to be arraigned next week; prosecutors did not have the name of his lawyer.

Falzarano, who was ordered held on $500,000 bail after pleading not guilty, "looks forward to defending himself in court," defense attorney Peter Tomao said.

In a statement, the Nationals described Falzarano as a part-time scout whose contract expired on Oct. 31 and was not renewed. The team declined further comment.

Charges also were brought against three companies that allegedly helped Giordano develop and secure the Web site: Primary Development Inc. of Farmingdale, N.Y., Prolexic Technologies Inc. of Hollywood, Fla., and Digital Networks, S.A., Inc. of Davie, Fla.

Search warrants executed in several locations resulted in the seizure of gambling records, computers and hundreds of millions of dollars in property, some of it stashed in a secret room concealed by a bookshelf in the Manhattan home of one of the suspects.

The property includes four Manhattan condominiums, millions of dollars in cash, tens of thousands of dollars worth of casino chips from the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, jewelry, gold coins, and a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory. Also seized was original artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dali.

Police launched an investigation last year after receiving a tip from a suspect in a separate organized crime probe. Over the next several months, detectives with computer expertise broke the code for the Web site and began electronic surveillance of the suspects.

Giordano "carried everything about the gambling enterprise on a laptop computer never let out of his sight, except when he left it at a hotel in Nassau County where he had returned this past June for a family wedding," Kelly said.

In the three hours that Giordano and his wife were at the wedding, investigators entered the hotel room with a warrant, found the laptop on a desk and made a digital copy of the hard drive without his knowledge, police said.

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em tournament at the Bellagio worth nearly $100,000 earlier this year.

Online Bookie Ring Has Link To Miami (MH)

The Miami Herald, November 16, 2006

It was the key to a billion-dollar-a-year illegal gambling kingdom: a laptop computer that authorities say was owned by a professional poker player from Miami named James Giordano.

Giordano, who rarely let the computer out of his sight, left it behind earlier this year in New York while attending a wedding, police said Wednesday. But in the three hours he and his wife were away from their Long Island hotel room, investigators armed with a search warrant and computer expertise sneaked in, found the laptop on a desk and made a digital copy of the hard drive.

The covert operation on June 15 helped unlock a sophisticated Internet-based gambling scheme that has taken in $3.3 billion in cash wagers from 40,000 bettors nationwide since 2004, authorities said. They announced charges against Giordano, 26 other defendants and three companies, including one in Hollywood and another in Davie.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," said New York Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly. ``It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

At first, FBI agents and Miami-Dade County police tried to trick Giordano, 52, into letting them onto his property. They phoned him from a call box next to the entrance gate of his walled Pinecrest estate, saying they needed to get in to catch a burglar. He said no.

Armed with arrest and search warrants, they then climbed over Giordano's four-foot wall and knocked on his front door. They arrested him about 6 a.m. Tuesday, and he was placed in police custody.

FBI spokeswoman Judy Orihuela said FBI agents also searched the South Florida homes of some other suspects and the offices of companies involved.

Arrested at his Long Island home in Seaford, N.Y., was Frank Falzarano, identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals baseball club. Falzarano, 52, allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies.

Prosecutors claim the ring ran gambling wire rooms in Miami and on the Caribbean island of St. Martin, where operators took bets and kept records. Bookies assigned clients a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through a restricted website, Playwithal.com. The bets were on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, auto racing and golf.

SHELL CORPORATIONS

The defendants laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, said Queens, N.Y., District Attorney Richard Brown. The prosecutor called the $500 million asset forfeiture case ``among the largest such cases ever filed."

The 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with money laundering and promoting gambling, among other counts.

DOJ_NMG_0095253

Giordano waived extradition in Florida and is expected to be arraigned next week. Prosecutors did not have the name of his attorney.

Falzarano, who was ordered held on $500,000 bail after pleading not guilty, "looks forward to defending himself in court," said defense attorney Peter Tomao.

Charges also were brought against three companies that allegedly helped Giordano develop and secure the website: Primary Development of Farmingdale, N.Y., Prolexic Technologies of Hollywood, and Digital Solutions of Davie.

No officials at the companies would comment.

At Prolexic -- in the downtown Hollywood arts district on the fourth floor of the Harrison Executive Centre at 1930 Harrison St. -- at least three law enforcement officers were loading computer equipment from the company onto a dolly. When a reporter walked in, the officers shut and locked the door.

The companies face a fine of $10,000, or twice the amount of their illegal gains, prosecutors said.

The individual defendants face up to 25 years in prison if convicted.

VALUABLE POSSESSIONS

Search warrants resulted in the seizure of gambling records, computers and hundreds of millions of dollars in property, some of it stashed in a secret room concealed by a bookshelf in the Manhattan home of one of the suspects.

The property includes four Manhattan condominiums, millions in cash, tens of thousands of dollars' worth of casino chips from the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, jewelry, gold coins and a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory. Also seized was original artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dalí.

Police launched an investigation last year after receiving a tip from a suspect in a separate organized crime probe.

Over the next several months, detectives broke the code for the website and began electronic surveillance of the suspects.

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em poker tournament worth nearly $100,000 at the Bellagio earlier this year.

Associated Press writers Tom Hays and Ula Ilnytzky, Miami Herald staff writers Jennifer Mooney Piedra, Jay Weaver and Bridget Carey and Bloomberg News Service contributed to this report.

Dozens Charged With Running Gambling Ring (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

More than two dozen people, including a professional baseball scout and a high-stakes poker player, were charged yesterday in connection with a billion-dollar-a-year gambling ring that rivaled casino sports books.

The illegal betting scheme was orchestrated through a Web site called Playwithal.com, run by poker player James Giordano, 52, of Pinecrest, Fla., according to New York City Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly and Queens District Attorney Richard Brown.

A break in the case came last year when investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. He was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his fortress-like Florida compound.

Also arrested was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, N.Y., who was identified by prosecutors as a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants. He allegedly was a top earner in a network of 2,000 bookies who took more than $3.3 billion in cash wagers since 2004 from tens of thousands of customers nationwide.

The Nationals released the following statement: "The Nationals have no information nor any comment on any aspect of the legal proceedings announced today involving Frank Falzarano. Mr. Falzarano was a part-time scout who worked for an area scout, who is no longer with the club. Falzarano's contract with the Nationals expired on October 31 and was not renewed."

Though the gambling ring relied on a Web site, it was different from the online betting operations targeted by recent federal legislation. The scheme involved placing bets through bookies, who would assign bettors a secret code to track their wagers and monitor point spreads and results through the secured Web site. The bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey and auto racing.

The defendants allegedly laundered and stashed away "untold millions of dollars" using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland, Hong Kong and elsewhere, Brown said.

A total of 27 people in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada were charged with enterprise corruption, money laundering, promoting gambling and other counts.

-- From News Services and Staff Reports

27 Arrested In City's 'Largest' Betting Bust (NSDY)

By Rocco Parascandola, Staff Writer; Matthew Nestel And Staff Writer Luis Perez Contributed To This Story.

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095254

City investigators were deep into a probe of rogue pharmacists when a tip turned into a 28-month-long investigation of a multibillion-dollar illegal sports betting operation that ended with the arrest of 27 suspects, authorities said yesterday.

Thanks to a tip, authorities closed the gambling ring that merged old-school tactics with the Internet and stretched from New York to Nevada and overseas, and took in $2.5 million a day in bets.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," said Police Commissioner Ray Kelly. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting: $3.3 billion over the last 28 months alone."

City authorities said there were 40,000 gamblers; about 2,000 bookies; and shell corporations as far away as Switzerland and Hong Kong.

The suspects include the alleged mastermind, James Giordano, a high-stakes poker player; accused bookie Frank Falzarano, of Seaford, a scout for the Washington Nationals baseball team; and a suspected enforcer, Steven Tarantino, a Luchese family associate.Kelly said there is no indication Falzarano compromised the integrity of any Major League Baseball games. League officials have been notified of his arrest. "My husband is a good man. That's all I have to say," Falzarano's wife, Joan, 51, said.

The case was made, in part, when authorities downloaded information from the hard drive of Giordano's laptop computer, left at a Long Island hotel while he and his wife attended a June 17 wedding.

"We put a surveillance on him to make sure there were no errors," said police Deputy Insp. Brian O'Neill. "Then we brought his computer back, hooked it up as close as possible to the way he left it and walked out."

Giordano was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents in Pine Crest, Fla. Tarantino, 33, was arrested by police who found him hiding in the bathroom of his East 57th Street apartment.

The suspects in New York, New Jersey, Florida and Nevada have been charged with various counts of enterprise corruption, money laundering, gambling and conspiracy, according to Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, whose office is prosecuting the case because it started in that borough.

Seized were gambling records, about $6 million in cash, real estate and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl champion Jets. The operation differed from most online gambling sites because Giordano's Web site, playwithal.com - essentially a computerized bettor sheet - could only be accessed by those who had already established an in-person relationship with one of the suspected bookies, police said.

The parents of suspect, John Ducato, 47, of Deer Park, came to his arraignment yesterday. "He lives at home," said his mother, Jean Ducato. "He helps his parents every day."

Matthew Nestel and staff writer Luis Perez contributed to this story.

The book on Web bet ring:

28 month investigation

$3.3B wagered in that time

2,000 approximate number of people employed by the operation

$500M civil forfeiture action filed against 20 of the defendants

40,000 different people bet with this site

Queens district attorney's office

$3.3 BIL CASINO ROYALE (NYPOST)

By Todd Venezia,, Erika Martinez & Ikimulisa Livingston

The New York Post, November 16, 2006

November 16, 2006 -- A high-stakes poker player's bets were nothing compared to the gamble he took by running a staggering $3.3 billion Internet bookmaking operation - that was busted when cops cloned his computer hard drive, authorities said yesterday.

James Giordano, the reputed kingpin of the international online sports betting ring, was indicted in Queens Supreme Court along with 26 others - including a mob associate, a Major League Baseball scout and a Long Island Web designer - on a host of gambling and corruption charges.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation we have ever encountered," NYPD Commissioner Raymond Kelly said. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Giordano is a big-money poker pro who has competed in the World Series of Poker and who in July won a tournament at the Bellagio casino in Las Vegas, which bagged him nearly $100,000.

Authorities said his luck actually turned bad a month earlier, when he attended a family wedding in Long Island on June 17.

DOJ_NMG_0095255

While Giordano - who goes by the nickname "Dexter" - and his wife were at the ceremony, police executed a warrant in their hotel room. In the three hours they were gone, investigators seized his laptop computer and took it to another room, where they cloned the hard drive, then put the computer back in his room.

Giordano didn't know his computer had been tampered with, and kept using it. The gambler took extraordinary measures to hide his activities, such as getting a new cellphone each month, but didn't know his cloned laptop was allowing cops to watch all of his online gaming activities in real time - and to collect crucial evidence, authorities said.

That helped investigators unravel Giordano's ties to the some 40,000 customers who allegedly placed bets on football, baseball, golf and other sports with the help of a Web site called playwithal.com.

"It made for a much stronger case," NYPD Deputy Inspector Brian O'Neill said. "Everything was happening on that page with the log-in numbers being observed by the NYPD."

Giordano allegedly ran the operation from a walled $10 million Florida compound that was raided by the FBI yesterday. He was taken to the Miami-Dade County jail, where he was awaiting extradition to New York.

After the indictments were handed up in Queens, search warrants were executed around the country. Authorities said they pulled a total of $1.6 million in cash connected to the ring from closets, boxes and attics from numerous sites that were raided.

The searched property includes four Manhattan condominiums owned by two alleged members of the operation: Monte Weiner, 56, and his son Eric, 27.

Cops seized a treasure trove from the family, including jewelry, gold coins and artwork by Peter Max and Salvador Dali. Also among the swag were autographed photos of Yankee legends Mickey Mantle and Joe DiMaggio; a football signed by the 1969 New York Jets following their Super Bowl victory; and a bat used by Ted Williams.

Officials even seized tens of thousands of dollars in casino chips from the Bellagio.

Despite its high-tech online facade, Giordano's operation ran very much like an old-school, illegal sports-betting business, complete with some 2,000 bookies in almost every state who dealt in cash, police said.

And for those players who felt that they could get away with stiffing an online gaming operation, there was a team of goons on call to collect bets, cops said.

"At lower levels of the organization, they will sometimes use organized-crime associates as enforcers," O'Neill said.

"In one instance, a California man, who was late in paying a $129,000 debt . . . was told that two enforcers were on their way to the West Coast to 'slice your face,' " Kelly said yesterday. "He repaid the money without further encouragement."

The operation's many bookies would kick up money, Mafia-style, to "agents" who dealt in sums that rival the sports betting operation at major Vegas casinos, authorities said. The top agent was Donald Clark, who booked $652,000 in bets in one week alone, police said. Another alleged big earner was Frank Falzarano of Seaford, L.I., who officials said was a scout for baseball's Washington Nationals. He went by the code name "Z8300," and handled wagers at a rate of more than $8 million a year, cops said.

Clark was being held yesterday in lieu of $750,000 bail, while Falzarano posted $500,000 bail and was freed.

Despite Falzarano's participation in the betting ring, no baseball games were affected, cops said. The Nationals said in a statement that Falzarano was a part-time scout whose contract expired on Oct. 31.

Authorities said the ring even had "wire rooms" in Costa Rica and St. Maarten. It was busted in Queens because authorities there got wind of the operation while investigating a prescription drug resale scheme linked to the Bonanno crime family in 2005.

One of the people involved in the drug plot told officials about Giordano and his alleged gambling ring.

The ring used shell corporations and had bank accounts around the world, including Switzerland, the Caribbean and Hong Kong.

After members of the Russian mob allegedly launched a denial of service attack on the playwithal.com server, Giordano allegedly hired a Long Island Web design company called Primary Development and two Florida service providers to beef up security.

Authorities said that the leaders of the computer businesses knew who they were working for. So, in an unusual move, the three companies and Primary's CEO, Maurice Freeman, 37, of East Northport, L.I., were indicted as part of the scheme.

Once the site was buffed up, Giordano's operation started running smoothly, cops said. Over the 28-month period while they were under scrutiny by authorities, they took an estimated $3.3 billion in wagers.

The bettors allegedly used the playwithal.com Web site as a wager sheet to place their bets. They then paid their losses - or collected their winnings - in face-to-face meetings with their bookie, police said.

The bookies paid up to the agents or runners, according to authorities. The runners allegedly paid up to a group of "money collectors," who included Steven Tarantino, 33, described by cops as a known associate of the Luchese crime family. Monte Weiner and three others were also accused of being "collectors."

DOJ_NMG_0095256

At the top was Giordano, who allegedly left the day-to-day operations to his lieutenant - his son in-law Daniel Clarin, who was also indicted. Also charged were Gior- dano's wife, Priscilla Ann, and daughter, Melissa Clarin, Daniel's wife.

Because of the size of the ring, authorities are bringing a civil asset forfeiture case against the suspects worth half a billion dollars.

The busts marked the first time anyone has been charged under the new federal Unlawful Internet Gambling Enforcement Act, signed into law by President Bush last month.

Queens DA Richard Brown said that gambling online is a plague on the public.

"Internet gambling has been compared by some to the crack cocaine epidemic of the late '80s and early '90s," he said. "It's been said of Internet gambling that you simply click the mouse and loose your house."

todd.venezia@nypost.com

You Lose! 3B Ring Bashed (NYDN)

By Robert F. Mooreand Scott Shifrel, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, November 16, 2006

All bets are off on a $3.3 billion gambling operation that used the Internet, off-shore computer servers and good, old-fashioned mob muscle.

More than two dozen people were arrested and more than $7 million in cash was seized after police and FBI agents shut down the popular sports betting site Playwithal.com.

"This is the largest illegal gambling operation this department has ever encountered," said Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly at a press conference announcing the bust. "It rivals casinos for the amount of betting."

Among those nabbed was James Giordano, an ex-New Yorker and ranked professional poker player whom authorities identified as the gambling mastermind who ran the illicit operation from behind the walls of his fortresslike Florida compound. Also arrested was a Major League Baseball scout, a Web designer and a Luchese crime family associate.

The bust is the first since President Bush signed a law last month making it difficult for bettors to fund their Internet gambling accounts through U.S.-based credit cards or banks - although Playwithal.com relied on hard cash.

Traditional bookies would give bettors a secret code to use the Internet gambling site, authorities said. Bets were taken on all kinds of sports, including football, baseball, basketball, hockey, auto racing and golf - and at the end of each week, the bookies would pay off or collect from each client.

"They laundered and stashed away millions in winnings using shell corporations and bank accounts in Central America, the Caribbean, Switzerland and Hong Kong," said Queens District Attorney Richard Brown, who led the 28-month probe.

Prosecutors also seized hundreds of millions of dollars in cash and property as part of a civil forfeiture suit that seeks $500 million in damages.

Among the assets confiscated, Brown said, were four luxury Manhattan condos, a modern art collection and a football signed by the 1969 Super Bowl III champion New York Jets.

The artwork by Salvador Dali and Peter Max and the sports memorabilia were found in a secret room hidden behind a bookshelf in a Murray Hill condo.

Investigators said one of the biggest earners in the network of 2,000 bookies nationwide was Frank Falzarano, 52, of Seaford, L.I., a scout for the Washington Nationals and a former scout for the San Francisco Giants.

Authorities said the investigation of the sophisticated gaming operation began with a simple tip involving the attempted kidnapping of a gambler who owed a bookie $40,000.

From there, prosecutors eavesdropped on thousands of phone conversations and even broke into e-mail communications at the site's snazzy Web site. Bets also were taken by phone - but all wagers were ultimately recorded on computer servers in Costa Rica or St. Maarten.

"They were as savvy and adept in the use of computer technology as they were proficient in the art of secreting and laundering untold millions of dollars," Brown said.

Still, Giordano allegedly relied on old-fashioned mob muscle from Luchese family associate Steven Tarantino, 33, of Manhattan, and paid tribute to jailed ex-Bonanno family acting boss Anthony Urso, sources said.

A break in the case came last year when investigators secretly hacked into a laptop computer that Giordano had left in a Long Island hotel while attending a wedding, police said. On another occasion, investigators tapped Giordano's cell phone while he played in a January poker tournament at the Bellagio, made famous in the movie "Ocean's 11."

Giordano won a Texas Hold 'em tournament at the Bellagio worth nearly $100,000 earlier this year.

He was arrested early yesterday by FBI agents who had to scale the walls of his Pine Crest, Fla., compound.

DOJ_NMG_0095257

"Troublesome is the fact that so many people today are involved in Internet gambling," Brown said. "You simply click the mouse and lose your house."

Campaign Gifts To Governor Probed (MH)

By Frances Robles

The Miami Herald, November 16, 2006

Puerto Rico's secretary of state has until Friday to produce documents relating to dozens of people and firms in the latest chapter of a monthslong federal probe of donations to a political campaign of the current governor.

The office of Secretary of State Fernando Bonilla has confirmed that it received a subpoena for all documents -- including checks, e-mails, faxes and handwritten notes -- on more than 60 individuals or companies tied to a handful of Philadelphia fundraisers.

The fundraisers helped collect campaign contributions for Aníbal Acevedo Vilá while he was resident commissioner -- Puerto Rico's nonvoting representative in Congress. Acevedo Vilá was elected governor last year.

TESTIMONY SOUGHT

Bonilla was ordered to appear Friday morning before a federal grand jury in San Juan but can avoid testifying in person by delivering the documents to the FBI, according to a copy of the subpoena published by the newspaper El Nuevo Día.

A spokesman for the FBI's San Juan office, Harry Rodriguez, said federal law prohibits him from discussing grand jury probes.

"The FBI has jurisdiction to investigate public federal election-law violations involving excessive campaign contributions, corporate contributions and conduit contributions made through third parties," Rodriguez said. ``It is not unusual for these illegal-contribution cases to be connected to schemes to corruptly influence elected officials."

According to media reports in Puerto Rico and Philadelphia, federal investigators are trying to determine whether "straw contributions" -- donations illegally made under another person's name -- were made in order to bypass federal campaign donation limits. A June report by the Philadelphia Inquirer showed that several Pennsylvania dental company employees listed as contributors on Acevedo's campaign finance reports had said they never gave money to the campaign.

The investigation also seeks to determine whether government contracts were steered to companies that helped fill Acevedo's campaign coffers.

"We understand the investigation is about some people from Philadelphia who at some moments made donations to Aníbal Acevedo Vilá's resident commissioner campaign, and federal authorities are trying to determine whether they did so in accordance with the law," Acevedo's spokeswoman, Juanita Colombani, said in an e-mail to The Miami Herald. ``The governor has not been notified that he is a target or subject of the investigation."

Several of the governor's current and former aides, including Colombani, have been subpoenaed to testify. Colombani said she testified before the grand jury and was questioned by the FBI at her house.

"All the donations the governor received for his campaign for resident commissioner were done legally and were reported to the Federal Elections Commission," she wrote. ``The governor has said and reiterates that he has never received or solicited a donation in exchange for anything."

PHILADELPHIA MEN

The investigation so far has centered around Philadelphia dentist Candido Negron and his business associate, Robert M. Feldman, a Philadelphia Democratic Party fundraiser who once co-hosted a fundraiser for Acevedo Vilá.

Feldman and Negron are under scrutiny because they were seeking a contract from the island's government healthcare system for Doral Dental, a Wisconsin-based company that has paid them hundreds of thousands of dollars in commissions, the Inquirer reported.

Among the documents the grand jury requested are those relating to Feldman and 10 of his companies. Feldman's attorney, Henry E. Hockeimer, said Feldman and Negron were business partners who did consulting work for Doral Dental, also mentioned in the subpoena.

"Mr. Feldman never did business in Puerto Rico," Hockeimer said. He declined to comment further.

Attempts to reach Negron were unsuccessful.

Doral Dental spokesman Michael Pflugheoft said the company, which specializes in government contracts, has not done any business in Puerto Rico.

"We became aware of this through the media," he said. ``It isn't anything we're involved in."

The secretary of state was also ordered to produce records relating to prominent Philadelphia developer Kenneth N. Goldenberg. His spokesman Greg Reaves said the company received "a request for information" and cooperated.

`FISHING EXPEDITION'

DOJ_NMG_0095258

The subpoena also listed Parkway Corp., a Philadelphia real-estate development company. Calling it a "fishing expedition," company spokesman Howard Trachtman said Parkway was issued a subpoena several months ago, despite not having done business on the island in more than a decade.

"I can tell you we did receive a subpoena, and we responded," Trachtman said. ``I don't know what they're looking for."

Vernon Mayor, Former City Administrator Charged With Corruption (LAT)

By Hector Becerra

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

Capping years of investigations into Vernon, Los Angeles prosecutors today filed public corruption charges that accused the small industrial city's longtime mayor of voter fraud and the former city administrator of using public funds for personal use.

The indictment came after decades of complaints by critics that the city south of downtown Los Angeles operates as a fiefdom by leaders, including Mayor Leonis Malburg, who has been in office for more than 50 years. He is the grandson of Vernon's founder.

Most of Vernon's homes are owned by Malburg, other council members and the city. Most of the 91 residents are city employees.

Prosecutors charged that Malburg has been fraudulently voting in Vernon elections, even though he has long lived in a posh estate in Hancock Park, 20 miles from the gritty city that is home to various manufacturing businesses and factories.

The district attorney's office charged that longtime city administrator Bruce Malkenhorst Sr. used $60,000 in city money for personal uses. Makenhorst was the highest paid city official in the state before stepping down two years ago, earning more than $600,000 a year for running a city of fewer than 100 people.

The charges mark the biggest challenge in decades to the reign of Malburg and his allies, who aggressively fought efforts to unseat them.

The indictment comes after a tumultuous election in which the city hired gun-toting private investigators to follow challengers seeking to unseat Malburg and the other council incumbents.

Prosecutors have been building their cases against the city officials for nearly a decade, but Vernon waged a long court battle in an unsuccessful effort to avoid turning over city records.

hector.becerra@latimes.com

In Murder Case, New Evidence But Same Cell (NYT)

By Jim Dwyer

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

More than two years ago, investigators from the Queens district attorney's office sat in Jaime Acevedo's living room and listened to him describe a night in 1992 — an instant, really — that has yet to end.

Mr. Acevedo, seen by the authorities as an ordinary, law-abiding, working man with no reason to lie, said that he knew the inside details on a little-noticed murder in Woodside, one that seemed to have been solved and settled long ago.

Investigators had never spoken with Mr. Acevedo or realized that he knew anything about the case. But in fact, Mr. Acevedo told them, he had unwittingly given the killer a ride to and from the murder scene. The man he named had never been connected or charged with the crime.

There was more.

Mr. Acevedo said the one person accused and convicted of the murder had nothing to do with it. That man, Joshua Rivera, sentenced to 37 years, had not even been present, according to Mr. Acevedo.

The story did not end there. The district attorney's investigators found another man who told essentially the same story as Mr. Acevedo: he, too, said that he had been in the car with the killer and that Mr. Rivera was not involved.

Two years later, Mr. Rivera, 36, is still serving time for the murder, and the man named as the real killer by the two new witnesses has not been charged.

In an era when DNA tests seem to have made unraveling convictions as easy as untying a shoe, Mr. Rivera's case is a reminder that the criminal justice system, by law and custom, generally resists the reopening of jury verdicts, at times even in the face of new evidence that seems strong.

It is also a vivid example of the discretion that prosecutors can exercise in not only bringing cases but also reviewing their outcomes.

After his appeals were exhausted, Mr. Rivera wrote to prosecutors to insist on his innocence. Starting in 2003, prosecutors in an unofficial unit that examined claims of "actual innocence" located the new witnesses, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0095259

After those prosecutors raised questions about whether the right man was in prison, the case was turned over to more senior prosecutors. They resisted Mr. Rivera's first request to overturn the verdict, saying that he and his lawyer could have found witnesses like Mr. Acevedo before his trial in 1995.

Now, however, as Mr. Rivera's advocates continue to press his cause, the district attorney's office has agreed to have the new evidence presented to a judge, who will consider whether it casts doubt on the verdict, a senior prosecutor in the Queens office said.

In particular, the judge will be asked to weigh whether the new evidence is strong enough to contradict the original testimony of two eyewitnesses who said that they saw Mr. Rivera do the killing. That senior prosecutor said he could not speak for attribution because the case is pending in court.

At its beginnings, the case seemed numbingly familiar, and simple.

On the morning of Sept. 19, 1992, a man named Leonard Aquino stood with another man in front of a building at 47-25 48th Street in Woodside. He was approached by a couple of men who spoke briefly, then opened fire. Mr. Aquino was killed; another man, Paul Peralta, was shot, but survived.

Mr. Rivera, whose nickname was Shorty 140, was known to many people in the building and had been in trouble before, including a conviction for gun possession.

His picture was picked out of an array of photos by Mr. Peralta and another witness, and in February 1993, five months after the shooting, Mr. Rivera was charged with killing Mr. Aquino and shooting Mr. Peralta. He was convicted in December 1995.

His efforts to overturn the case were supported by a friend who grew up with Mr. Rivera in Astoria, Sherman Jackson, who had competed with him in break dancing competitions. After a stint in the Marine Corps, Mr. Jackson became a prosecutor in the Queens district attorney's office.

Troubled by his old friend's assertion that he had been wrongly convicted, Mr. Jackson raised the question of Mr. Rivera's innocence in 2003 with his boss, Gregory Lasak, who was a homicide prosecutor and had also been involved in the exoneration of 20 innocent people.

Based on a prison letter from Mr. Rivera, Mr. Lasak had already begun an investigation into Mr. Rivera's case, according to Mr. Jackson. As part of that review, investigators tracked down Mr. Acevedo and the second man, Kenny Chung, who said he was in the car with the killer that night in 1992.

Meanwhile, Mr. Jackson, who had gone into private practice, spoke with Mr. Peralta and learned that he was wavering on his identification of Mr. Rivera as the gunman. He also spoke with a neighbor who had given first aid to Mr. Aquino and Mr. Peralta. The neighbor said that Mr. Peralta had told her that it had all happened too quickly for him to recognize his attackers.

Mr. Lasak began serving as a State Supreme Court justice in 2004. Mr. Rivera is represented by Chris Renfroe, a private defense lawyer in Queens.

Mr. Renfroe said that he believed that when District Attorney Richard A. Brown focused on the details of the case, he would quickly move to resolve it in Mr. Rivera's favor.

Mr. Brown declined to comment on the case. But in the past, his staff had said that the case was not black and white. For one thing, Mr. Chung had consented to be interviewed only in the presence of a known gang member and had refused to identify the fourth person in the car.

Mr. Jackson, the former prosecutor and friend of Mr. Rivera's, said: "The time for delaying has ended. The prosecution could shine from this because justice goes both ways, putting people in jail and getting them out."

This week, Mr. Acevedo — who had no role in the trials and never spoke with the authorities until late 2004 — sat in a restaurant in Astoria and recalled the night of the murder.

He was 22 years old and had been working steadily in supermarkets and delivering advertising circulars since he was 14, which allowed him to buy the car that he drove into Manhattan that evening with three other men. One was Mr. Chung, who has also spoken with prosecutors about the events; the other two were acquaintances whom he knew only as Aid and Everlast.

After going to clubs, they returned to Queens near dawn. Mr. Acevedo said that his passengers directed him to pull over at 48th Street in Woodside.

The men he knew as Aid and Everlast got out of the car, and Mr. Acevedo said he stepped out a moment later. He estimated he was about five or seven car lengths away when they approached the door of the building. He heard shots, he said.

"I had no idea what was going to happen," Mr. Acevedo said. "I saw flashes off the wall of the building." The two men came racing toward him, and one of them dropped a gun in the curb and picked it up. They jumped in the car and fled the scene, he said.

Mr. Acevedo said he had no choice but to drive them away. "They had a gun and just shot someone," he said.

In the car, he said, they talked about how they had made the approach.

DOJ_NMG_0095260

“They said they asked those guys for weed, that was the story, then Aim shot,” Mr. Acevedo said. He dropped them at their homes in Elmhurst.

“Then I just drove around for two hours,” he said. “My head was so full. I didn’t belong with them. I was just being with people I didn’t belong with. I never was a thug.”

He currently holds a full-time, job, though he asked that it not be described. He has not had a girlfriend since the killing.

“I never got married, I never had kids, and these were my dreams,” he said. “At holidays, Thanksgiving with my sisters, sitting there and everyone is having a good time, then you stop. This is in the back of your head.

“When you wake up in the morning, instantly, this goes through my head,” Mr. Acevedo said. “To this day. I don’t even have to fully wake up. Instantly. Every day.”

Simpson Revisits Infamous Case (LAT)

By Robin Abcarian And Martin Miller

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

HOLLYWOOD — The two abiding emotions that characterized the O.J. Simpson double murder case -- revulsion and fascination -- surfaced again this week when, just in time for November television sweeps, Simpson revealed that he will take part in a two-part Fox television special and release a book that will address how he might have killed his ex-wife, Nicole Brown, and her friend Ron Goldman.

"If I Did It," is to be released Nov. 30 by Regan, an imprint of HarperCollins, which is owned by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. Another division of News Corp, the Fox network, will air a two-part interview with Simpson, conducted by his publisher, Judith Regan, on Monday, Nov. 27 and Wednesday, Nov. 29. In the book and the interviews, according to a statement from HarperCollins, Simpson will give a "bone-chilling account of the night of the murders," which took place on June 12, 1994.

"I'm going to tell you a story you've never heard before, because no one knows this story the way I know it," Simpson writes in the publisher's release. "I want you to forget everything you think you know about that night, because I know the facts better than anyone."

As condemnation flowed from victims' families, publishers, broadcasters, bloggers and others involved in the sensational criminal case, Regan defended her decision to publish the book. . "It's not fiction," she said Wednesday evening at a dinner for the National Book Awards in New York. As to whether Simpson would agree with that, she replied, "I don't know." She sidestepped questions about whether the former football star had approached her, or the other way around, and how he might be paid. But she acknowledged the torrent of criticism already directed at the joint television-book project.

"I think the media has spun it in the wrong direction," said Regan. "When they see the special and when they read the book and hear about why I did it, why I think this is an important moment, I think they'll have a different viewpoint."

Simpson, who was acquitted of murder, was found responsible for the killings in a subsequent civil trial. The televised trial deeply divided the U.S., often along racial lines, changed the way crime scenes are handled and spawned a new category of TV personality -- the courtroom legal analyst.

One such pundit, Dan Abrams, who provided legal analysis on the Simpson case for Court TV and "The Today Show," noted that Simpson's apparent willingness to discuss how he would have committed the murders is a tack he has used before. "This is vintage O.J. Simpson," said Abrams, who is now general manager of MSNBC. "My guess is that there's more talk of golf and his kids than there is about how the killer may have committed this crime," he said. "I think it will probably do pretty well, because I do think there's still a fascination with him. But I don't think it's going to be a lockbuster night the way it would have been 10 years ago. I think there's a little O.J. fatigue. "

Others familiar with the tragic public soap opera also said that little, if any, new information is likely to come to light in a case that has been the source of exhaustive coverage and speculation and generated scores of books, television programs and even re-enactments.

In the past, even Simpson has speculated about his own guilt. "Let's say I committed this crime," he told Esquire magazine in 1998. "Even if I did do this, it would have to have been because I loved her very much, right?"

The family of Nicole Brown Simpson expressed outrage. "It's unfortunate that Simpson has decided to awaken a nightmare that we have painfully endured and worked so hard to move beyond," said Denise Brown, Nicole's sister, in a statement. "We hope Ms. Regan takes full accountability for promoting the wrongdoing of criminals and leveraging this forum and the actions of Simpson to commercialize abuse."

Their view was echoed by Ron Goldman's father, Fred, who has continued to pursue collection of the $33.5 million judgment that was levied in 1997 against Simpson by a civil jury that found him responsible for the murders. To date, the family has only been paid a couple of thousand dollars in proceeds from items seized from the former football player and sold at auction. According to Daniel Petrocelli, who represented the Goldmans in the civil trial, the debt has grown close to $40 million now, with interest.

DOJ_NMG_0095261

Petrocelli doubts that the families will receive any of the money Simpson will earn from the project.

"It is an all-time low for television," said Goldman. "To imagine that a major network would put a murderer on TV to have him tell how he would murder the mother of his children and my son is beyond comprehension."

Goldman said he thinks the outrage should extend to the entire Fox network. "Send a message to Fox that if Fox believes their viewers want this kind of trash on television, they must not think very highly of their viewers," Goldman said.

Fox television executives declined to comment on the broadcast.

Two weeks ago, in his most recent attempt to collect the debt, Fred Goldman was rebuffed in a Santa Monica courtroom when he sought control over the rights to Simpson's name, image and likeness.

Goldman's current attorney Jonathan Polak said he plans to appeal the ruling. He expressed indignation that Simpson could profit from the very murder that he has long denied, and blasted those who would profit from Simpson's story.

From a legal perspective, said experts, even if Simpson confessed to the double murder, he could not be tried again. Under the legal concept of double jeopardy, a person may not be charged with a crime for which he has already been acquitted.

The controversy and attendant publicity may guarantee what Fox hoped for all along -- big ratings at a critical period when advertising rates are being determined. Media observers likened the move to ABC's 2003 interview with Michael Jackson about allegations of child molestation, which drew some 27 million viewers.

"This is an old-fashioned sweeps stunt pure and simple," said Brad Adgate, research director for the ad-buying firm Horizon Media.

"There's going to be a high curiosity factor to watch it."

Times staff writers Greg Krikorian, Matea Gold, Paul Lieberman and Maura Dolan contributed to this report.

CIVIL LAW:

Unions Object To New Bonus Plan For Dana Executives (AP)

By Marc Hopkins, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) — Unions representing Dana Corp. employees say its proposal to pay millions to executives while it plans to cut health care and retiree benefits should be struck down.

"It is precisely this double standard — insulating executives from the consequences of bankruptcy while workers must cope with harsh, draconian consequences — that Congress sought to eliminate" with the a recent bankruptcy reform act, the unions said in court papers.

The joint objection from the United Autoworkers and United Steelworkers unions comes in the midst of Dana's renewed efforts to get bankruptcy court approval for a long-term incentive plan.

Dana, of Toledo, Ohio, makes axles, frames and other large components for cars and commercial trucks and is highly dependent on customers General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co.

The company is one of at least a half-dozen large U.S. auto-parts companies that have fallen into bankruptcy due to production cutbacks by the country's biggest auto makers.

Under the proposal, Dana Chief Executive Michael J. Burns will receive up to $4.5 million during 2007 and up to $2.25 million in 2008. The payments are tied to the achievement of various earnings benchmarks. The payments aren't guaranteed.

The company said five other top managers would share a bonus pool of up to $3.18 million in 2007 and would be entitled to a pool of at least $1.59 million the year after.

Dana's latest proposal is a step down from a previous plan that entitled Burns to $9.1 million over the next few years, including a $6 million bonus once the auto-parts supplier emerged from bankruptcy protection.

The company's official committee of unsecured creditors filed papers Tuesday supporting the proposal saying it links the performance of top managers to the interests of creditors.

Creditors said the plan motivates executives to minimize the amount of claims against the company. If allowed unsecured claims exceed $2.85 billion, the incentive bonuses to management will decrease.

Dana stressed that incentive payments aren't assured, and that the earnings targets will require management to "stretch" to achieve better operating results.

But the unions don't buy that argument. They said Dana failed to offer any evidence supporting the challenges faced by executives. They also didn't view performance targets as hard to achieve.

DOJ_NMG_0095262

The timing of Dana's proposal is also inappropriate the unions said. It coincides with the company's recent announcement to close eight plants in North America in addition to eight other locations targeted for closure under the company's restructuring effort.

The latest proposal is Dana's second attempt to get Judge Burton Lifland to sign off on the bonus plan. He denied the first plan on Sept. 5, saying it clashed with provisions of the 2005 bankruptcy law. Those provisions allow retention bonuses only if the employee has a competing offer for equal or higher pay.

At the time, Dana's bonus request was widely viewed as a litmus test for Section 503(c) of the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, enacted a year ago.

The Justice Department has consistently opposed Dana's efforts, and in court papers Tuesday, U.S. Trustee Diana G. Adams said the company again failed to meet the requirements for bonus payments under the reform act.

Lifland will consider Dana's executive compensation package during a Nov. 21 hearing at the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Manhattan.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Suspect In LAPD Excessive Force Probe Enters Plea And Is Released (LAT)

By Peter Y. Hong And Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The man who was repeatedly punched by a Los Angeles police officer on a video circulated on the Internet struck a plea bargain Wednesday and was released from jail.

William Cardenas, 23, pleaded no contest to a misdemeanor charge of resisting, delaying or obstructing an officer. He had been in custody since his arrest Aug. 11, after he ran from police in Hollywood, who said he had been drinking a beer in public.

Video of the arrest posted on YouTube.com showed Cardenas lying on his back and taking punches to the face from one officer as another officer sat on his stomach. In exchange for his plea to the misdemeanor, prosecutors dropped two felony charges of resisting officers.

Cardenas' lawyer, B. Kwaku Duren, said he had offered the plea bargain to prosecutors two months ago but had not heard back from them. He attributed the plea agreement to the publicity stemming from the video.

Asked whether the video had led to the deal, Deputy Dist. Atty Michael Yglecias said: "I would be lying if I said it didn't. Obviously it was part of the evidence we considered."

LAPD Chief William J. Bratton told Patt Morrison in an interview on KPCC-FM (89.3) that he did not think the release of the video, and the widespread exposure that followed, had an effect on Cardenas' getting a reduction in charges.

"Not at all," he said. "If anything, the video would show he resisted arrest."

Bratton said plea bargains were "something done in the majority of cases in Los Angeles," he said. "I think it's probably an effort on the part of Mr. Cardenas to get out of jail."

Bratton noted that a judge had previously held Cardenas over for trial. "Police work is never pretty, particularly when you have people resisting arrest," the chief said.

He added that the district attorney's office was continuing its criminal investigation of the matter and that the LAPD was continuing the administrative investigation to see if the department had complied with its own policy.

peter.hong@latimes.com

patrick.mcgreevy@latimes.com

Video Arrest Subject Pleads No Contest (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, November 15, 2006, 7:50 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, November 16, 2006

William Cardenas, 23, was sentenced to three months already served in jail and placed on three years of probation.

The video footage posted on the Web site YouTube.com showed the arrest of Cardenas, an alleged gang member. Two Los Angeles officers can be seen holding him down on a Hollywood curb as one punches him several times in the face.

The clip caused a sensation, with 155,000 views, and eventually prompted the FBI and the Los Angeles Police Department to investigate.

Police said Cardenas had been wanted on charges of receiving stolen property when they confronted him Aug. 11.

In an arrest report obtained by The Associated Press, the officers said they tried to arrest Cardenas after spotting him on a sidewalk, but he fled.

DOJ_NMG_0095263

The officers caught up to him, tripped him and swarmed over him to apply handcuffs, the report said. In their report, they admitted hitting him repeatedly in the face, saying he was resisting and that they feared he might grab one of their guns.

Cardenas' attorney, B. Kwaku Duren, accused the officers of using excessive force.

LAPD Officers Cleared In Arrest Probe (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - LOS ANGELES-A district attorney's investigation has cleared police officers of wrongdoing in a videotaped incident in which a transient in handcuffs was apparently pepper-sprayed in a police car, police Chief William Bratton said Tuesday.

The February 2005 incident came to light this week when the videotape, shot by a citizen, was released by the man's attorney.

The tape of Benjamin Barker's arrest surfaced on the heels of an 18-second video showing a Los Angeles officer repeatedly punching a suspect in the face while another officer tried to handcuff the man during a struggle on a Hollywood street on Aug. 11.

At a news conference, Bratton cited a Nov. 15, 2005, decision by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office in which prosecutors declined to file any charges against officers in the arrest of Barker, who had been in a scuffle with a Venice merchant.

"Examination of the videotape clearly shows (the officers) did not use excessive force on Benjamin Barker, nor did they assault him under color of authority," Bratton said, quoting the decision. "The officers showed remarkable restraint and demonstrated professional courtesy to Barker despite his belligerent, threatening and combative behavior."

The Los Angeles Times reported Tuesday that the tape shows an officer take pepper spray out of a holster, then raise it toward Barker's face, but the actual spraying is obscured by shadows.

The report found that Barker kicked at one officer, lunged toward another, "battered" another officer by spitting on him, and then vandalized the police car, Bratton said.

"The officers used that degree of force necessary to restrain Barker and maintain custody of him," the chief said, quoting from the decision.

Barker has since pleaded guilty to misdemeanor battery on the shopkeeper.

Barker's attorney, John Raphling, told the Los Angeles Times that Barker was whining and crying on the tape, "but he is not being aggressive or threatening" to the officers. Messages seeking comment were left Tuesday by The Associated Press, but were not immediately returned.

The district attorney's office also concluded that reports by two officers that said the pepper spray was administered outside the car were mistaken recollections and not intentional misstatements of fact.

The chief noted that a court commissioner who held a hearing in the separate Hollywood arrest also found the officers in that case did nothing wrong because that suspect was resisting.

But the chief said administrative reviews of whether officers in both incidents violated departmental policies or procedures had yet to conclude. He said his decision in the Barker arrest would be made soon.

More Racist Graffiti Reported In Charles (WP)

By Dan Morse, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Church Defaced Again in Latest Case

Local and federal investigators continued this week to probe a string of racist graffiti incidents in Charles County, the latest one occurring at an African American church that had received a bomb threat a week before.

Members of Zion Baptist Church in Welcome spotted the latest graffiti when they arrived for Sunday morning service. Someone had used bright orange paint to spray "KKK," "White Power" and "Bang Boom" on a roadway leading to the church's parking lot. The graffiti had been painted that morning or the day before, according to the county's sheriff's office.

On Nov. 5 someone called the church with a bomb threat. Two Charles deputies and their dogs went to the church but found nothing during a sweep of the building and grounds. Investigators said they believe the threat was made from a pay phone at Best One Food Stores in Seat Pleasant, which is in Prince George's County near the D.C. line.

Sheriff's office investigators said they believe the "Bang Boom" graffiti was a reference to the bomb threat, but they don't know if it was done by the same person or by someone who heard or read about the threat.

The weekend's graffiti was not the first such incident at the church. On Sept. 10, sheriff's deputies responded to an alarm there. After arriving, they found "KKK" painted on a side door and on the back of a church sign. Additionally, the front glass door was painted with crudely drawn symbols: a large incomplete circle with geometric shapes on either side, authorities and church members said.

DOJ_NMG_0095264

In all, there have been 11 such cases in Charles since August. Local officials arrested two 15-year-olds in connection with one incident after lifting fingerprints from a can of white spray paint, but authorities have not tied those juveniles to any of the other incidents, which have been classified as hate crimes by the sheriff's office.

In September, local officials contacted the FBI, and the agencies have conducted a joint investigation of the incidents since, said Kristen Timko, a sheriff's office spokeswoman. "Our detectives meet regularly with them," she said.

The incidents have left many Charles residents wondering whether the crimes are the work of a few racially motivated perpetrators or part of broader race relations problems. Either way, Sheriff Frederick E. Davis said it's a serious matter.

"When they're spraying 'white pride' and 'KKK,' that's not a perception problem. That's a real problem, and it's something that needs to be stopped," he said in September.

Members of Zion Baptist are facing the same questions.

"We don't know if it's a planned, orchestrated move, or if it's a random act. . . . We're pretty much baffled by it," said Charles "Pete" Williams, chairman of the deacons at the church. Church members are considering new security measures and are appealing to higher powers.

"We're coming together to do what Christians do: Pray. And pray for the people who are doing this," he said.

As of Tuesday afternoon, the graffiti was still on the roadway.

The church's Sunday service draws 200 to 250 people. Many are longtime county residents, and those who live in the Welcome area have not reported problems with neighbors, Williams said.

He said he hasn't noticed a drop in service attendance: "So far we're pretty much standing strong."

Counting The Vote, Badly (NYT)

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

Last week's elections provided a lot of disturbing news about the reliability of electronic voting — starting, naturally, with Florida. In a Congressional race there between Vern Buchanan, a Republican, and Christine Jennings, a Democrat, the machines in Sarasota County reported that more than 18,000 people, or one in eight, did not choose either candidate. That "undervote" of nearly 13 percent is hard to believe, given that only about 2.5 percent of absentee voters did not vote in that race. If there was a glitch, it may have made all the difference. Ms. Jennings trails Mr. Buchanan by about 400 votes.

The serious questions about the Buchanan- Jennings race only add to the high level of mistrust that many people already feel about electronic voting. More than half of the states, including California, New York, Ohio and Illinois, now require that electronic voting machines produce voter-verified paper records, which help ensure that votes are properly recorded. But Congress has resisted all appeals to pass a law that would ensure that electronic voting is honest and accurate across the nation.

Fortunately, that may be about to change. With the Democrats now in control of both houses, there is an excellent chance of passing tough electronic voting legislation. Representative Rush Holt, Democrat of New Jersey, had more than 200 co-sponsors for a strong electronic voting bill before this month's election, and support is likely to grow in the new Congress. In the Senate, Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who will be chairwoman of the Rules and Administration Committee, which oversees elections, plans to develop a similar bill.

The problems with elections go well beyond electronic voting. Partisan secretaries of state continue to skew the rules to favor their parties and political allies. States are adopting harsh standards for voter registration drives to make it harder for people to register, as well as draconian voter identification laws to make casting a ballot harder for poor people, racial minorities, the elderly and students. Some states have adopted an indefensible rule that provisional ballots cast at the wrong table of the correct polling place must be thrown out.

Congress has failed to address these and other important flaws with the mechanics of the election system. But this, too, may be about to change. Senator Feinstein is saying that providing fair access to the ballot will be among her committee's top priorities in the coming year. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, plans to revise and reintroduce her "Count Every Vote Act," which takes an admirably broad approach to overhauling the voting system.

Election reform has tended to be a partisan issue, with Democrats arguing for reform and Republicans resisting it. It shouldn't be. Congressional Democrats should make fixing this country's broken system of elections a top priority, and Republicans should join them.

DOJ_NMG_0095265

ANTITRUST:

U.S. Opens Criminal Probe Of Banks' Municipal Deals (Correct) (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

(Corrects fourth paragraph to show Investment Management was searched by Justice Department officials, not the FBI.)

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Department of Justice is conducting a criminal investigation into whether banks and brokers conspired to rig the bidding for contracts that U.S. local governments use to invest bond proceeds.

Municipalities purchase guaranteed investment contracts, known as GICs, with bond money until they need the funds to pay for projects. The contracts are what banks and brokers used to invest at least $7 billion of bond proceeds raised by local governments across the U.S. in the past decade that were never spent, according to an Oct. 4 Bloomberg News report.

``It's about time," said Mark Schwartz, a Bryn Mawr, Pennsylvania-based lawyer and former head of municipal bonds for Prudential Financial Corp.'s mid-Atlantic region, about the investigation. ``This is an incestuous little business."

Dexia SA's Financial Security Assurance Holdings Ltd. unit today said it was subpoenaed by the U.S. Justice Department as part of the probe by antitrust regulators. Investment Management Advisory Group Inc., a GIC broker and municipal derivatives adviser based in Pottstown, Pennsylvania, was searched by Justice Department officials, Gene Grabowski, a spokesman for the firm, said.

The actions by the Justice Department show that an investigation into how banks compete for the right to reinvest the money raised in the $2 trillion tax-exempt bond market has expanded beyond the U.S. Internal Revenue Service. The IRS has been looking into whether brokers awarded the work to favored banks, potentially boosting the cost of the investment agreements and depriving the federal government of tax revenue.

`Anticompetitive Practices'

Kathleen Blomquist, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Department of Justice, confirmed an ``investigation of anticompetitive practices in the municipal bond industry." She declined to provide further detail of the subpoena of Financial Security or whether other subpoenas were issued.

Betsy Castenir, a spokeswoman for Financial Security, declined to comment further on the investigation. The company, part of Belgium's third-biggest financial services firm, also insures municipal bonds against default. Financial Security said it isn't aware of any specific allegations of misconduct.

The IRS has been investigating bidding for GICs and has raised concerns that improper bidding may have diverted to banks money that should have been paid in taxes. U.S. tax law prevents local governments from profiting by selling municipal bonds and reinvesting the money at higher rates. Such earnings, known as arbitrage, must be paid to the U.S. government.

The IRS last year told officials from Atlanta that the city may have overpaid for a $453 million guaranteed investment contract from Bank of America Corp. in an auction run by CDR Financial Products Inc.

Payments for Nothing

Bloomberg News reported last month that the Bank of America employee who bid for the work was fired after disclosing that he paid $57,393 to CDR for transactions in which it played no role. The employee said the payments were made to bolster his relationship with CDR.

Bank of America spokeswoman Shirley Norton didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment on whether it has been contacted by the Justice Department. Allan Ripp, a spokesman for CDR, also didn't immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

KKR, Carlyle, 11 Others Accused Of Rigging Buyouts (Update2) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Carlyle Group, the manager of the biggest U.S. buyout fund, are among 13 private equity firms accused in a class-action lawsuit of rigging the market to take companies private.

The class action was filed in Manhattan federal court by investors who claim they didn't receive full value for their shares because of a conspiracy that violated antitrust laws.

``Investors in the target company are deprived of the full economic value of their holdings and `squeezed out' at artificially low valuations," the suit says.

The U.S. Justice Department launched an informal antitrust investigation into allegations that private-equity firms collaborated on leveraged buyouts, according to a person familiar with the matter.

DOJ_NMG_0095266

Carlyle spokesman Christopher Ullman declined to comment on the lawsuit.

The suit alleges violations of federal antitrust laws, which entitle successful plaintiffs to recover triple damages. It seeks to represent tens of thousands of shareholders in dozens of deals in which public companies were taken private.

``It's a relatively large class," said Fred Isquith, a lawyer at Wolf Haldenstein Adler Freeman & Herz in Manhattan, which brought the case.

Univision, HCA, Harrah's

The named plaintiffs -- L.A. Murphy, Marvin Sternhell, and Henoch Kaiman -- were investors in dozens of companies, including Univision Communications Inc., HCA Inc., and Harrah's Entertainment Inc.

Other firms named as defendants in the complaint are Clayton, Dubilier, & Rice; Silver Lake Partners; Blackstone Group; Bain Capital LLC; Thomas H. Lee Partners; Texas Pacific Group; Madison Dearborn Partners; Apollo Management LP; Providence Equity Partners; Merrill Lynch & Co. Inc.; and Warburg Pincus LLC.

US Airways Bids To Acquire Delta And No. 1 Rank (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. yesterday launched an $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., a move that would create the nation's largest carrier and possibly trigger other airline mergers in an industry recovering from a major downturn.

US Airways chief executive Doug Parker said combining carriers would boost profit and substantially cut costs by eliminating overlapping work and flights. Parker, who is credited with helping to successfully merge US Airways and America West in 2005, said he wanted to take advantage of Delta's status in Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. If he waited until after the carrier exited bankruptcy, it would be harder to jettison unneeded Delta aircraft, he said.

"It's a unique opportunity to create a significant amount of value," Parker said in an interview.

Topping the list of potential obstacles is Delta's management, which isn't excited about any merger. Chief executive Gerald Grinstein sent a memo to employees later in the day, saying he didn't want Delta to emerge from bankruptcy protection as a "merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline."

The new airline would retain the Delta name and offer more seats than any other airline in the nation, surpassing the current leader, American Airlines, US Airways executives said. Its network would extend from New York to Phoenix and abroad. Delta would become the top airline, serving 155 domestic airports and 350 destinations worldwide, the executives said.

It is not known which frequent-flier program the new company would retain -- US Airways is a member of the Star Alliance network, and Delta is a partner in SkyTeam, both extensive partnerships involving foreign carriers.

Although US Airways executives said they would not stop flying to any cities served by either carrier, they said the merger would allow them to cut about 10 percent of the two airlines' flights. The new airline would be able to cut costs by flying fewer aircraft with more passengers, the executives said.

"We would also benefit from reducing service to some underperforming markets and discontinuing some unprofitable" routes, Parker said in a conference call with analysts.

With the reduction in flights, the number of cheap fares offered by the combined airline on many routes would decline and the average ticket price would increase, experts said.

"Fares will go up a little bit because there will be less overall competition," said Michael MacNair, author of "Smooth Landings," a book on managing business travel. He added that business travelers are nervous about the deal because they "don't want to shoulder the burden of higher ticket prices because competition goes away."

US Airways stock soared yesterday in reaction to the bid, closing up 16.8 percent, to $59.46 a share on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta shares closed at $1.52, up 3.4 percent, and its distressed bonds jumped in value and were among the most actively traded corporate debt issues yesterday.

Most analysts seemed enthusiastic about the proposal, saying they welcomed the idea of consolidation in the industry. Airline executives, including the chief executive of United Airlines, have said the industry needs to shrink to remain competitive. Among other possible merger targets, analysts mentioned United, American, Continental and Northwest airlines.

Analysts cautioned, however, that a US Airways-Delta deal faces many hurdles. US Airways hasn't yet fully digested its last merger; it hasn't even finished painting all of its America West jets in the new company colors.

Delta's chief executive brushed off attempts by Parker to discuss a merger this fall, according to letters exchanged between the two men.

In a statement yesterday, Grinstein said his airline's "plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve that objective."

DOJ_NMG_0095267

Grinstein said in yesterday's memo to employees: "I've said before and continue to believe that the history of mergers in the airline industry is almost always one of failure."

Faced with that resistance, Parker sidestepped Delta's management yesterday and made a direct pitch to its creditors. The offer totals $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock. If creditors like the deal, they could approach Delta management and encourage them to consider it.

Regulators also may question the bid. The new airline would probably have to shed one of its lucrative shuttle routes between Washington, New York City and Boston, US Airways executives acknowledged.

The Justice Department, which would scrutinize any potential merger, might also force the airline to eliminate some of its East Coast hub airports. The airline would have major operations at pairs of neighboring hubs, such as those in Charlotte and Atlanta, and New York and Philadelphia.

Antitrust lawyers said the Justice Department would focus on whether the proposed merger might diminish competition and harm consumers. Six years ago, the department seemed ready to challenge a proposed merger between US Airways and United Airlines before it fell apart.

But the emergence of low-cost carriers and Delta's struggles in bankruptcy may change the view of the department's lawyers, said Bill Bayer, an antitrust lawyer and a former head of the Federal Trade Commission's antitrust division.

"The market has obviously changed in six years," Bayer said, but questions remain about whether "it has changed to the point where the cost savings from combining these two carriers will outweigh the risks to consumers and competition."

If the airlines reach a deal, it will also probably be studied by the new Democratic Congress next year.

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), the ranking Democrat, and likely future chairman, on the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, said he would probably hold hearings on such a merger.

"A combination of carriers of this magnitude should be scrutinized in the public domain," Oberstar said.

US Airways Seeks To Acquire Delta In Bid To Be No. 1 (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways made an $8 billion offer for Delta Air Lines yesterday in an effort to become the largest airline in the world and dominate travel on the East Coast of the United States.

The surprise offer may presage a wave of mergers in the struggling airline industry. While consolidation of companies often leads to higher prices, it is unclear at this point whether this merger would do anything like that.

But any deal for Delta would have to overcome high hurdles, including antitrust scrutiny and a lack of support from Delta's management, which rebuffed advances from US Airways this summer.

In an unusual tack, the unsolicited offer is being made to the creditors of Delta, which is operating under bankruptcy protection — a process that will give Delta management control over any plan to get out of bankruptcy for at least several more months.

Delta said yesterday that it would review the offer. Delta is now the fourth-largest domestic airline and US Airways is No. 5. US Airways said the combined carrier would be bigger than the current leader, American Airlines, and would be called Delta Air Lines. It noted that Delta is a "very, very powerful" brand worldwide.

A deal would presumably be welcomed by many investors and analysts, who maintain that there are too many airlines fighting for razor-thin profits.

Since the drop in air travel after the Sept. 11 attacks, nearly all the established carriers have sought bankruptcy protection. US Airways has filed for bankruptcy protection twice since 2002 and has turned itself around through a merger with America West last year.

This competition among airlines has benefited some passengers. Even as the economy has rebounded and planes are as heavily booked as they have ever been, competition has kept a lid on fares on some popular routes at certain times of the year. That has sliced airlines' profit margin thinner, making mergers — and the opportunity to pare some of their high costs — an attractive proposition.

The offer for Delta changes the calculations for deals to come. It had been widely expected that Delta would find a merger partner after emerging from bankruptcy protection, not before. The airlines that it has code-sharing relationships with now, notably Northwest and Continental, were seen as the most likely partners.

US Airways estimated that a merger would save at least $1.65 billion in operating costs annually by combining facilities at some airports, eliminating flights and cutting capacity by about 10 percent.

About 50 percent of the routes served by Delta and US Airways overlap, said Daniel Kasper, an airline consultant with LECG.

DOJ_NMG_0095268

Robert W. Mann, a consultant in Port Washington, N.Y., said, “If the combined companies reduce the number of flights offered in routes where they overlap, you could see higher prices for consumers.”

As a result, any deal can be expected to receive scrutiny from the Justice Department and it might well result in the sale of either the US Airways or the Delta shuttle services connecting New York, Washington and Boston. A merger of the airlines could be among the first to be reviewed in Washington after the Democrats take control of Congress in January.

News of the offer drew a mixed reaction from travelers yesterday. While some welcomed the possible combination — particularly if it ensured the survival of Delta — others worried about the prospect of higher fares and still lower customer-service levels.

“They’re taking two poorly performing airlines, especially from a passengers’ point of view, and putting them together,” said Michael J. Grossman, a lawyer from Lexington, Ky., and a Delta frequent flier. “What you’re left with is the lowest common denominator.”

A regulatory inquiry would not be the only gantlet US Airways would have to run. The first is overcoming resistance from Delta. US Airways’ chief executive, W. Douglas Parker, has approached Delta’s chief executive, Gerald Grinstein, over the last several months about merging, but was rebuffed, according to letters that US Airways released yesterday. In late September, he tried again. Mr. Grinstein turned him down once more.

Yesterday, Mr. Grinstein said in a statement, "We received a letter from US. Airways this morning and will, of course, review it.” Then he added, “Delta’s plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong stand-alone carrier.”

Mr. Parker, a longtime proponent of consolidation, said in an interview yesterday that it was imperative that Delta engage in discussions with US Airways while it was still in bankruptcy protection. “We need to act on this before they emerge,” he said.

Striking a deal with Delta before it comes out of Chapter 11 protection could have major advantages for US Airways. Mr. Parker said that half the projected $1.65 billion in merger savings could not be achieved outside bankruptcy status.

While in bankruptcy, a company can seek court permission to reject contracts, renegotiate aircraft leases or terminate labor contracts — powers that US Airways exercised during its stays in Chapter 11.

But until February, only Delta management can present a plan to take the airline out of bankruptcy.

To succeed, US Airways will have to win the support of a significant chunk of Delta’s creditors, a group that may include hedge funds that acquired the debt in the secondary markets, and hope that they will put pressure on Delta’s management to engage in discussions.

GE Commercial Aviation Services, which finances much of the aircraft borrowing in the global industry, could prove to be a powerful player in the discussions because it provided the equivalent of debtor-in-possession financing to Delta at the beginning of its bankruptcy.

With enough backing, "it is very possible that, with patience and fortitude, they could get somewhere," said J. Andrew Rahl, head of the bankruptcy group at the law firm of Anderson Kill & Olick. Delta’s unsecured debt has recently traded at 40 cents on the dollar, US Airways noted.

In a sign that creditors welcomed the offer from US Airways, Delta’s bonds surged yesterday. The price of its 2009 note rose 21.25 cents, to 61.75 cents on the dollar. Airline stocks, including shares of US Airways, also rose sharply.

If enough creditors think that they would do better in a merger than in a stand-alone reorganization, "Delta’s going to have a hard time putting a plan out there," said David W. Dykhouse, a partner at Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler in New York.

Wilbur L. Ross Jr., whose investment firm has bought many distressed companies, said that when a company has been in bankruptcy protection as long as Delta, its debt “starts to move into the hands of the distressed-investment community.” These investors, many of them hedge funds, are likely to promote rival offers, he said, adding, “Chances are they would be pushing for an auction.”

Two of the largest holders of Delta’s unsecured claims are the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation and the Air Line Pilots Association, which represents Delta pilots.

Members of Delta’s committee of unsecured creditors either did not return calls requesting comment yesterday or declined to comment.

US Airways said it was offering $4 billion in cash, plus US Airways stock valued at $4 billion at the market close on Tuesday. That price would represent a substantial premium for Delta’s creditors, who would own about 45 percent of the combined company.

Still, it remains possible that Delta’s creditors’ committee could end up siding with Mr. Grinstein because it could take regulators far longer to decide whether to permit a US Airways-Delta merger than for Delta to come out of bankruptcy alone, antitrust lawyers said.

DOJ_NMG_0095269

Regulators are likely to look hard at the combined company's prospective dominance on routes into the Southeast; Delta maintains a hub in Atlanta and US Airways has a hub in Charlotte, N.C., antitrust experts noted.

For instance, US Airways has 19 flights today from La Guardia Airport in New York to Orlando, Fla., and Delta offers 28. From Boston to Fort Lauderdale, Fla., US Airways has 20 flights and Delta has 31.

And the deal could face an outpouring of criticism from consumers and consumer advocacy groups. Susan Johnson, an auditor from Philadelphia and an elite-level US Airways flier, said yesterday that she was "concerned about the monopoly this will present for US Airways, and how that will affect pricing."

"Sure, prices will be low initially," she said. "But in the long run, will they increase the cost of their ticket?"

Mr. Parker, the US Airways chief, said he was confident that the proposed combination would pass muster under antitrust laws.

Analysts said a merger could result in a leaner, more efficient airline.

"Even though airline mergers tend to be messy while employees, cultures and fleet types are integrated," said Ray Neidl, an analyst with Calyon Securities, "in the long term, a merged carrier should benefit in synergies from revenue generation, the ability to cut overhead costs and the probability that marginal hubs would be closed."

Not all industry watchers are convinced that consolidation will cure the airline industry's ills.

"Airlines are notoriously risky to operate," said Allen Michel, a professor at the Boston University School of Management. "Far in excess of 100 airlines have gone into bankruptcy since airline deregulation in 1978."

Moreover, US Airways has not completed integrating last year's America West combination, "and it is questionable whether the Delta deal will pass antitrust muster," said Professor Michel said. "Adding these factors to the complexities associated with an ordinary merger increase the odds against success."

Labor-management relations are potentially another problem. Both airlines have clashed in recent years with their unions, principally the Air Line Pilots' Association. And both have struggled to cope with low-price competitors like JetBlue and Southwest.

For fliers, the deal may mean more routes and frequency in the long term, but it could also create headaches as the companies merge their operations, schedules and frequent-flier mile programs.

In an e-mail message to members of US Airways' frequent-flier club yesterday, the carrier promised to "work hard to mitigate transition difficulties," like those that occurred after its merger with America West, when many passengers were left confused. In the same message, US Airways tried to emphasize the "enormous benefits" of a deal with Delta.

The message made no mention of US Airways' plan to cut flight capacity by 10 percent.

US Airways Presses Delta Over $8bn Offer (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways on Wednesday insisted that Delta Air Lines' management would be forced to consider its $8bn offer to create the biggest US airline by revenues, in spite of its rival's pledge to emerge from bankruptcy as an independent company.

Doug Parker, US Airways chairman and chief executive, launched his second effort in 18 months to buy a bankrupt carrier and push an enlarged US Airways into the global airline elite.

However, Delta quickly repeated its opposition to the move after rebuffing an approach this year, forcing US Airways to appeal directly to its unsecured creditors.

Mr Parker insisted that Delta's executives would be forced to hold talks as the premium offered to creditors was superior to their existing plan.

"We have put a proposal to them that would be better than anything else, certainly their own plan [and as a result] we will get management support," Mr Parker said in an interview with the Financial Times.

Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chairman and chief executive, has rebuffed approaches from US Airways and United in favour of restructuring the carrier to leave bankruptcy next year, when he plans to step down.

Mr Grinstein favours leveraging Delta's domestic strength in Atlanta and New York to expand its international services after restructuring to give it costs a quarter below rivals such as Air France-KLM and Lufthansa.

"Jerry has enormous credibility with the Delta employees, [and] labour integration is essential to the success of these things," said Michael E. Levine, distinguished research scholar at the New York University School of Law.

US Airways' cash and stock proposal represents a 25 per cent premium over the pre-announcement value of Delta creditors' claims, which rose more than 40 per cent on Wednesday as US Airways' own stock price climbed 15 per cent to a record $58.42.

Mr Parker said there was "a unique opportunity" to combine networks viewed by analysts as complementary.

DOJ_NMG_0095270

Mr Parker maintained that the rise of low-cost carriers in the US meant there would be no antitrust issues with the proposed takeover. He intends to close the deal by mid-2007 when Delta aims to emerge from the bankruptcy protection it sought in September last year. The US justice department blocked an attempt by United to acquire the old US Airways in 2000 on competition grounds, scuppering another proposed combination between American and Northwest.

"There's much less concern [now] with the DoJ about the impact on consumers," said Mr Parker.

Additional reporting by Stephanie Kirchgaessner in Washington and James Politi in New York

US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (PPG)

By Dan Fitzpatrick And Mark Belko

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, November 16, 2006

It offers bankrupt airline's creditors an $8 billion cash-and-stock deal

After being rebuffed twice by phone and letter, US Airways boss Doug Parker went public yesterday with his campaign to buy bankrupt Delta Air Lines, asking Delta creditors to accept an $8 billion cash-and-stock deal that would create one of the world's largest air carriers, save the combined company $1.65 billion annually and retire the US Airways brand for good.

A longtime cheerleader for industry consolidation, Mr. Parker wants the Delta deal done before the nation's No. 3 carrier emerges from bankruptcy next year, making it easier for the combined company to cut costs, give back planes to lenders, renegotiate contracts and shed unprofitable leases -- just as the twice-bankrupt US Airways did last year while merging with America West Airlines.

After that, "it will be too late," he said yesterday. "We will all regret not acting sooner."

Just how the proposed combination -- if it clears Delta's apparent opposition and regulatory hurdles that some believe will be significant -- would affect Pittsburgh wasn't clear.

Allegheny County Airport Authority Executive Director Kent George believes any cuts would be minimal, given that US Airways already has slashed local employment by more than 10,000 to just above 2,000 and daily flights by more than 400 to 158 since 2000.

US Airways executives reiterated that optimism in comments yesterday, with airline president Scott Kirby saying Pittsburgh "will continue to be an important part of our network" with or without the merger.

But some analysts questioned if a combined US Airways-Delta would be all that committed to Pittsburgh, given that Delta already has a regional jet hub in suburban Cincinnati, where costs are lower and connecting service to other markets is more extensive. "I think a deal like this would be disastrous for Pittsburgh," said local airline analyst Bill Lauer.

Mr. Parker and Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein first spoke about this subject in the spring, via phone.

At the time, US Airways described that exchange as a "courtesy call," with Mr. Parker hearing rumors about interest from other carriers and wanting Mr. Grinstein to know that he was interested, too.

He followed up with a more serious Sept. 29 letter asking for a "meaningful dialogue about entering into a transaction." Mr. Grinstein's response, on Oct. 17, was that it would "not be productive" to discuss a merger at this time.

So Mr. Parker turned up the pressure yesterday by releasing his latest missive to Mr. Grinstein and broadcasting his intent to take the merger proposal directly to Delta's creditors -- the ones who will make a final decision about the airline's reorganization plan and whether any competing bids are better. US Airways will not be able to submit its alternative plan until mid-February at the earliest.

"I believe we owe it to our respective stakeholders to pursue this opportunity vigorously," Mr. Parker wrote to Mr. Grinstein.

Atlanta-based Delta did not appear ruffled by all of yesterday's rhetoric and attention.

Mr. Grinstein, in a statement, said the airline would "of course review" Mr. Parker's letter but that "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working."

A successful merger could spark a new round of consolidation in the industry. United Airlines-Continental Airlines and American Airlines-Northwest Airlines are some possible hook-ups that could result, according to longtime Virginia airline consultant Darryl Jenkins, who believes Mr. Parker dreamed up this combination two to three years ago, before the America West-US Airways deal happened.

Several hurdles stand in the way of Mr. Parker's plan.

US Airways, now based in Tempe, Ariz., still needs to officially complete its merger with America West, with several labor contracts covering pilots, flight attendants and mechanics still not signed. US Airways machinists and pilots unions issued statements yesterday warning that the current labor negotiations need to be settled before any talks with Delta can begin.

"Management's grandiose plans cannot take off without the pilots on board," said US Airways pilots chairman Jack Stephan.

DOJ_NMG_0095271

The deal also is sure to face intense antitrust scrutiny in Washington, D.C., similar to the concern that killed a proposed US Airways-United merger in 2000. US Airways and Delta do overlap in some key markets up and down the East Coast, and the combined company would be the largest carrier at 155 airports.

It would have two big hubs in the Southeast (Charlotte, N.C., and Atlanta), two in the West (Phoenix and Salt Lake City) and two in the Northeast (New York and Philadelphia), along with strongholds in the same geographic areas (Boston, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati).

Some analysts believe hubs will have to be cut, with Charlotte looking most vulnerable sitting so close to Atlanta, Delta's biggest hub. "It is not a clean situation," said Bill Warlick, an airline analyst with Fitch Ratings in Chicago.

But US Airways is convinced this can work. It intends to sell one of the airlines' two East Coast shuttle operations connecting New York, Washington and Boston to mitigate antitrust concerns. Also, it says industry conditions are considerably different than six years ago, when the U.S. Department of Justice nixed the United merger.

Following the 9/11 attacks, a slew of big carriers filed for bankruptcy and racked up more than $40 billion in losses while lower-cost competitors such as Southwest Airlines and JetBlue Airways encroached on new territory, such as Pittsburgh.

The blueprint for the Delta takeover attempt comes straight from America West's successful acquisition of US Airways last year.

America West stepped in at the 11th hour and took the novel step of purchasing US Airways in Chapter 11. Under court protection, US Airways slashed employee pay and benefits, canceled pensions, tore up leases and slashed costs.

When it emerged, the combined airlines flew under the better-known US Airways banner.

US Airways said Citigroup has committed $7.2 billion in financing for the deal.

No city has suffered more as a result of the industry's woes than Pittsburgh.

But US Airways maintained that no job losses would result from a merger and that the Pittsburgh area would keep flights and facilities, such as the maintenance hangars near Pittsburgh International Airport. How much of each it would keep is still unknown -- US Airways also made it clear that flights would have to be cut across the system to lower costs. "It is too early to say" what airports would lose out, Mr. Kirby said.

Mr. George, the airport authority executive director, agreed, adding that he does not believe a Delta-US Airways merger would have an enormous impact on service in Pittsburgh in part because US Airways already has eliminated most of its connecting service, retaining flights that only serve the local market.

Although Delta and US Airways compete on service to Atlanta, a merger would not necessarily diminish that because AirTran Airways also serves the market, he said. The same is true of New York, where Delta and US Airways compete for local traffic. With the entrance of Jet Blue into the market, there still will be competition.

In markets where there would not be competition, he was confident that other airlines would step in to offer an alternative, he said. And he doesn't see Pittsburgh losing flights to Cincinnati, saying that Cincinnati has even less of a local traffic base than Pittsburgh does.

One thing that is all but certain, he said, is that US Airway's move will delay a decision by two to three months on where to put a new $25 million flight operations center.

Pittsburgh, Phoenix and Charlotte are competing for the center, which would replace facilities US Airways has in Pittsburgh and Phoenix. Before yesterday's bid, US Airways was planning to decide on a new location by February.

"If the merger appears that it's going through, the overall plan in how to do an overall operations and control center must be rethought because now you're doing it for a much larger airline," Mr. George said.

(Dan Fitzpatrick can be reached at dfitzpatrick@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1752. Mark Belko can be reached at mbelko@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1262. Cox News Service contributed to this report.)

US Airways Announces Takeover Bid For Delta (LAT)

By Peter Pae

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group today said it was making an $8-billion takeover bid for Delta Air Lines to create one of the world's largest carriers after attempted merger talks with the nation's third-largest airline failed this summer.

US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest carrier in terms of passenger traffic, said it is appealing directly to Delta Air's creditors to buy the larger airline, which is undergoing reorganization in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

"We believe that the combination of US Airways and Delta is extremely compelling and will create significant value for each of our stakeholders," US Airways Chairman and Chief Executive Doug Parker said in a statement.

While US Airways has little presence in Southern California, Delta is the fourth-largest airline operating out of Los Angeles International Airport and the second-largest at Ontario Airport.

DOJ_NMG_0095272

If approved — and there are several hurdles to overcome, including federal regulatory approvals — the merger could set off a wave of consolidation in the domestic airline industry, analysts said.

The takeover bid is a fallout of overcapacity in the airline industry that has financially hurt the larger airlines, analysts said. According to the Airline Transport Assn., U.S. commercial airlines have lost $35 billion since 2001, though the industry is recovering and may turn a profit this year.

"The world doesn't need six of these old established legacy carriers," said Ed Greenslet, publisher of the Airline Monitor. "Those six at one time had 90% of the domestic traffic in this country. Now they have half of it. The pie for those carriers is getting smaller because of the low-cost carrier like Southwest and Jet Blue."

For its part, Delta said in a statement that it intends to emerge from Bankruptcy Court protection as a stand-alone carrier.

"We received a letter from US Airways this morning and will of course review it," Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said in a statement.

But he added: "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier."

US Airways, which is merging with America West Airlines, said it was appealing to creditors because it was rebuffed in an initial attempt to talk to Delta's management.

"We thought about this opportunity for quite a while," US Airways' Parker said in a videoconference with the airline's employees today. "They responded back that they didn't think it was a good idea."

Parker said a merger of the two airlines could provide a projected $1.65 billion in annual cost savings for the combined companies. He added that the bid was being made now because the projected cost savings could be shaved by half if it waited for Delta to emerge from bankruptcy.

Under the terms of the offer, Delta creditors would receive $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million US Airway shares, valued at about $4 billion based on Tuesday's closing stock price.

US Airways said it has obtained $7.2 billion in committed financing from Citigroup.

peter.pae@latimes.com

US Airways Proposes $8.7 Billion Delta Air Takeover (Update15) (BLOOM)

By Mary Schlangenstein

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- US Airways Group Inc. made an unsolicited $8.67 billion offer for bankrupt Delta Air Lines Inc. that would create the world's largest carrier.

Delta's creditors would get $4 billion in cash and $4.67 billion in stock of US Airways, formed 14 months ago as it exited bankruptcy through a merger with America West Holdings Corp. Delta Chief Executive Officer Gerald Grinstein agreed today to review the offer even as he reaffirmed his aim to keep Delta independent.

The bid sparked a rally in airline shares, sending the Bloomberg U.S. Airlines Index up the most since May 2003 on speculation that more consolidation will follow. US Airways CEO Doug Parker has championed the idea of mergers.

``We believe this bid may prompt other bids for Delta and possibly set an industry trend for consolidation," Ray Neidl, a Calyon Securities analyst in New York, said in a report. ``However, Delta management remains hostile at this point to any merger, which could cause delays."

Grinstein told employees in a letter Delta wants to remain independent when it emerges from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007, not a ``merged, acquired or otherwise consolidated airline."

`We Remain Skeptical'

``While Delta is obligated to review this proposal carefully, we remain skeptical that it would make sense to deviate from our plan," he said in the letter.

Like Delta, Northwest Airlines Corp. also wants to exit Chapter 11 next year, and the two carriers' plans are helping fuel the industry's merger speculation. U.S. airlines this year may post their first collective profit since 2000, after more than $40 billion in losses from 2001 through 2005.

Shares of US Airways jumped $8.57, or 17 percent, to $59.50 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, leading a surge by carriers including Continental Airlines Inc. and AirTran Holdings Inc. About 13.8 million US Airways shares changed hands, the most ever for the airline.

Delta's 7.9 percent notes maturing in 2009 rose 21.25 cents to 61.75 cents on the dollar, according to Trace, the bond price reporting system of the NASD. The yield fell to 26.67 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0095273

Citigroup Inc. has committed $7.2 billion in financing for the proposed merger, US Airways said. Delta's unsecured creditors would own 45 percent of the combined company. The stock portion of the offer is for 78.5 million shares, so the value of that part of the transaction will change daily.

Biggest Carrier

A combined US Airways-Delta would retain Delta's name and vault past AMR Corp.'s American Airlines to become the world's largest carrier, as measured by miles flown by paying passengers. By that standard, Delta is the third-largest U.S. airline and US Airways is the seventh-biggest.

US Airways and Atlanta-based Delta both have U.S. East Coast networks, while Tempe, Arizona-based US Airways also has a West Coast presence. Delta has added more than 70 new international routes since 2005 under a plan to almost double overseas flying to 35 percent of the carrier's total.

The combined airline would be the largest in terms of passengers carried in the northeastern and southeastern U.S. and Florida, and second-biggest in the Southwest, US Airways said.

A merged US Airways-Delta also would have more than 18 percent of the U.S. industry's capacity, US Airways said. Any merger agreement must be approved by the U.S. Justice Department, US Airways shareholders and the court overseeing Delta's bankruptcy.

`Very Sensible'

``This would be a very sensible move, but fiendishly complicated," said Richard Aboulafia, vice president of Teal Group, a Fairfax, Virginia-based consultant. ``Complicated by issues of seniority, culture, fleet, route networks -- and that's just scratching the surface."

Delta has major airport operations in Atlanta, Cincinnati, Salt Lake City and New York. US Airways has hubs in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Charlotte, North Carolina.

Both carriers run shuttle services in the U.S. northeast, and US Airways' plan calls for selling one of them, Parker said. The company hasn't decided which.

The US Airways shuttle has 14 daily flights between Boston and New York's LaGuardia airport and 15 between LaGuardia and Washington's Ronald Reagan airport. Delta operates 16 daily weekday flights between Boston and New York, and 15 between New York and Washington.

``We can put the two networks together and optimize them," Parker, 45, said in an interview. ``As we do that, we can actually fly to 100 percent of the cities we serve today with two networks, with 10 percent fewer airplanes. That's a lot of savings."

Annual Savings

US Airways estimated the annual savings for the two companies at $1.65 billion over two years. US Airways hasn't decided where a combined carrier would be based.

US Airways said it wouldn't have to shed jobs, relying instead on attrition and employee leaves to thin the workforce as the combined airline pares capacity by 10 percent. Delta has 47,000 employees and 469 planes in its main jet operations, compared with 35,425 workers and 357 planes at US Airways.

Pay for the employees would be based on the higher of existing labor costs between the two carriers, Parker said, at an incremental expense of about $90 million.

The pay plan ``is a big positive for employees," US Airways President J. Scott Kirby said in an interview. ``Our employees also would have the advantage of working for a larger, even more financially sound airline. We hope that will get negotiations on a fast track with each group."

Grinstein, 74, responded to US Airways' initial merger offer in an Oct. 17 letter, telling Parker ``it would not be productive." US Airways disclosed the letter in a filing today.

Delta's Strategy

Since filing for Chapter 11 in September 2005, Delta has cut unprofitable flights, reduced labor costs in part by eliminating 9,000 jobs and shed aircraft.

Parker said the merger must be done before Delta leaves Chapter 11, or at least half of the savings would be lost. The offer is ``absolutely" conditioned on completion in bankruptcy, he said.

By law, Delta has the exclusive right through Feb. 15 to file a plan to exit bankruptcy. By going public with its offer, US Airways hopes to convince Delta creditors that a merger is a better option, said William Rochelle, a partner at Fulbright & Jaworski LLP in New York who represents some creditors.

Creditors

``US Airways is not going to get to first base unless they can generate some significant degree of creditor support for the offer," Rochelle said in an interview. ``By simply making the offer public, Parker has thrown a ball up in the air. He'll see which team catches it -- the Delta team or the creditor team."

DOJ_NMG_0095274

Rochelle doesn't expect to see a battle in bankruptcy court over Delta, although there will be ``hard bargaining'' over any agreement that may be reached.

Parker said the combined airline would be ``a more effective and profitable competitor in the current fragmented marketplace.'' US Airways' offer is a 25 percent premium over the Nov. 14 trading price of Delta's pre-petition unsecured claims and a 40 percent premium over the average trading price for unsecured claims over the past 30 days, US Airways said.

If approved, the merger would be the largest in the airline industry, ahead of American's acquisition of Trans World Airlines Inc. for $2.8 billion in cash and assumed debt in 2001.

Parker said the merger with Delta would be completed in the first half of 2007 and eventually would boost US Airways' earnings per share by 40 percent.

US Airways still is completing its 2005 merger with America West. The airlines haven't fully integrated their labor groups or their computerized reservation systems and are still flying under separate operating certificates.

Operations Questions

``While this may look good on paper, the fact is Parker has yet to demonstrate for us he's capable of putting two airlines together, much less three,'' said Jack Stephan, chairman of US Airways' Air Line Pilots Association. ``He needs to address operational and labor issues going on in his own backyard first before he can tackle anything else.''

US Airways and America West pilots plan picketing tomorrow in Phoenix and Charlotte to protest lack of an integrated contract for pilots. A spokesman for Delta pilots didn't immediately return a call for comment.

The Machinists union also wants any merger efforts to wait until after US Airways finishes contract talks. The Association of Flight Attendants-CWA didn't immediately return a call for comment.

Airlines' History

The US Airways-America West combination followed two bankruptcy filings by US Airways and a previous trip through Chapter 11 for America West. In the merger, the airline's headquarters was moved to Tempe from Arlington, Virginia, and America West executives, including Parker, kept the top management jobs.

Maintaining the Delta name for a merged carrier would extend a brand that dates to 1928, when an investment group purchased a 4-year-old crop-dusting company and renamed it Delta Air Service after the Mississippi Delta region where it operated. The company began flying passengers the next year.

United, the world's second-largest carrier, in September hired Goldman Sachs Group Inc. to explore possible transactions, including mergers. United CEO Glenn Tilton has called for industry consolidation since February 2005.

US Air Faces Long Road In Delta Bid (USAT)

By Marilyn Adams

USA Today, November 16, 2006

US Airways' brash $8 billion bid to buy Delta Air Lines won a warm reception Wednesday on Wall Street, but the proposed deal has a long way to go to get done.

US Airways' bid, immediately rebuffed by Delta management, would make the combined airline the USA's top carrier by domestic flying capacity, eclipsing American Airlines. By US Airways' own calculations, the combined carrier would be the biggest airline in the Northeast and the Southeast, the biggest carrier across the Atlantic, and the second-biggest airline in the Caribbean.

US Airways shares closed up nearly 17%, at $59.50, on strong buy recommendations from analysts. The company offered $4 billion in cash and about $4.6 billion worth of US Airways stock, which would give tens of thousands of unsecured creditors at Delta a 25% premium over the value of their claims as of Tuesday: 40 cents on the dollar. Delta filed Chapter 11 bankruptcy reorganization in 2005.

“The proposal we've made is extremely compelling,” US Airways CEO Doug Parker said Wednesday. But it faces several hurdles; some certain, some not.

The takeover bid would require the approval of Delta's bankruptcy judge, US Airways' shareholders, Delta's creditors and the U.S. government. And it might not be the only offer for Delta, a potentially attractive target as the USA's third-biggest carrier. Some of the hurdles:

·Delta management. Delta CEO Gerald Grinstein reiterated Wednesday his long-held position that he wants the carrier to exit bankruptcy next year as an independent airline. In its bankruptcy case, Delta has the exclusive legal right until Feb. 15 to present the court a plan of reorganization. Unless the judge terminates that right, a competing plan from Delta's creditors or an outside party can't be considered.

DOJ_NMG_0095275

·Antitrust. A merger between two such big carriers needs Justice Department approval. The agency would have to determine whether the deal would help or hurt consumers in terms of fares and flight options. Antitrust considerations are particularly strong along the East Coast, where the route networks of both Delta and US Airways are heavily concentrated.

·A competing bid. Another carrier or investor group could make a competing offer for Delta, leading to a bidding war. That would force US Airways to sweeten its offer or drop out of the bidding.

United Airlines CEO Glenn Tilton, for one, has made no secret of his interest in a merger. Tilton believes that the U.S. airline industry has too many players and should consolidate. United itself emerged from bankruptcy earlier this year.

United Airlines spokeswoman Jean Medina said Wednesday the Chicago-based airline has "been consistent in our position on consolidation in the airline industry, and nothing has changed." She would not comment on the possibility of a competing offer for Delta.

· Labor. US Airways is itself the product of a recent merger between Phoenix-based America West and Virginia-based US Airways (story, above). The two carriers' labor unions and operations have not yet been fully merged. Labor tensions and operational glitches remain. A new merger could throw US Airways and Delta into a period of transition again.

"This would have to jump through many hoops," said Chicago-based bankruptcy lawyer Fruman Jacobson, who represented the unsecured creditors of United Airlines during its bankruptcy case. "It could run into some serious antitrust problems." At the same time, he said, Delta's board of directors "has an obligation to review all qualified offers. Looking at just the raw numbers, this has to be taken seriously, especially the $4 billion in cash."

Typically, unsecured creditors in a bankruptcy case receive only stock in the reorganized company as payment for claims, not cash.

New York-based lawyer Daniel Golden, who represents Delta's unsecured creditors committee, said the group was scheduled to begin discussing the offer Wednesday during a regularly scheduled meeting. The committee represents creditors such as bondholders, suppliers and vendors, whose claims are not secured by tangible assets such as aircraft.

Delta CEO Grinstein said in a statement that the company will review the offer. But he reiterated Delta's wish to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a "strong, stand-alone carrier."

The proposal was not a complete surprise. Parker, the US Airways CEO, first approached Grinstein last spring with the idea of merging. In September, Parker sent a formal letter proposing such a deal.

Grinstein politely rebuffed both invitations.

US Airways' bid quickly sparked speculation about more merger activity in the domestic airline industry, which only recently began pulling out of a deep, five-year financial slump.

In addition to speculation about expansion-minded United, the Delta deal focused attention on a possible bid for Northwest Airlines, also operating in Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities said Wednesday the US Airways bid could be the first of many merger proposals.

"We believe that this bid may prompt other bids for Delta and possibly set an industry trend for consolidation," Neidl said.

To finance the offer, US Airways said it has lined up $7.2 billion in financing from Citigroup to provide the $4 billion in cash, refinance Delta's bankruptcy loan, and refinance an existing loan from GE Capital to US Airways.

But Parker said the deal makes sense only if it is sealed before Delta exits bankruptcy. While under the protection of bankruptcy court, Delta has the legal right to reject or renegotiate leases for aircraft and other assets, a powerful cost-cutting tool. US Airways estimates that by combining fleets, networks and facilities, and by eliminating redundancies, the combined airline could achieve $1.65 billion in annual cost savings.

Parker is not proposing the merged carrier close hub airports, exit cities or shed significant flying capacity. On the contrary, he said the proposed new carrier would serve the same cities the two carriers do now, including every major market along the East Coast: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Charlotte, Atlanta and Florida's largest cities. US Airways' home base of Phoenix and Delta's Salt Lake City hub are also relatively close.

The merged carrier would reduce its combined overall flying capacity by 10%, he said.

The biggest concession Parker proposed is selling one of the two hourly shuttle services serving high-paying business travelers in the Boston-New York-Washington corridor. Delta operates one shuttle, US Airways another. Eliminating one would remove a potential objection by the Justice Department.

Parker played down concerns that the deal might be viewed as anti-competitive. "Our management has a record of consumer-friendly pricing," he said. "Consumers on the East Coast would have a stronger airline with the ability to lower fares."

Justice has approved two airline mergers in recent years involving carriers in bankruptcy court: American's takeover of TWA in 2001, when TWA was in its third bankruptcy and in danger of disappearing; and America West's merger with US Airways last year when the latter was in Chapter 11.

DOJ_NMG_0095276

The old US Airways was concentrated along the East Coast, while America West was concentrated in the West, with relatively little overlap.

But Justice blocked a proposed merger of United and US Airways in 2001, saying the merged carrier would have too much overlap on the East Coast and would hinder competition.

Hewitt Pate, former Justice Department antitrust chief and now a partner at Hunton & Williams, said the department traditionally looks at airline mergers in terms of combined market share on routes they serve.

Historically, he said, Justice has been friendly to mergers that combined route systems with little overlap. It has been "skeptical of deals with a high degree of overlap where the two companies serve a lot of the same city pairs," he said.

Business professor Severin Borenstein of the University of California at Berkeley said the two carriers' nearby hubs in Atlanta and Charlotte, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh, and Salt Lake City and Phoenix could pose potential antitrust problems.

Both carriers also have a significant presence in Boston Logan, New York LaGuardia and Washington Reagan. US Airways has the largest presence in Philadelphia and Charlotte, while Delta dominates Atlanta.

"There's a fair amount of overlap in their route structures, particularly in the Southeast, and I would think that would be a problem for Washington," Borenstein said.

Borenstein noted that the USA's airline landscape has changed dramatically in the last six years. Low-cost carriers including Southwest, AirTran, Jet Blue, Frontier and Spirit now control about 25% of the domestic market.

US Airways Makes Bid For Delta (WT)

By Sean Lengell, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc. proposed an $8 billion takeover of bankrupt Delta Air Lines Inc. yesterday, although Delta says it has no interest in the offer.

The proposed entity, which would operate with the Delta name, would be the leading trans-Atlantic carrier.

The proposal is the latest move by US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker, who orchestrated the 2005 takeover of the bankrupt airline by America West Airlines and has pushed for consolidation in the industry.

"Consumers will have the advantages of a larger, full-service airline with the cost structure of a low-fare carrier," Mr. Parker said.

With two major U.S. carriers -- Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. -- operating in bankruptcy, industry watchers have been expecting a wave of consolidation and said a US Airways-Delta deal could jump-start the process.

Under the proposal, the combined airline would serve as many cities as US Airways currently does but with 10 percent fewer flights because some duplicate routes would be eliminated.

The merged company also would sell one of its shuttle operations that operate in the Northeast, mostly between Washington, New York and Boston, to eliminate the overlapping routes and to alleviate antitrust concerns.

But Delta's management has said it is committed to leaving Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in the first half of 2007 as a stand-alone carrier.

"We received a letter from US Airways [yesterday] morning and will of course review it," said Delta's chief executive, Gerald Grinstein. But "our plan is working, and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective."

The bankruptcy court has given the Atlanta carrier until Feb. 15 to file a reorganization plan.

"We will continue to move aggressively towards that goal," Mr. Grinstein said.

Delta rebuffed merger talks with the Tempe, Ariz., company earlier in the fall.

A merger between US Airways and Delta, which has been operating in bankruptcy since September 2005, would give Delta creditors significantly greater value than under any stand-alone plan, Mr. Parker said.

Delta's creditors would get $4 billion in cash and $4.67 billion in stock of US Airways.

"We just believe this is a better plan, and we want to get it on the table to the creditors," Mr. Parker said. "We believe once they understand this alternative plan, they'll prefer it."

US Airways' largest shareholder, PAR Capital Management, backs the offer.

"We enthusiastically support this transaction, which we believe offers the opportunity to build upon US Airways' current competitive position," said Paul Reeder, president of PAR Capital Management. "We have confidence in the US Airways management team ... and the potential upside for US Airways shareholders."

US Airways has obtained $7.2 billion in committed financing for the deal from Citigroup.

Domestic mergers are subject to U.S. antitrust laws and must be approved by the Department of Justice. The merger, if it were to go through, also would have to be approved by the Department of Transportation, the Federal Aviation Administration and the Securities and Exchange Commission, as well as the European Union.

DOJ_NMG_0095277

Justice officials declined to comment on the proposal.

But some industry watchers doubt the Justice Department would approve the proposal.

"In some markets, they would create a monopoly position," said Mike Boyd, a Colorado airline analyst. "This stuff [from Mr. Parker] about, 'Well, we all know we need consolidation.' Really? Mr. Grinstein doesn't think so. The chairman of Continental doesn't think so; the chairman of Northwest doesn't think so."

Ray Neidl, an equity analyst for the airline industry, agreed that the merger proposal wouldn't be an easy sell to the Justice Department, saying the offer has a 30 percent to 40 percent chance of rejection.

A reduction in competition also would be bad for consumers, Mr. Boyd said.

"This is a bad deal," he said. "Consumers lose big time. Whenever you lose a top competitor, consumers lose."

A merger of US Airways and Delta would create a cumbersome system with eight hubs -- far too many to be cost-effective, said analyst Anthony Tangorra, chief executive of Latitude Transport Advisory.

"There are other networks available out there that would be a better fit for [US Airways] and Delta," he said.

Although Delta's management is giving the proposal a cool reception, the airline could be forced into a merger if its leading investors push the matter.

"This appears to be sort of like a hostile takeover," said CreditSights analyst Roger King. "Grinstein has made it clear that he doesn't want to merge. But US Airways is appealing directly to the creditors."

US Airways shares jumped 17 percent to $59.50 on the New York Stock Exchange after the announcement.

Delta added 5 cents to $1.52 in over-the-counter trading.

Mr. Neidl cautioned that the market's favorable reaction to the proposal will be tempered in the near future.

"Investing around potential mergers is tricky at best," he said.

US Airways Proposes To Merge With Delta (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker, rebuffed in an approach earlier this summer for merger talks with Delta Air Lines executives, is going around management and directly to the company's creditors with an $8 billion offer to buy the larger airline when it exits bankruptcy-court protection.

US Airways promised creditors "a significant premium" by offering $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock, according to a securities filing by Delta.

US Airways chairman and CEO Douglas Parker5 says that he can't wait anymore to try and advance a merger with Delta, and that the company would likely sell its own Air Shuttle service, keeping Delta's instead.

Mr. Parker, in a conference call with Wall Street analysts, said he was making his move now because half of the projected $1.65 billion in annual cost savings that could be achieved by combining the two carriers would disappear if Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways waits until after Delta exits bankruptcy.

While antitrust concerns would be among several hurdles to the combination, Mr. Parker said he didn't think there were any issues that couldn't be resolved. He suggested that either of US Airways' and Delta's competing Northeastern U.S. "shuttles," which connect Boston, New York and Washington, DC, could be put up for sale in order to satisfy antitrust problems. The merger last year of US Airways and America West, Mr. Parker said, shows that mergers "can be good for investors and consumers."

US Airways said frequent-flyer customers at the two carriers would have their current mileage balances combined as part of a Delta takeover. But the airlines participate in different global marketing alliances, so US Airways would have to narrow that to a single partnership.

Mr. Parker has been buoyed by a high-flying stock price since the company's merger with America West Airlines. The Wall Street Journal reported that he telephoned Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein earlier this summer to gauge his interest in a possible merger. (See article6.)

Mr. Grinstein told Mr. Parker that Delta wasn't interested in starting merger talks, because the Atlanta-based airline plans to exit bankruptcy-court protection next spring as a stand-alone carrier.

Mr. Grinstein echoed that sentiment in a statement Wednesday. "We received a letter from U.S. Airways this morning and will of course review it," Mr. Grinstein said. However, "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, stand-alone carrier. Our plan is working and we are proud of the progress Delta people are making to achieve this objective."

The overture by Mr. Parker, an outspoken proponent of consolidation as part of the cure for the airline industry's financial ills, is the strongest signal yet to surface that a long-predicted consolidation among U.S. airlines could finally begin.

DOJ_NMG_0095278

Airline mergers are notoriously fraught with troubles, in the past running into obstacles such as unionized-labor opposition and antitrust concerns. Mr. Grinstein has expressed doubt that a Delta-US Airways merger would pass antitrust muster because Delta's Atlanta hub competes for passengers with US Airways' Charlotte hub, a person familiar with this thinking said.

Nonetheless, US Airways, the nation's sixth-largest carrier by traffic, Mr. Parker has repeated his contention that with Delta and Northwest Airlines both operating under bankruptcy-court protection, the time is ripe for an airline merger and that he would be interested in either carrier. Delta, the third-largest U.S. carrier by traffic, and Northwest, Eagan, Minn., the fourth-largest, filed for bankruptcy protection minutes apart last September, fueling speculation that the carriers could make likely merger candidates. Airlines in bankruptcy court make attractive merger targets because under court protection, carriers have greater leeway to restructure aircraft fleets and reject existing contracts with employee groups and vendors.

Though Mr. Parker has been the most vocal about his interest in consolidating with an airline in bankruptcy protection, other airline executives are ruminating about the possibility. Top executives, bankers and potential investors are feeding the rumor mill about possible combinations, partly because many in the industry say the U.S. airline industry's current financial recovery would benefit if there were fewer big carriers.

Glenn Tilton, UAL Corp.'s chief executive, is among several top airline executives who have said six U.S. network airlines are probably too many and have urged full deregulation so U.S. carriers can compete with foreign airlines that already are beginning to combine.

UAL, which spent 38 months in bankruptcy-court protection before emerging on Feb. 1, "entertained transaction discussions" with both Delta and Continental Airlines about 18 months ago, according to two people familiar with the matter. But the talks were extremely preliminary and didn't go anywhere.

That investors thus far have done well on the US Airways-America West combination is helping to fan the merger talk. However, there are fears that while the US Airways-America West merger occurred as airlines were on an upswing, the next combination may well miss what may be the peak in the industry's cycle. Also, before its merger with America West, US Airways was in danger of liquidating and thus needed the deal to save itself. Northwest and Delta aren't in that situation.

Meanwhile, the integration at US Airways is by no means complete. Unionized-labor groups from both airlines must still be combined, and several new contracts must be negotiated. Reassigning seniority rankings of merged labor groups could cause tension between employees and management.

Following the initial conversation between Messrs. Parker and Grinstein about a possible deal, Mr. Parker sent the Delta CEO a letter on Sept. 29 pressing Mr. Grinstein to meet for further talks, according to a letter Mr. Parker sent today to Mr. Grinstein. According to the letter, which US Airways released as part of its unsolicited takeover offer, Mr. Grinstein "declined to meet or even enter into discussions."

Betsy Talton, a Delta spokeswoman, said the airline is focused on emerging from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier.

The combined carrier would be holding the leading market share in 155 U.S. airports, have the most flights across the Atlantic Ocean of any U.S. carrier and rank No. 2 in flights to and from the Caribbean region. US Airways insisted it wouldn't have to exit any U.S. markets in order to achieve cost savings of at least $1.65 billion a year following a takeover of Delta. US Airways said it would eliminate about 10% of the combined airlines' capacity.

US Airways said it thinks that any antitrust issues "can be resolved," though the airline offered no immediate details on what it might do to ease anticompetitive concerns. Since the merger with America West, US Airways says it has lowered leisure fares in nearly 350 markets by an average of 24%.

The proposal would face an antitrust review by the Justice Department, which has rejected several big airline deals in recent years. But enforcers have historically allowed most acquisitions of bankrupt companies to proceed. And there has been a broad easing of merger enforcement under the Bush administration, which has approved many deals that might have been challenged in the past.

Even if the merger is allowed to proceed, antitrust enforcers are likely to conduct a market-by-market analysis and could force the sale of some city pairs served solely by Delta and US Airways.

A merger might also draw congressional scrutiny, where Democrats will control transportation and antitrust committees that may seek to weigh in on the deal. "Some mergers will face a tougher political gauntlet than in the past," says Scott Cleland, of Precursor LLC, a Washington consultant. Democrats often are more willing to seek changes in a merger to ease competition concerns, he says. But it is unlikely that the deal will be derailed.

--John R. Wilke in Washington contributed to this article.

Federal Watchdogs Likely To Approve Deal (AJC)

By Marilyn Geewax, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, November 16, 2006

Washington — If US Airways Group can persuade investors and creditors to accept its unsolicited $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc., federal regulators likely will approve the deal as well, analysts said Wednesday.

"I don't believe there will be any antitrust problems," said John Pincavage, a longtime airline adviser with Pincavage & Associates.

US Airways spokeswoman Valerie Wunder said the airline will work with regulatory agencies to free up whatever routes, airport slots and gates might be necessary to eliminate monopoly concerns. "We are confident any antitrust issue can be resolved," she said.

Pincavage noted that US Airways has specifically said that the combined company would sell off one of its two lucrative shuttle services linking Boston, New York and Washington to avoid gaining a monopoly in that market.

US Airways also competes with Delta up and down the Eastern Seaboard. And each has a hub in the Southeast, with Delta concentrated at Atlanta's Hartsfield-Jackson International Airport and US Airways at Charlotte Douglas International Airport.

To avoid antitrust problems, the Justice Department likely would want the combined carrier to scale back operations at those hubs to make room for competitors. It also might insist on reductions in operations at Delta's hub in Salt Lake City, which is relatively close to US Airways' hubs in Phoenix and Las Vegas.

But Justice Department spokeswoman Gina Talamona said it is too soon say exactly which concessions would be required to win approval.

If the proposed takeover were to move forward, "we would be interested in taking a look at it," she said. Divestiture decisions then "would have to be made on a case-by-case basis," she said.

Administration's 'laissez-faire policy'

Philip Baggaley, senior airline credit analyst with Standard & Poor's, said that "it's more likely than not that the Justice Department will approve" the just-proposed transaction as well, because "the Bush administration has certainly espoused a laissez-faire policy."

Merger opponents may want to look to Congress for help in pressuring Justice officials to stop the combination, especially since the new Congress will be controlled by Democrats, who typically are more skeptical of airline mergers.

For example, during the Clinton era, the Justice Department rejected both Northwest Airlines' attempt to buy Continental Airlines and United Airlines' bid to buy US Airways.

But this particular takeover might enjoy a warmer reception from Democrats. If unionized US Airways takes over largely nonunionized Delta, tens of thousands of Delta workers could end up paying union dues, an outcome that would please Democrats.

Also, the airline industry has struggled in recent years with overcapacity, which has reduced concerns about inadequate competition.

Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.) agreed that "congressional hearings aren't on the horizon," but said he would use whatever political pressure he could muster to scuttle the deal if Delta continues to oppose it.

His allies in such a fight would be legislators from states that stand to lose service in a merger, such as North Carolina or Ohio, where Delta has a hub in Cincinnati.

"Delta deserves the right to emerge from bankruptcy" and set its own course, Isakson said. "Their home is in Atlanta, and I want to be sure it remains in Atlanta."

Hostile Approach Set To Face Tough Antitrust Probe (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, November 16, 2006

US Airways' hostile bid for Delta will face a tough antitrust review by the Department of Justice, according to Washington experts who say authorities are likely to take into account the companies' concentration of routes along the east coast.

US Air is likely to approach an antitrust probe with an arsenal of arguments to support the proposed deal.

These include the changing dynamics of the troubled airline industry, the fact that it is willing to divest one of the companies' north-east shuttles and that the emergence of cheaper airlines has given passengers more options.

The airline may also highlight proposed synergies of $1.65bn a year - an argument that has resonated in the past with Thomas Barnett, the head of the antitrust division.

But one Washington source with knowledge about such investigations said the division has historically not always been swayed by divestiture offers from airlines, because they may not create enough competition in the marketplace.

Although the justice department would not make an antitrust ruling based on Delta's willingness to be taken over, an unwilling merger partner could offer ammunition to build a case against the deal.

Although the Bush administration has largely been seen as taking a hands-off approach to antitrust reviews, one notable exception was the antitrust division's 2001 rejection of the proposed US Air-United merger.

In a July interview with the Financial Times, Mr Barnett said he did not believe that the justice department needed to rethink its approach to airline mergers, but that it was worth considering whether the underlying "facts" of the industry had changed "so that applying [antitrust] principles might lead to a different result" in some cases.

"Certainly we take into account issues such as the competitive health or viability of an individual company or competitor, whether there are efficiencies that can be gained, whether the regulatory environment is changing to create new sources of competition [and] whether they have better access to consumers than before," he said.

Mr Barnett also noted, however, that some factors - including some city pair routes where airlines have a high market share - "cut in another direction".

US Airways' $8 Billion Bid For Delta May Unleash New Consolidation (FWJD)

By Harry R. Weber

The Fort Wayne Journal Gazette, November 16, 2006

US Airways made a hostile $8 billion bid for Delta Air Lines on Wednesday, ignoring Delta's repeated statements that it isn't interested in a merger. The move could start a stampede of competing bids in a long-predicted industry consolidation.

Analysts said United Airlines' parent company may make its own move to acquire Delta, and takeover bids for Northwest Airlines, which like Delta is being reorganized in bankruptcy court, can't be ruled out.

They also questioned whether US Airways could complete its plan to create the country's largest carrier, even after a planned 10 percent cut in capacity, on the compacted timeline it is seeking.

"My main question mark is if the politicians and regulators would allow it to happen, because if it did it would probably set off a trend for industry consolidation," Ray Neidl, an airline analyst with Calyon Securities in New York, said of a Delta-US Airways combination.

It also could lead to higher ticket prices for passengers, industry experts said.

"With a capacity reduction of 10 percent, fares are going nowhere but up," said Robert W. Mann, a Port Washington, N.Y.-based airline consultant.

Rep. James Oberstar, D-Minn., who is set to become chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said he is concerned the combination would reduce competition and increase costs for travelers.

"If the Justice Department on its own does not initiate an antitrust review, I would ask them to do that," he said.

Delta said its goal remains to be a stand-alone company when it emerges from bankruptcy and that it had the backing of its creditors committee when it declined earlier discussions with US Airways.

It has yet to file its own plan of reorganization, but has the exclusive right to do so until Feb. 15.

If the deal is completed, the combined airline would operate under the Delta name and serve more than 350 destinations across five continents.

The combined company would divest certain assets, including one of the two hourly shuttle services that Delta and US Airways operate among Boston, New York and Washington. US Airways has not decided where the combined company would be based.

The US Airways offer comes as it and America West are still integrating their operations after their combination last year. To date, only 57 percent of America West planes have been painted over with US Airways' logos, a spokesman said.

The deal also comes with a host of labor-related complications, according to aviation consultant Mann.

"There will be a huge seniority integration problem that will result. It's already problematic after the US Airways-America West merger. This will only increase it fourfold," he said.

As it stands now, Delta's existing common shares are likely to end up worthless when it exits bankruptcy. In most bankruptcy cases, debtholders end up with new shares of the company.

That's where the US Airways offer comes in: It is proposing to pay Delta's unsecured creditors $4 billion in cash and 78.5 million shares of US Airways stock after Delta emerges from bankruptcy.

Shares of US Airways Group Inc. rose $8.57, or 16.83 percent, to $59.50 Wednesday on the New York Stock Exchange. Delta Air Lines Inc. shares are traded over the counter.

Doug Parker, chief executive of Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways, said in an interview he believes Delta's creditors ultimately will see that his offer is fair.

"The (bankruptcy) process is designed so that the creditors get the highest possible value for their clients," he said.

Parker said he would anticipate flying with 10 percent fewer planes, but "the plan is not predicated on any job cuts" for the 85,000 employees at the two companies.

The combination would create a company with about $28 billion in annual revenue, leapfrogging it past the current No. 1 U.S. carrier, AMR Corp.'s American Airlines.

The projection is based on revenue figures through the first nine months of 2006. It's unclear how any divestitures would affect a combined Delta-US Airways' revenue.

Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein said last month he had received "feelers" from UAL Corp.'s United Airlines about a possible merger 18 months ago, but quickly rejected them. And he said in a statement Wednesday that "Delta's plan has always been to emerge from bankruptcy in the first half of 2007 as a strong, standalone carrier."

In a memo later to employees, Grinstein was more firm, saying "while Delta is obligated to review this proposal carefully, we remain skeptical that it would make sense to deviate from our plan."

Elk Grove Village, Ill.-based UAL sidestepped questions about its intentions, but didn't rule out a possible bid.

"We think consolidation is good for the industry," said Jake Brace, chief financial officer, when asked about its plans at a Citigroup investment conference in New York. "If it makes sense for us to participate in it, we will."

One analyst called United the perfect merger companion for Delta, with its trans-Pacific routes and international network matching up well with Delta's strengths on Atlantic and Latin American routes.

"If anyone takes over Delta, bet on United," said CreditSights' Roger King.

Morningstar analyst Brian Nelson also said he sees a United pursuit of Delta as a possibility, even though it would conflict with its stated strategy of paying down debt.

Bill Hochmuth, an analyst who tracks airlines at Thrivent Financial for Lutherans, said Northwest Airlines Corp. could potentially be an acquirer, although probably as more of a merger of equals.

Other airlines either declined to comment or said they were reviewing US Airways' offer.

US Airways, which was created after US Airways emerged from bankruptcy and was acquired by America West last year, said the deal is expected to generate $1.65 billion in annual savings from optimization of the airlines' networks and combining facilities in overlap airports.

US Airways sent a letter touting the Delta buyout to its frequent flyers, claiming the deal would reduce fares and combine the two airlines' frequent flyers programs, making it easier to redeem miles.

During a conference call, some analysts were skeptical of US Airways' confidence it can get the deal done if Delta is hostile to the bid.

They also questioned why US Airways is bidding for Delta, as opposed to another airline, like Northwest, which also is in bankruptcy.

Parker said the Delta bid makes more sense because of the synergies that can be realized. He also said he is confident the deal can clear all the hurdles it needs to, and "would prevail over any other bid if there were any."

US Airways has hubs in Phoenix, Philadelphia and Charlotte, N.C. Delta's hubs are in Atlanta, Cincinnati and Salt Lake City.

The deal makes the most sense only if it is consummated through the bankruptcy process, rather than waiting until after emergence to reach agreement, Parker said. That's because of further cost cuts that could be gained through the bankruptcy court.

As for employees, Parker said "we happen to have similar labor costs on both sides."

He did not discuss pilot pay.

US Airways has received a commitment from Citigroup Inc. to provide $7.2 billion in new financing for the deal. The funding would be used to refinance Delta's debtor-in-possession credit facility, refinance US Airways' existing senior secured facility with GE Capital, and provide funds for the $4 billion cash portion of the offer.

All other allowed secured debt and administrative claims would be assumed or paid in full. As of the end of May, Delta owed $7.49 billion to holders of secured claims, according to a court filing.

US Airways said the offer is a 25 percent premium over the current trading price of Delta's pre-petition unsecured claims as of Tuesday, and a 40 percent premium over the average trading price for Delta unsecured claims over the last 30 days.

Associated Press writers Daniel Yee in Atlanta, Joshua Freed in Minneapolis, Dave Carpenter in Chicago, David Koenig in Dallas, Brad Foss in Washington and Vinnee Tong in New York contributed to this report.

POSTED: 6:55 P.M. WEDNESDAY, NOV. 15, 2006

© 2006 Journal Gazette and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.fortwayne.com

Do Fliers Gain When Airlines Consolidate? (WSJ)

By Darren Everson And Betsy Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

US Airways Group Inc., which yesterday bid $8.67 billion to acquire Delta Air Lines, believes consolidation would help the troubled airline industry. But in the wake of US Airways' own purchase by America West, it's less clear how much consumers stand to benefit.

Delta has rejected the offer by US Airways. But if the hostile bid should prove successful, analysts say there could be some advantages for consumers, but also some risks. Users of US Airways frequent-flier miles, for instance, could benefit from having access to Delta's extensive international route system. On the other hand, overlaps in service, especially in some Southern cities where both airlines have major operations, could reduce competition and lead to increased fares. What's more, persistent glitches in the process of integrating US Airways and America West raise concerns about customer service should the Delta bid succeed.

A US Airways-Delta merger would create the country's largest carrier, with an 18% market share by available seat miles, an airline industry measure of capacity. Delta, the nation's third-largest airline by passenger traffic, has hubs in Atlanta, Cincinnati, New York (John F. Kennedy) and Salt Lake City. US Airways, which ranks No. 6, has hubs in Charlotte, N.C.; Philadelphia, Phoenix, Pittsburgh and Las Vegas. There is significant overlap between Delta's 6,795 daily flights and US Airways' 3,846, especially because both operate shuttles on the East Coast.

So far, US Airways has disclosed little about how a takeover of Delta would affect each airline's operations. One exception: One of the two companies' overlapping East Coast shuttle services, which connect Boston, New York and Washington, would probably have to be sold to satisfy antitrust concerns, US Airways says.

Beyond the shuttles, there is significant overlap in the South, with Delta's main hub situated in Atlanta and US Airways having significant operations in Charlotte. The concentration means that "it would destroy competition in the deep South," says Michael Boyd, president of Boyd Group Inc., an aviation-industry advisory group in Evergreen, Colo.

For example, while no airline currently commands more than a 39% market share in Charleston, S.C., a merged US Airways-Delta would gain more than a 70% share of that market, Mr. Boyd says. The new airline would have more than 75% of flights serving Montgomery, Ala., and nearly 80% of the market in Charlottesville, Va. "This is going to really hurt the consumer," he says.

Even outside of the South, the sheer size of the merged airline could create pricing power that pushes fares higher, especially along the East Coast, says Jay Sorensen, president of consulting firm IdeaWorks. However, Mr. Sorensen says that could benefit consumers in the long run.

"The first response to that [merger] outcome might be negative," Mr. Sorensen says. "But I think it's a good thing for the consumer. This industry simply needs higher fares to get back on a solid financial footing. Profitable airlines give better service in every regard from comfort in the air to reliably delivering baggage at the end of a flight."

US Airways counters arguments that fares could rise. It points to its merger with America West, which it says led to fare cuts averaging 24%. Plus, the airline says, even in the South, low-cast carriers like Southwest Airlines and AirTran Holdings Inc. remain as competition.

US Airways has proposed combining the two airlines' frequent-flier programs should the merger succeed. For US Airways' frequent fliers, Delta's extensive international routes could offer more destinations. But for users of Delta's SkyMiles, a merger could bring setbacks. For instance, Delta's SkyMiles currently expire after three years for members whose accounts have no activity, compared with a 18-month expiration term for US Airways' program, which is half the industry standard. Although Delta is shortening its expiration term to a two-year period, that's still longer than that of US Airways, says Tim Winship, publisher of FrequentFlier.com.

"When you boil it down, you have a low-cost carrier acquiring a full-service carrier," says Mr. Winship. "Watch out for terms and conditions changes," Mr. Winship says, "and keep your fingers crossed that they don't reflexively adopt the lowest common denominator since part of the goal of these tie-ups is to squeeze down costs and maximize efficiency."

In the short term, US Airways' merger with America West portends possible logistical problems to a combination with Delta. US Airways and America West aren't expected to be fully integrated until the second quarter of next year, says a person familiar with the process. For now, consumers remain confused about which airport kiosk to use and where to check in at the airport for a flight.

In an internal US Airways newsletter dated yesterday, a Q-and-A explaining the Delta merger proposal acknowledged the integration glitches US Airways still faces with its America West deal. One question began, "Are you guys out of your minds?"

One issue in a US Airways-Delta merger that could need immediate attention is the fate of one of the East Coast shuttle services the two airlines operate. But the sale of either of the shuttle services would likely mean little more to consumers than a change in name on a plane, industry experts say.

DOJ_NMG_0095283

Both services, Delta Shuttle and US Airways Shuttle, currently operate hourly flights on weekdays between New York and the two other Northeast corridor cities, with more infrequent shuttle flights on weekends. The services are not a huge source of profit, despite their popularity, says Mr. Boyd, the aviation-industry adviser.

It's unclear who would be interested in buying either of the shuttle services. Analysts speculated yesterday that AMR Corp.'s American Airlines, Northwest Airlines and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines would be the most likely suitors. American has tried to buy the US Airways shuttle before and runs flights along the shuttle routes on tiny regional jets. Its customers would clearly prefer an upgrade. An American spokesman declined to comment yesterday.

US Airways Bid For Delta Could Spur Consolidations (FWST)

By Trebor Banstetter

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, November 16, 2006

Imagine booking a flight on Americanorthwest Airlines, an aviation behemoth with six domestic hubs and unmatched service to Asia, Latin America and Europe.

Or flying on United-Continental Airways (or perhaps Continental United Airlines, or even UniCont Air), a powerhouse in the West and on the East Coast. And for a low-fare trip, you could check prices on FronTranBlue.

The airline industry is buzzing over those potential airline combinations and more, after US Airways sparked the latest round of merger speculation Wednesday with a hostile bid to take over the bankrupt Delta Air Lines for $8 billion in cash and stock.

The chatter sent airline stocks soaring, despite warnings from some experts that industry consolidation is likely to move slowly and that any US Airways-Delta deal faces significant challenges. Delta executives said they weren't interested, and even if creditors sign on, a merger would receive intense scrutiny from regulators and the Justice Department.

And some analysts pointed to the industry's record of failed airline mergers.

"It's a terrible idea," said consultant Mike Boyd of the Boyd Group of Evergreen, Colo. "It's a bad deal for the customers, the employees, for everybody, really, except the financial types."

Still, "investors seem to like the prospect of this deal setting off industry consolidation," airline analyst Ray Neidl of Calyon Securities noted in a report Wednesday. "We would not be surprised if other offers emerge for Delta and that an industry trend in mergers and acquisitions starts."

Shares of AMR Corp., American Airlines' parent (ticker: AMR), rose $1.65, or 5.4 percent, to $32.33 Wednesday, and Southwest Airlines' shares climbed 70 cents, or 4.6 percent, to finish at $15.94. Shares of US Airways (LCC) soared $8.57, or 16.8 percent, to close at $59.50, while Continental stock (CAL) jumped $4.72 per share, or 12.3 percent, finishing at $43.08.

Speculation has been rampant for months that the major airlines may consider mergers, particularly as Delta and Northwest Airlines restructure in bankruptcy. Most analysts say Fort Worth-based American and Dallas-based Southwest are not among the top merger candidates, because both airlines have strong finances and could weaken themselves by buying a struggling partner.

Still, if other carriers do combine, it would increase the pressure for those airlines to consider strategic partnerships, said longtime industry consultant Darryl Jenkins.

"If this happens, then the competitive landscape changes, and American will have to reassess its own plans," he said. "I don't think they want to do a merger, but they're going to be watching this."

Officials with American declined to comment on the proposed Delta merger. "We're watching it closely like everyone else," spokesman Tim Smith said.

Beth Harbin, a Southwest spokeswoman, said her airline already competes with Delta and US Airways. "We haven't heard anything today that would prompt us to change course," she said.

Bob McAdoo, an analyst with Prudential Equity Group, said a merger could be good for the industry, because it would shrink airline capacity further and increase fares.

And industry observers quickly began handicapping other possible combinations.

Analyst Susan Donofrio of Cathay Financial said American could make a good partner for Northwest, despite the two airlines having "very different management styles."

Northwest's strong Pacific presence would nicely complement American's Latin American and trans-Atlantic routes, she wrote in a note to investors. And domestically, Northwest's hubs in Minneapolis, Detroit and Memphis would "fill out" American's route network, which centers on Dallas/Fort Worth Airport, Chicago and Miami, she said.

American could get a bargain price for Northwest in bankruptcy court. "The acquisition of a bankrupt carrier remains attractive, as there exists the ability to renegotiate or break lease agreements and reduce unprofitable capacity," Donofrio said.

DOJ_NMG_0095284

Analysts also suggested that United Airlines might make a good partner for Houston-based Continental Airlines. United executives have speculated in recent months that they might be looking to merge, and there have also been reports that the company might consider going private through a leveraged buyout.

Analyst Roger King of research firm CreditSights speculated that United might make a competing bid for Delta.

"If anyone takes over Delta, bet on United," he wrote in a report. "United has the best strategic fit; the combined networks would create the best airline in the world."

Even the discount airlines are being scrutinized for possible combinations. The announcement that Frontier Airlines and AirTran Airways will share frequent-flier programs sparked some speculation that greater cooperation is in store for the two carriers.

And Donofrio suggested that JetBlue Airways might make a good match for Frontier, because both airlines have Airbus fleets and a combination would balance their route structures.

David Neeleman, JetBlue's chief executive, told Bloomberg News on Wednesday that his company has no plans to acquire or merge with another airline.

"We're not a merger candidate," he said.

Boyd, the Colorado consultant, cautioned that mergers might not be the best answer for the industry's woes. He said the smart airlines will stay on the sidelines and let competitors get distracted by time-consuming and costly acquisitions.

"What the guys at American should do is, they should help US Airways finance this deal," he said. "It would be great for American."

Boyd said Delta and US Airways would be "wallowing in the merger mud" for years, as would most other airlines that try to combine.

"It would get very, very ugly," he said.

Stuart Klaskin, an industry consultant with Klaskin, Kushner & Co. in Coral Gables, Fla., added that the antitrust concerns could overwhelm any significant combination.

"In order to get a deal like this past the regulators, you may have to lop off such a huge part of the system that you don't end up gaining anything," he said.

When Delta executives said they wanted to stay independent, "they weren't being coy," Klaskin said. "They have good reason to want to avoid this." The proposal

US Airways wants to buy Delta Air Lines out of bankruptcy for $8 billion in cash and stock. US Airways

Headquarters: Tempe, Ariz.

CEO: Doug Parker

2005 revenue: $5.1 billion

Destinations:

234 cities in 28 countries

Top cities: Charlotte, N.C.; Philadelphia; Phoenix

Daily flights: 3,846

Airplane fleet: 365

Employees: 35,000 Delta Air Lines

Headquarters: Atlanta

CEO: Gerald Grinstein

2005 revenue: $16 billion

Destinations:

292 cities in 46 countries

Top cities: Atlanta, Cincinnati, New York

Daily flights: 6,795

Airplane fleet: 625

Employees: 47,000 The speculation

Industry watchers are buzzing about other potential mergers, although nothing has been proposed and some argue that antitrust concerns could block a significant deal.

American Airlines–Northwest Airlines

The pros: These two airlines could create a powerhouse with unprecedented service to Asia, Europe and Latin America and a far-flung domestic system with six hubs: D/FW, Miami, Chicago, Detroit, Minneapolis/St. Paul and Memphis.

The cons: Their jet fleets aren't particularly compatible, and combining labor unions would be a huge obstacle. American executives might also want to avoid the distraction of merger issues as the airline works to return to consistent profitability.

DOJ_NMG_0095285

United Airlines–Continental Airlines

The pros: These airlines don't have overlapping hubs, which would reduce antitrust concerns. A merger would also combine United's strength in the eastern U.S. with Continental's in the West.

The cons: Continental, already in relatively good financial shape, might be unwilling to take on a struggling partner. And Northwest could block a deal under an option it holds with Continental.

Discount airlines

The pros: AirTran Airways and Frontier Airlines recently announced an agreement to share frequent-flier programs, which could be a prelude to a stronger partnership. And JetBlue Airways, which has a strong East Coast presence, could benefit from merging with Frontier, solid in the West.

The cons: The discount carriers are already growing fast and don't need acquisitions to expand. And their low-cost structures could be at risk from the complexities that often accompany a merger. Trebor Banstetter, 817-390-7064

tbanstetter@star-telegram.com

© 2006 Star-Telegram.com and wire service sources. All Rights Reserved.

http://www.dfw.com

Let Delta Fly Right (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

The proposed merger between US Airways and Delta is a step in the right direction for the ailing industry.

THE NATION'S airline industry has been in a gradual recovery lately. But US Airways Group Inc.'s announced bid to acquire Delta Air Lines Inc. promises to set off a needed consolidation of the business that will make it better able to weather the next financial downturn. Let's hope federal regulators don't block such a transformation this time around.

That's precisely what happened in 2001 when the Department of Justice ill-advisedly blocked the merger of US Airways and UAL Corp.'s United Airlines on antitrust grounds. The airline industry then had to confront an economic slowdown and the post-9/11 trauma with excess capacity, losing billions of dollars. Since 2002, four major U.S. airlines have sought bankruptcy protection; two (Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp.) are currently in Chapter 11.

US Airways says it will cut about 10% of the new Delta's passenger capacity if the two airlines merge (under the Delta brand), mostly from routes that have redundant service. It also could close a few expensive hubs. Between 2001 and 2004, US Airways filed for bankruptcy twice. The airline probably would have shut down completely if scrappy America West Airlines hadn't bought it in 2005. Delta says it will review US Airways' offer but will go forward with its plan to emerge from bankruptcy as a stand-alone airline.

The federal government should carefully review the deal if it goes forward, as well as any other such mergers. (Continental Airlines Inc. and Northwest have been eyeing each other for years, and United Chief Executive Glenn Tilton has been a vocal advocate of more aggressive consolidation in the industry.) Some routes will need to be dropped, some gates surrendered to competitors.

But regulators need to recognize that the industry is changing. The country needs fewer first-tier coast-to-coast airlines with a broader reach at home and abroad. The problem with some major U.S. airlines is that they are simultaneously too small and too large. Beyond these, growing low-cost carriers such as Southwest Airlines Co. and JetBlue Airways Corp. handle nearly one-third of all domestic passengers, and will have about 50% of the country's total market share in a decade.

Such nimble airlines are more capable than ever at filling niches created by the post-merger abandonment of routes by larger carriers — or by their greedy overpricing in other markets.

If Congress really wants to help consumers and shore up the financial health of airlines, it should allow the entry of foreign carriers and investors, which it has repeatedly declined to do. This is a global industry, after all.

Micron Subpoenaed In Price-fixing Probe; Two Idahoans Sue (IDAHOST)

By Ken Dey, Idaho Statesman

Idaho Statesman, November 16, 2006

Federal prosecutors have subpoenaed Micron Technology in an investigation into possible price-fixing of static random access memory, or SRAM, by semiconductor companies. This week, Micron was also named with more than 20 other semiconductor companies in a price-fixing lawsuit filed in Boise.

The lawsuit, filed Tuesday on behalf of Idaho residents Mark Alon Davis and Kenneth W. Herbert, alleges that between Jan. 1, 1998 and Dec. 31, 2005 the companies agreed to combat declines in prices for SRAM — a type of memory used in computers and electronic products — by manipulating the wholesale price. The lawsuit alleges the manipulation ultimately led to higher prices of consumer electronic products that used SRAM.

Micron confirmed in documents filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission that it received a subpoena Oct. 11 related to the investigation.

"Micron believes that it is not a target of the investigation and will fully cooperate with the Department of Justice," Micron said today in a statement to the Idaho Statesman. "Micron will vigorously defend against any civil class action cases that are filed."

The Justice Department hasn't said what period its SRAM investigation covers, but a similar department investigation of alleged dynamic random access memory, or DRAM, price fixing covered 1999 to 2002. Micron has cooperated with the Justice Department in that investigation.

SRAM is found in small quantities in personal computers. It's also used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear. Philip Gordon, the Boise lawyer representing Davis and Herbert, said his clients bought products with SRAM including printers, routers and cell phones.

Unlike DRAM, SRAM keeps its data without electrical power. DRAM is used extensively in computers. Mark DeVoss, a senior analyst with iSuppli Corp. which analyzes the semiconductor industry, said the demand for SRAM is declining because more companies are integrating the features of SRAM into the microprocessors of devices, retaining the benefits of SRAM in a smaller space.

AT&T Merger May Face Further Scrutiny (SAEN)

By Sanford Nowlin, Express-News Business Writer

San Antonio Express-News, November 16, 2006

The next chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee said San Antonio-based AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp. needs more scrutiny and should be the focus of a hearing when Democrats assume control of Congress in January.

Sen. Daniel Inouye, D-Hawaii, the incoming chairman, told reporters late Tuesday that his committee should take a look at the telecommunications megamerger. He said he would like the Federal Communications Commission to delay approval until after the hearing.

"We'd like to know what the impact would be," Inouye said. "I think the people of the United States would like to know."

The hearing will take place, a spokesperson for Inouye later said, whether or not the FCC approves the merger by the end of the year.

Investors appear to be bracing for what the congressional power shift means for AT&T.

Company shares dropped 1.52 percent to $32.46 on Wednesday on concern the new Congress will bring a less-friendly regulatory environment for the telecom giant.

The shift comes on top of investor worries that the FCC has three times delayed a vote on the deal.

"Everyone seems to think this deal will get done, but there's a new level of uncertainty," Frost Bank analyst Le Keough said.

Although the Justice Department and 18 state bodies have cleared the AT&T-BellSouth deal, it's still awaiting a nod from the FCC, the last regulatory agency needed to approve it. The commission's two Republican and two Democratic commissioners are divided over what conditions to apply to the deal.

The FCC may vote on the deal at its Dec. 14 meeting, experts said, but deliberations could continue into next year if the commission can't break its impasse.

However, the delay might not be indefinite, because FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has the option of bringing in the commission's fifth member, Republican Robert McDowell, to break a tie. McDowell has recused himself from the deliberations because he previously worked for a group that represented AT&T's competitors.

In exchange for approving its takeover of Atlanta-based BellSouth, AT&T has offered to temporarily freeze the wholesale rates it charges competitors and provide $10-a-month high-speed Internet service to customers who also take its phone service.

Competitors have argued that the company should be forced to sign off on net neutrality safeguards and to sell off some of its wireless spectrum.

"The conditions we've offered have received glowing approval from a broad range of individuals and groups, both Democratic and Republican," AT&T spokesman Mike Balmoris said.

Inouye's remarks come on top of comments last week from Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who's expected to become chairman of the House Commerce Committee. Dingell said he thinks the FCC needs to review the deal thoroughly

Although some worry Democratic pressure may slow the review, Inouye's and Dingell's recent remarks may lead the FCC's Martin to speed up deliberations so the merger can be approved before the new Congress convenes, said Jeff Gulati, a Bentley College political science professor who tracks telecom policy.

DOJ_NMG_0095287

"I think this is really (Inouye) letting the FCC know that the Democrats are relevant and that they're going to exercise some oversight responsibility on these mergers, which is something the Republicans didn't exactly do over the last several years," Gulati said.

Microsoft Still Short On Data, The EU Says (AP)

By Aoife White, THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, November 16, 2006

BRUSSELS, Belgium -- Microsoft Corp. still has not supplied the "complete and accurate" documentation necessary to comply with a 2004 antitrust order, European Union regulators said Wednesday. They warned that new fines could be imposed unless Microsoft supplies full information by Nov. 23.

The European Commission, which fined Microsoft $357 million in July for not providing the technical information, said it expects "the remaining omissions and deficiencies" to be remedied quickly.

"Our patience is finite," EU spokesman Jonathan Todd said. "Until we have the whole set of documents, it's worth nothing."

Microsoft said it already had made "very significant progress" in improving the information it has given regulators, which aims to help rivals make server software that works smoothly with its desktop operating system Windows.

"We stand ready to do any additional work that is required to comply with the commission's decision," Microsoft said.

But the EU's executive arm said that what Microsoft has done so far is not enough and that there are still problems with the technical manual that will eventually be turned over to rivals to check before Microsoft can get the all-clear.

The commission said it wants "the remaining omissions and deficiencies in the technical documentation to be remedied by Nov. 23" so that all the material will be available by the end of this month for potential licensees to review.

Regulators must then decide if Microsoft has finally obeyed its 2004 ruling that found that the company had abused its monopoly by deliberately withholding technical data from rivals.

That decision would be based on comments from potential licensees and advice from an independent trustee, computer scientist Neil Barrett, on whether that information is "operational."

"Should Microsoft continue to fail to comply, the amount of the daily penalty payment to which Microsoft could be subject would be increased from up to 2 million euros ($2.56 million) to up to 3 million euros ($3.85 million) per day with effect from July 31, 2006," the commission warned.

EU antitrust chief Neelie Kroes told the The Guardian newspaper in Britain that her patience had run out, about 3 1/2 years after Microsoft was ordered to hand over the data.

"I don't have eternal life," she said in an interview published Wednesday. "I am not impressed if someone says 90 percent of the information is already there when we need 100 percent. It's a jigsaw, and some parts are missing."

The EU fined Microsoft a record $613 million in March 2004 and told it to share interoperability information with rivals and put on sale a copy of Windows without Media Player software.

Regulators said Microsoft had committed to and missed a number of deadlines for supplying "complete and accurate specifications," the last on July 19.

Microsoft said it had responded quickly and completely to all requests and queries on the technical documentation since the July deadline.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Environmentalists Sue Bush Administration Over Global Warming Report (AP)

By Terence Chea, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

(AP) - SAN FRANCISCO-Environmentalists sued the Bush administration for failing to produce a report on global warming's impact on the United States' environment, economy and public health.

Tuesday's lawsuit seeks to compel the U.S. Climate Change Science Program to issue the national assessment, which should contain the most recent scientific data on global warming and projections for its future impacts. The plaintiffs claim the government must complete such a report every four years under the Global Change Research Act of 1990.

"Global warming is one of the most serious threats facing humanity today," according to the complaint. Without the report, decision makers and the public "are without one of the most important tools to grapple with this complex, potentially overwhelming and yet all important issue."

DOJ_NMG_0095288

The White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, which was named in the lawsuit, had not received the complaint Tuesday and could not comment on it, said spokesman Ben Fallon.

But Fallon defended the administration's record on combating global warming, pointing to increased funding for alternative energy research and partnerships with other countries.

"We feel very positive about our record on climate change," Fallon said. "The president has been focused on results-driven research and looking for practical ways to address climate change in ways that aren't damaging to the economy."

Officials at the Climate Change Science Program, also named in the complaint, did not immediately respond to calls seeking comment.

The lawsuit was filed in federal court in San Francisco by the Center for Biological Diversity, Friends of the Earth and Greenpeace.

The assessment, which plaintiffs allege was due in November 2004, is the "first step in crafting solutions to the devastating consequences of climate change if we don't act now," said Julie Teel, an attorney for the plaintiffs.

Sen. John Kerry, a Massachusetts Democrat and former presidential candidate, who has also been calling on the administration to issue the assessment, expressed support for the lawsuit.

"It's the right time to push Washington to grapple with this issue," Kerry said in a statement. "For too many years, action on global climate change has been stopped dead in its tracks by government foot-dragging, hiding information and smothering science."

Environmentalists have accused the administration of trying to suppress dissemination of the previous assessment, issued in 2000, which predicted a dramatic rise in catastrophic storms, floods, droughts and heat-related deaths.

The lawsuit comes as experts from around the world meet in Nairobi for the two-week U.N. climate conference, where they have been trying to set a course for future controls on global greenhouse gas emissions.

Scientists attribute at least some of the past century's rise in global temperatures to the accumulation in the atmosphere of carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases, byproducts of power plants, automobiles and other fossil fuel-burning sources.

On the Net:

U.S. Climate Change Science Program: http://www.climatescience.gov/

Center for Biological Diversity: http://www.biologicaldiversity.org/swcbd/programs/policy/energy/ ati onal-ass essment.html

Court Asked To Rescind EPA Decision Allowing Field Burning (AP)

By Gene Johnson, AP Legal Affairs Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

SEATTLE (AP) -- The dense plumes of smoke that arise when grass-seed farmers in Idaho burn their fields cause asthma in children, reduce visibility on highways and actually kill people, but the Environmental Protection Agency did not study those effects before changing a federal rule to allow such fires, a lawyer for a clean-air group told judges Wednesday.

"The smoke from this burning is so thick it sends people to the hospital," attorney David Baron told the three-judge panel from the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, where such cases are heard.

Baron represents Safe Air For Everyone, a Washington and Idaho clean-air group, as well as the American Lung Association, which sued late last year to undo the EPA's rule change on the grounds that the agency made the decision without first studying what the effects would be.

Kentucky bluegrass seed grown in northern Idaho is shipped across the nation to be used in landscaping and golf courses. Farmers contend they must burn the stubble left on fields to improve the production of the next year's crop and control pests. The smoke often drifts into neighboring states and Canada.

Hundreds of doctors have signed petitions seeking an end to the burning, saying their patients suffer ill effects from the dense smoke; in 2000, a coroner determined that a Rathdrum, Idaho, woman died from inhaling it. Clean-air groups argue that a 1998 decision to ban grass-field burning in Washington state has not harmed the seed industry.

The field burning has gone on for years in Idaho, where it is allowed under state law but historically not under the federal plan for Idaho established under the Clean Air Act. Last year, after health groups threatened to sue farmers for burning fields, the EPA changed the plan for Idaho, saying it had intended to allow grass-field burning all along.

The EPA insisted that the change was a simple clarification that could be made without first conducting a study.

"There was no statement in the state implementation plan that crop residue burning was allowed," said Justice Department lawyer Paul Cirino. "But everybody knew it was allowed in Idaho."

DOJ_NMG_0095289

The judges - Arthur Alarcon, Pamela Ann Rymer and Marsha Berzon - regarded that argument dubiously. They said that field burning clearly had been prohibited under the federal plan, and that the government's rule change allowing such burning was more than a "clarification."

"It says flat out that you can't have open burning, and now the agency can interpret that to mean something else?" Berzon asked Cirino.

"I'm having trouble with your use of the word 'clarification,'" Alarcon added.

Baron said after the hearing that if the EPA is forced to study the matter, it may eventually come around to banning the practice.

"We find it remarkable that the EPA would be so resistant to taking a close look at the effects of this burning, when it's making people sick, sending them to the hospital and clouding skies across Idaho," he said.

The judges will issue a ruling at a later date.

Also argued Wednesday was a tangentially related case concerning the EPA's requirements for field burning on the Coeur d'Alene Tribe's reservation in Idaho.

Some Americans Lack Food, But USDA Won't Call Them Hungry (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The U.S. government has vowed that Americans will never be hungry again. But they may experience "very low food security."

Every year, the Agriculture Department issues a report that measures Americans' access to food, and it has consistently used the word "hunger" to describe those who can least afford to put food on the table. But not this year.

Mark Nord, the lead author of the report, said "hungry" is "not a scientifically accurate term for the specific phenomenon being measured in the food security survey." Nord, a USDA sociologist, said, "We don't have a measure of that condition."

The USDA said that 12 percent of Americans -- 35 million people -- could not put food on the table at least part of last year. Eleven million of them reported going hungry at times. Beginning this year, the USDA has determined "very low food security" to be a more scientifically palatable description for that group.

The United States has set a goal of reducing the proportion of food-insecure households to 6 percent or less by 2010, or half the 1995 level, but it is proving difficult. The number of hungriest Americans has risen over the past five years. Last year, the total share of food-insecure households stood at 11 percent.

Less vexing has been the effort to fix the way hunger is described. Three years ago, the USDA asked the Committee on National Statistics of the National Academies "to ensure that the measurement methods USDA uses to assess households' access -- or lack of access -- to adequate food and the language used to describe those conditions are conceptually and operationally sound."

Among several recommendations, the panel suggested that the USDA scrap the word hunger, which "should refer to a potential consequence of food insecurity that, because of prolonged, involuntary lack of food, results in discomfort, illness, weakness, or pain that goes beyond the usual uneasy sensation."

To measure hunger, the USDA determined, the government would have to ask individual people whether "lack of eating led to these more severe conditions," as opposed to asking who can afford to keep food in the house, Nord said.

It is not likely that USDA economists will tackle measuring individual hunger. "Hunger is clearly an important issue," Nord said. "But lacking a widespread consensus on what the word 'hunger' should refer to, it's difficult for research to shed meaningful light on it."

Anti-hunger advocates say the new words sugarcoat a national shame. "The proposal to remove the word 'hunger' from our official reports is a huge disservice to the millions of Americans who struggle daily to feed themselves and their families," said David Beckmann, president of Bread for the World, an anti-hunger advocacy group. "We . . . cannot hide the reality of hunger among our citizens."

In assembling its report, the USDA divides Americans into groups with "food security" and those with "food insecurity," who cannot always afford to keep food on the table. Under the old lexicon, that group -- 11 percent of American households last year -- was categorized into "food insecurity without hunger," meaning people who ate, though sometimes not well, and "food insecurity with hunger," for those who sometimes had no food.

That last group now forms the category "very low food security," described as experiencing "multiple indications of disrupted eating patterns and reduced food intake." Slightly better-off people who aren't always sure where their next meal is coming from are labeled "low food security."

DOJ_NMG_0095290

That 35 million people in this wealthy nation feel insecure about their next meal can be hard to believe, even in the highest circles. In 1999, Texas Gov. George W. Bush, then running for president, said he thought the annual USDA report -- which consistently finds his home state one of the hungriest in the nation -- was fabricated.

"I'm sure there are some people in my state who are hungry," Bush said. "I don't believe 5 percent are hungry."

Bush said he believed that the statistics were aimed at his candidacy. "Yeah, I'm surprised a report floats out of Washington when I'm running a presidential campaign," he said.

The agency usually releases the report in the fall, for reasons that "have nothing to do with politics," Nord said.

This year, when the report failed to appear in October as it usually does, Democrats accused the Bush administration of delaying its release until after the midterm elections. Nord denied the contention, saying, "This is a schedule that was set several months ago."

Isleta Settlement Gets Approval From Senate (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

ALBUQUERQUE (AP) - The Senate has passed a $40 million settlement negotiated by Isleta Pueblo and the federal government over past mismanagement of tribal land.

The measure, unanimously approved by the Senate on Monday, now heads to President Bush for his consideration.

The pueblo sued the government, seeking compensation for damages to its land south of Albuquerque. The pueblo, the Interior Department and the U.S. Justice Department spent years reviewing the claims and reached agreement in June on how to resolve the matter.

The legislation establishes a natural resources fund of more than $32 million for the pueblo to use to restore agricultural, range and forestry property. The measure also authorizes $7.2 million, but that money is subject to administration budgeting and the federal appropriations process.

Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation said the legislation, once signed by the president, will allow Isleta Pueblo to improve drainage on its agricultural lands and rehabilitate lands damaged by trespass grazing and excessive logging.

"The pueblo deserves this compensation and the president's signature on this bill will allow that to happen," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M.

Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., added that restoring tribal lands will help create new economic opportunities for Isleta Pueblo.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mob Reappears In Court (PHI)

By Kitty Caparella

The Philadelphia Inquirer, November 16, 2006

"The mob is back and there's gonna be trouble,

"Hey la day la, da mob is back."

- Sung to the tune of the

Angels'"My Boyfriend's Back."

Now, after a four-year rebuilding phase in Philadelphia and South Jersey, organized crime is making a comeback in federal court.

Today, reputed mob soldier Damion Canalichio, 37, once a top aide to jailed mob underboss Steve Mazzone, will seek bail on federal drug-trafficking charges, according to his attorney Joseph Santaguida.

Canalichio, who served 27 months for a 1997 drug conviction, and his sidekick, Christopher Cerr, 36, of Glenolden, were arrested yesterday without incident by FBI agents in South Jersey and in Delaware County.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Frank Labor said a seven-count indictment was unsealed, charging the pair with selling more than 300 grams of cocaine for a total of $9,200 in June 2004.

During a one-month investigation by FBI agent John Augustine, the two allegedly sold the cocaine on June 2, 10, and 24 in 2004 at the corner of Snyder Avenue and Hicks Street - across from the Melrose Diner - in South Philadelphia, according to the indictment.

They are charged with three counts of drug distribution, drug distribution within 1,000 feet of a school - South Philadelphia High - and conspiracy. The government also is seeking to confiscate Cerr's 2004 Ford Explorer. Cerr is represented by attorney Carina Laguzzi.

DOJ_NMG_0095291

Labor would not comment on why it took 29 months to indict the pair. However, sources say, the feds have ongoing investigations into mob activities, particularly sports gambling.

The street sales - a drop in mob status for Canalichio - allegedly took place a block from where mob associate Frank Baldino was killed during the bloody 1993 mob war between the John Stanfa crime family and a rival faction headed by Joseph "Skinny Joey" Merlino, who later became boss.

Stanfa and Merlino were convicted in racketeering trials. Stanfa, 65, is serving five consecutive life terms, and Merlino, 44, is due to be released in 2011 after serving a 14-year term.

· Meanwhile in New Jersey, reputed mob soldier and convicted extortionist Vincent Filipelli, 53, was arrested on Oct. 24 on a one-count indictment charging him with extortion in connection with running an illegal sports gambling operation.

During a 14-month joint FBI-New Jersey State Police investigation, Filipelli, who competed in professional bodybuilding contests before becoming a mob enforcer, allegedly threatened to put an undercover trooper, who "owed" a gambling debt, in the hospital.

Filipelli, of Cherry Hill, is being held without bail in the Federal Detention Center at 7th and Arch streets, where Canalichio and Cerr are in custody.

· And in upstate Pennsylvania, one of the Philly mob's biggest supporters, William "Billy" D'Elia, reputed crime boss of Northeastern Pennsylvania, was charged on Nov. 1 in an 18-count federal indictment on charges of laundering hundreds of thousands of dollars in drug proceeds via banks in the Dominican Republic from 1999 to 2006.

He faces a maximum of 245 years in prison, forfeiture of $565,000 and a $4 million fine if convicted of multiple counts of money laundering, interstate transportation of laundered money, solicitation of murder, perjury, witness tampering, obstruction of justice, conspiracy and contempt of court.

U.S. Charges Detroit Man In Fentanyl Deaths (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

DETROIT -- Federal prosecutors charged a Detroit man with causing the deaths of two people by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl, a combination blamed in the deaths of more than 100 drug users in southeast Michigan over the past year.

James E. Coleman, 36, was arraigned Wednesday in U.S. District Court on two counts of delivery of a controlled substance resulting in death. Coleman has been in custody since June, when he was charged with drug possession in the case.

Coleman is charged in the deaths of Lauren Jolly, 17, of Oakland County's Bloomfield Township, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights.

Jolly snorted a combination of heroin and fentanyl on May 24 in a Detroit drug house. Authorities said Coleman's brother, Donald Cunningham, placed Jolly in a bathtub full of ice in an attempt to revive her, but did not seek medical treatment. Another drug customer took Jolly to a hospital, where the high school junior was pronounced dead.

McElmurry died in June.

Coleman did not know the drugs contained fentanyl and did not intend to kill anyone, defense attorney Warren Harris said.

The charge carries a 20-year minimum prison sentence and a maximum of life in prison.

Jolly told police about the drug house six weeks before her death, when she was arrested in connection with having heroin mixed with fentanyl. Her information helped police obtain search warrants that led to a raid and Cunningham's arrest.

Cunningham, 27, is in state prison on a parole violation. There are no plans to charge him under federal law, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Wednesday.

Feds Charge Suspect In Fentanyl Deaths (DN)

Detroit News, November 15, 2006

Federal officials today charged an accused heroin dealer with causing the deaths of two drug users by giving them heroin laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

They are the first such state or federal charges in connection with the street sale of fentanyl-laced heroin in the Detroit area in 2005-06, which killed an estimated 133 drug users between September and July.

James Edgar Coleman, 36, of Detroit, was arraigned today and is expected to plead guilty in U.S. District Court in Detroit Thursday to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death, Coleman's lawyer Warren Harris of Southfield said.

The charges each carry a 20-year minimum prison sentence and a maximum of life in prison.

Coleman is charged in connection with the deaths of Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student who died in April, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, who died May 26.

DOJ_NMG_0095292

Harris said Coleman did not know the drugs contained fentanyl and he did not intend to kill anyone.

Coleman has been in custody since June on charges of distributing heroin and cocaine.

Notes: U.S. Rules Won't Be Party To Bode-type Behavior (USAT)

By Vicki Michaelis, Usa Today

USA Today, November 16, 2006

With the memory still fresh of U.S. skier Bode Miller making more headlines for what he did at the bars than on the slopes at the 2006 Winter Olympics in Italy, the U.S. Ski and Snowboard Association has instituted new policies.

USSA staff and athletes no longer are allowed to drink alcohol together. No alcohol consumption is allowed at team hotels. And during official training camps and competitions, all athletes are required to stay in team hotels.

"We'd be naive to say that it wasn't" at least partly a response to what happened at the Olympics, USSA spokesman Tom Kelly said.

Miller, the 2005 overall World Cup champion, was photographed partying with a Playboy Playmate during the Olympics and told reporters after not medaling: "It's been an awesome two weeks. I got to party and socialize at an Olympic level."

U.S. aerials skier Jeret Peterson was sent home after fighting with a friend following a night of partying.

During the Games, Miller and U.S. teammates Daron Rahlves and Julia Mancuso stayed in their own RVs. This season, U.S. skiers can use their RVs between competitions, but the athletes will be with the team during competitions, subject to the stricter alcohol guidelines.

"We just want to have a more professional approach and create more of a performance environment when we're on the road," Kelly said.

BALCO charges

Trevor Graham, who triggered the BALCO steroid scandal, is expected to appear in federal court Thursday in San Francisco for his arraignment on a three-count indictment.

Graham, a high-profile coach whose track athletes have accumulated medals as well as drug positives, is accused of lying to federal investigators three times in BALCO inquiries. He faces maximum penalties of five years in prison and a fine of $250,000 on each count.

According to the Nov. 2 indictment, Raleigh, N.C.-based Graham was interviewed by federal investigators in June 2004, a year after Graham anonymously sent a vial of a designer steroid to the U.S. Anti-Doping Agency. Graham, who later acknowledged sending the vial, told USADA the steroid had been given to athletes by Victor Conte, founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-operative.

The indictment alleges Graham told the agents that he never referred his athletes to someone referred to as Source A to obtain banned performance-enhancing drugs. The indictment alleges Source A provided drugs to Graham and his athletes.

The second count contends Graham lied by stating he never met Source A in person when they had several meetings. The third count alleges Graham told agents he last contacted Source A in 1997 despite having numerous contacts from 1997 through 2004.

Angel Heredia told a grand jury he supplied steroids, human growth hormone and EPO to Graham from 1996 through 2000 before a financial dispute ended their relationship, according to The New York Times and San Francisco Chronicle.

Landis and the lab

Embattled Tour de France champion Floyd Landis is basing his defense against doping charges on mismanagement in the French laboratory that processed his urine samples at the 2006 Tour. Wednesday, the director of the International Olympic Committee-accredited lab admitted that some "insignificant" numbers were in error but had no bearing on the legitimacy of the tests, which showed Landis' testosterone-to-epitestosterone ratios to be out of kilter after the Tour's 17th stage.

A February date is expected for the Landis USADA hearing, but no matter what the result is, the case will be sent to the Court for Arbitration in Sport for final appeal. Landis could receive a two-year suspension if found guilty.

Contributing: Dick Patrick, Sal Ruibal

Bikers Sentenced For Meth-making (AP)

AP, November 16, 2006

Authorities say the illegal activity relatively new in Detroit area.

DETROIT (AP) -- Several people affiliated with a biker gang will face prison time for a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

Prosecutors describe it as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. Seven individuals from the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months.

DOJ_NMG_0095293

"We're pleased because it just goes to show that methamphetamine is relatively new to this area, and we don't see meth a whole lot," Assistant U.S. Attorney Matthew Schneider told the Detroit Free Press. "But I think that what this shows is when we see it, we're going to take action."

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced the final defendant, Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Algonac, Mich., on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth.

Prosecutors said members who were convicted and sentenced earlier this year are: Michael Mastromatteo, 48, of Mount Clemens, Mich., and Gregory Schoeninger, 45, of Algonac. Their convicted associates, who also were sentenced in September and October, are: Demetrius Meffer, 38, of Chesterfield Township; Joseph Rottman, 43, of Macomb Township; Tami Watters, 41, of Gaylord; and Drago Stajninger, 41, of Chesterfield Township.

The Schoeningers are married.

In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, Algonac and Chesterfield Township revealed labs had been relocated frequently.

Meth Makers Get Prison (FREEP)

By Christy Arboscello, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, November 15, 2006

Biker gang allies ran operations in Macomb, St. Clair

Two members and five associates of the oddly-named Devils' Diciples biker gang will face prison time for their involvement in a methamphetamine-making operation in Macomb and St. Clair counties, the U.S. Attorney's Office said Monday.

In what prosecutors called the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit, the individuals will serve sentences ranging from 30 to 97 months.

"We're pleased because it just goes to show that methamphetamine is relatively new to this area and we don't see meth a whole lot. But I think that what this shows is when we see it, we're going to take action," said U.S. Attorney Matthew Schneider, who worked on the case.

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced the final defendant, Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Algonac, on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth.

According to the U.S. Attorney's Office, the biker gang members who were convicted and sentenced earlier this year are: Michael (Iron Mike) Mastromatteo, 48, of Mt. Clemens and Gregory (Breakdown) Schoeninger, 45, of Algonac. Their convicted associates, who were also sentenced in September and October, are: Demetrius (Demi) Meffer, 38, of Chesterfield Township; Joseph Rottman, 43, of Macomb Township; Tami Watters, 41, of Gaylord; and Drago Stajninger, 41, of Chesterfield Township.

Gregory Schoeninger and Patricia Schoeninger are married. In March 2005, the FBI, Michigan State Police and the County of Macomb Enforcement Team conducted extensive raids at several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mt. Clemens. Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, Algonac and Chesterfield Township revealed labs had been relocated frequently to avoid detection.

Police: Meth Crisis Minimized In Area (PHTH)

By Molly Montag

Port Huron (MI) Times-Herald, November 16, 2006

Crack remains local illegal drug of choice

Despite two Clay Township men's involvement in a large methamphetamine ring, narcotics agents said crack cocaine still is the leading problem drug locally.

U.S. District Judge Marianne O. Battani sentenced Patricia Schoeninger, 44, of Clay Township on Monday to 30 months in prison followed by four years of supervised release. Schoeninger pleaded guilty in June to one count of conspiracy to manufacture meth. Her husband, Gregory Schoeninger, 45, was convicted earlier this year.

Prosecutors describe the case, which involved members of the Devils' Disciples motorcycle gang, as the first major meth case in U.S. District Court in Detroit. In March 2005, law enforcement agencies raided several locations, including the bikers' clubhouse in Mount Clemens.

Authorities also discovered working meth labs in Harrison and Macomb townships. Evidence from other searches in New Haven, the Algonac area and Chesterfield Township revealed labs frequently had been relocated.

DOJ_NMG_0095294

St. Clair County sheriff Lt. Tim Donnellon, who assisted with the investigation, said methamphetamine hasn't become the local epidemic authorities once feared it would.

"The meth hasn't really taken hold, and it hasn't been able to displace crack because of the Detroit influence," he said.

Algonac Police Chief Richard Torongeau said he hasn't noticed an increase in meth activity downriver. Algonac is bordered by Clay Township, where the Schoeningers live.

"I'm sure it's here, but we haven't seen a whole lot of it," Torongeau said.

Sanilac County hasn't had a criminal case involving meth in the past two years, said Bill Gray, director of the county's drug task force.

Cocaine use, however, seems to be on the rise, Gray said.

"It is one of the great mysteries of the last decade why methamphetamine is not in the Thumb area the way it is in (other parts of) Michigan or the Midwest," Gray said.

Contact Molly Montag at (810) 989-6275 or mmontag@gannett.com

Livermore Seeks Permanent Ban On Marijuana Dispensaries (TH)

By Brian Foley

TriValley Herald, November 15, 2006

LIVERMORE - City officials are moving forward with plans to permanently ban medical marijuana dispensaries.

An existing moratorium is scheduled to expire Sept. 11, 2007 after the council voted to extend it two months ago. City officials say that the City Council didn't want to wait until the last minute to make a permanent decision.

"We ran the course on investigating and researching and reached a critical point where we were able to come up with a recommendation for the council," said city attorney John Pomidor. "The council didn't want us taking it to the last moment."

On Monday, the council voted 4-1 to instruct its staff to draft an ordinance.

"We've done extensive research," said City Manager Linda Barton. "We were unable to find a model or an example of a successful operation that didn't deal with secondary impacts."

Those secondary impacts include a reputation that dispensaries draw crime. On top of that, a problem looms for cities because of disparities between state and federal laws. While Proposition 215 legalized marijuana for medicinal purposes at the state level, the federal government regards the drug as illegal.

Councilman Tom Reitter, the dissenting vote, favored communicating with the city of Oakland and its dispensary operators before making a permanent decision.

On Monday, a handful of opponents urged the council to show restraint, reminding them that with Congress shifting to Democratic control that federal marijuana laws might change.

An Oakland attorney, James Anthony, lambasted the city staff's report on the subject that heavily relied on past negative incidents with dispensaries. Anthony called the report "a hatchet job" that ignored positive aspects. He pointed to Oakland, which regulates, permits and oversees four successful dispensaries.

"(The staff report) was very one-sided," he said. "It consisted of cut-and-paste horror stories associated with unregulated dispensaries."

Barbara Killey, an Oakland administrative hearing officer, confirmed that Oakland police has "had almost zero problems with dispensaries." She said Livermore officials have not contacted her.

Livermore resident Michael Ferrucci, a medical marijuana patient, hopes for a strong turnout when the City Council formally votes on an ordinance. He said Tri-Valley residents who are sick shouldn't have to drive to Oakland and Hayward for medicine.

"I want to invite the public -- cancer patients, M.S. patients, pain patients -- to show up and have their eyes on the council as they take their medicine away," he said.

Pomidor expects the city staff to present an ordinance to the council in January.

In June, Dublin formally banned dispensaries and in July, Pleasanton extended its year-long moratorium.

Gardena Joins Bans On Medical Marijuana Outlets (TDB)

By Gene Maddaus, Daily Breeze

Torrance (CA) Daily Breeze, November 16, 2006

Moratorium for 45 days will allow staff time to come up with permanent regulations.

Weeks after ordering two medical marijuana dispensaries to close, the Gardena City Council imposed a moratorium on such facilities Tuesday night.

Both dispensaries are still fighting City Hall. California Caregivers' Association, on Vermont Avenue, has closed, but its owner has sued the city in an effort to reopen next year.

DOJ_NMG_0095295

The other dispensary, Nature's Holistic Caregivers on Crenshaw Boulevard, remains open in defiance of the City Council, which revoked its business license last month.

The council passed the 45-day moratorium with little fanfare on Tuesday night. The temporary ban will give the city's planning staffers time to draft permanent regulations.

Allison Margolin, the attorney for Nature's Holistic Caregivers, argued that it is against the law for the city to forbid marijuana dispensaries from doing business.

"It's illegal and it's a moral crime," she said. "What this would do is put marijuana back on the streets." Though California voters legalized medical marijuana a decade ago, it remains a controlled substance under federal law. As marijuana dispensaries have spread statewide, cities have struggled with the question of how best to regulate them. Several South Bay cities, including Lawndale, Torrance, Hawthorne, Redondo Beach, and Rancho Palos Verdes, have instituted bans similar to the one the Gardena council passed Tuesday night.

Councilman Steve Bradford, who was the lone supporter of the dispensaries last month, dissented from the majority again, as the council voted 4-1 to enact the moratorium.

Virgil Grant, the owner of Nature's Holistic Caregivers, presented 500 signatures from Gardena residents supporting his dispensary.

In an interview, Councilman Oscar Medrano cited concerns that the federal government could withdraw grants if the city allows marijuana dispensaries to operate.

"I will not allow moneys to be taken away from our seniors, our kids, our Meals on Wheels programs," Medrano said. "These are essential programs that are needed to keep the kids off the street." Medrano said he sympathized with medical marijuana patients, but was concerned that marijuana dispensaries are unregulated.

"Let's let a doctor prescribe it in the hospital," he said. "Let it be given in the right way, not in a store where you can walk in off the street."

Mexican Cartels Expand Meth Dealing In U.S. (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, November 15, 2006

Mexican drug-trafficking cartels have moved in to fill the void left by the successful crackdown on small methamphetamine labs across the United States, and the foreign traffickers have brought the highly addictive drug into parts of the country where it was rarely seen before, according to a new report by the National Drug Intelligence Center.

According to Health and Human Services data, drug use is down over the last four years, but a new report says that Mexican drug trafficking organizations, or DTOs, have gained strength in the United States and that heroin usage has increased among some drug addicts.

DEA officials believe that five main Mexican drug cartels have increased operations in the United States.

Mexican drug-trafficking organizations have "gained considerable strength and greatly expanded their presence in drug markets throughout the country, even in many smaller communities in Midwestern and Eastern states," said the report, which was released today.

Because the ingredients for making meth were easily obtainable, small makeshift meth labs sprang up across the country, feeding much of the surge in meth use since the early 1990s. But when states started passing laws limiting access to some of the key ingredients, such as pseudoephedrine, many of those mom-and-pop labs closed.

The federal government followed suit when Congress tacked a meth provision onto the reauthorization of the USA Patriot Act that limits the amount of pseudoephedrine people can buy at pharmacies.

According to the DEA, since 2004 there have been fewer U.S.-based labs, judging from the DEA's seizure data.

"We've had a significant reduction in domestic labs, with Mexican DTOs filling the void," one DEA official, who requested anonymity, told ABC News.

The spread of methamphetamine can be seen in cities such as Atlanta, which has had several high-yield busts in recent months. In August, the U.S. Attorney's Office in Atlanta announced the largest meth seizure in Georgia's history, which removed as much as $50 million worth of meth from the streets.

The Mexican cartels were behind the deals, and the DEA believes they have been trying to use Atlanta as a hub for trafficking.

"We've never seen meth on the eastern seaboard … in those quantities," the DEA official said.

National Drug Intelligence Center spokesman Charles Miller said the Mexican drug-trafficking networks have been able to gain influence for several reasons, including their access to the precursor chemicals needed to make high-quality methamphetamine.

DOJ_NMG_0095296

Many of these chemicals, including large quantities of the cold medicine pseudoephedrine, come from Asia.

According to the National Drug Intelligence Center, the Mexican groups have been able to use their traditional trafficking networks for cocaine and marijuana to distribute the methamphetamine, which is made in so-called superlabs — large production facilities in Mexico.

DEA officials said they have seen evidence of the Mexican groups increasing their activity in meth distribution, with increased meth seizures at the southern border.

In 2004, DEA data showed that 2,420 kilos of meth where seized at the southern U.S. border. In 2005, seizures had increased to 2,750 kilos.

Although casual use of methamphetamine appears to be stable, the report said there is an increase in the number of meth-related treatment admissions and methamphetamine-dependent individuals nationwide. In 2004, 129,079 were admitted to treatment facilities for meth treatment, compared with 82,113 in 2001.

Meth is not the only area in which the Mexican groups have increased the business opportunities.

The threat assessment notes that the Mexican groups have the "ability to advance Mexican heroin beyond traditional Western state heroin markets."

The report said this "presents new challenges to law enforcement as more groups make the drug consistently available to individuals even in smaller, more rural Eastern communities."

The assessment also found that heroin use has increased among some drug addicts who abuse prescription painkillers. The report found that prescription narcotic abusers have switched to heroin.

"Law enforcement reporting indicates that abusers of pharmaceutical opioids, primarily OxyContin and methadone, but other drugs as well, have switched and continue to switch to heroin, particularly when heroin is more available and cheaper," according to the report.

The report said this trend has been seen in California, Florida, Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin.

To combat the influence of the Mexican networks, the DEA has engaged in a series of training programs with Mexican law enforcement agencies to try to dismantle their networks.

Meth, Ecstacy, Heroin Readily Available (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, November 16, 2006

Larger amounts of drugs are coming into the United States from Mexico, Columbia and Asia, the National Drug Intelligence Center said.

In its 2007 drug threat assessment, the center said organizations producing ice methamphetamine in Mexico have expanded their presence throughout the United States. The center, which is part of the Department of Justice, said the presence of Mexican traffickers in U.S. drug markets has allowed the introduction of Mexican black tar and brown powder heroin into Southeastern and Midwestern states.

Cocaine availability and use in the United States have not significantly changed, but Ecstasy availability and distribution have increased significantly, the center reported.

Asian gangs based in Canada contributed to increases in potency and distribution of marijuana throughout the United States.

Rates of prescription drug abuse top those of other drugs, except marijuana, but the center said law enforcement agencies have had recent success in reducing illegal use of prescription drugs. However, that has caused some addicts to substitute drugs such as heroin for prescription narcotics.

Most Mexican and Colombian traffickers consolidated their money into large bulk cash shipments, smuggling them into Mexico, the report said. U.S. law enforcement efforts have made it more difficult to launder money in U.S. financial institutions.

Canada-based Drug Traffickers Peddling More Ecstasy In U.S., Says Report (CP)

Canadian Press, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON (CP) - Asian drug traffickers based in Canada have gained control over most of the ecstasy distribution in the United States and expanded their reach, said an American drug report released Wednesday.

The National Drug Threat Assessment by the U.S. Justice Department also said the production of high-potency marijuana in Canada is a problem, although marijuana use has declined slightly.

The strength of seized marijuana samples has more than doubled from 2000 through 2005, says the drug threat report, which is published annually.

High potency production has increased at indoor and outdoor sites in the United States, said the report, and outdoor plants in central California are growing a product comparable in quality to Canada's B.C. Bud.

DOJ_NMG_0095297

There's also more smuggling of strong weed into the country by Canada-based Asian groups.

Since 2004, cross-border ecstasy trafficking has increased significantly, with Canada-based operations expanding distribution to most U.S. states.

Distribution is now at a level similar to that of 2001, when availability peaked under the control of Israeli traffickers who have mostly been broken up by U.S. police operations.

Israeli groups smuggled ecstasy into East Coast cities almost exclusively through couriers on commercial flights from Europe.

Traffickers in Canada, said the report, use private and commercial vehicles crossing the border.

U.S. Officials Troubled By Expansion Of Asian-Canadian Drug Gangs (GM)

Globe and Mail, November 16, 2006

Canadian-based Asian crime syndicates have become the No. 1 distributors of ecstasy in the United States, according to a new report released yesterday.

The business of Vietnamese and other Asian gangs, who started out by growing the popular form of marijuana known as B.C. Bud, has boomed, according to the U.S. Department of Justice. The agency's national drug intelligence centre says the groups have diversified their product lines and set up U.S. franchises, grabbing a significant share of the multibillion-dollar U.S. drug market.

"Canadian-based Asian DTOs [drug-trafficking organizations] have recently gained control over most MDMA [ecstasy] distribution in the United States," states the centre's annual threat assessment, released yesterday.

It adds that in the United States "an estimated $5.2-billion (U.S.) to $21.2-billion is generated through the wholesale distribution of marijuana and MDMA by Canada-based DTOs, and much of the illegal drug proceeds are transported in bulk" back to Canada.

(The figures were achieved by multiplying the estimates of Canadian-produced drugs available in the United States by their estimated wholesale value; comparable estimates arose a few years ago, when Forbes Magazine put the value of B.C.'s marijuana crop alone at up to $7-billion.)

Figures as high as this would suggest that Canada's illegal drug business with the United States could rival the overall value of Canada's legitimate exports, such as wheat ($2.7-billion Canadian) or even lumber and sawmill products ($18.9-billion). Yet one statistician who examined the U.S. study said comparisons should be made cautiously.

"Using the $20-billion figure is an overstatement . . . it's way, way too high," said Philip Cross, an analyst at Statistics Canada. While the government agency doesn't track illegal drug activity, he looked at the U.S. study's methodology, and said that lower ranges of the estimate are far more likely.

Whatever the dollar amount, the drug business would appear to be as brisk as ever. Mexican drug networks remain, by far, the biggest problem in the United States. But Canadian gangs are also carving out territory in their niches.

Since marijuana grow-operations began spreading eastward from British Columbia in the late 1990s, Canadian police have warned the activity would lead to increasingly entrenched criminal networks dealing not just in pot, but also in chemical drugs, like methylenedioxy-methylampheta-mine (MDMA), the club-drug known as ecstasy.

The United States says it is now picking up precisely this sort of activity. South of the border, police say they dismantled Israeli-based organizations importing the club drugs, only to see Asian gangs from Canada fill the vacuum. The problem, as stated in the threat assessment released yesterday, is that the new gangs appear stronger and more impenetrable, largely because of the difficulty in gaining informants in tightly knit ethnically homogeneous groups.

Syndicates still ship synthetic drugs such as ecstasy from overseas, but increasingly they produce them on the continent. "Canada-based Asian criminal groups most often smuggle the drug into the United States via private and commercial vehicles over the Canada-U.S. border," the report says. "Almost all of the MDMA smuggled into the United States from Canada is produced in Canada."

Ecstasy may be a growth industry, but these gangs have never abandoned their core product. "High-potency marijuana production, smuggling and distribution by Canada-based Asian DTOs, primarily of Vietnamese ethnicity, is increasing," the report says.

Fugitives Answer Call To Surrender (USAT)

By Dennis Wagner And Lindsey Collom

USA Today, November 16, 2006

PHOENIX — Sean White, wanted on criminal warrants for a probation violation and failure to appear in court, went to church Wednesday morning to get right with the law.

DOJ_NMG_0095298

The 32-year-old man was among the 120 suspects who turned themselves in during the first four hours of Fugitive Safe Surrender.

The program, which ends Saturday, basically is an invitation from federal and state authorities who are telling fugitives they might receive "favorable consideration" by turning themselves in at a makeshift justice center at Pilgrim Rest Baptist Church.

Doug Weiner, a former Cuyahoga County, Ohio, prosecutor and co-founder of Fugitive Safe Surrender, said the long-term goal is to conduct programs nationwide. Plans already are underway for ones in Indianapolis; Rochester, N.Y.; Akron, Ohio; and Richmond, Va.

David Gonzales, U.S. Marshal for Arizona, said the program gives suspects a chance to deal with criminal warrants at a neutral site, which cuts costs for the public and reduces the chance of a dangerous situation for law officers.

Defendants who show up at the Phoenix church find public defenders to represent them and judges to conduct hearings. Often, when fugitives are caught in traffic stops or tracked down by agents, they face the humiliation of being handcuffed in front of family and the hassle of going straight to jail.

Under Safe Surrender, Gonzales said, most of those wanted for non-violent offenses will be processed within hours and released without going behind bars. The fugitives who turned themselves in Wednesday morning were suspects in cases involving drunken driving, disorderly conduct and failure to pay fines.

A federal Office of Justice Programs grant for $600,000 is financing the development of Fugitive Safe Surrender. The grant is being supplemented with money, manpower and equipment from state and local agencies. Gonzales said he expects the effort in Phoenix to cost about $75,000.

"We think it's a win-win situation for the community," Gonzales said.

The Safe Surrender concept was first tried 13 months ago in Cleveland. Over a four-day period, more than 840 people visited a church to resolve criminal warrants. Although most were wanted for non-violent misdemeanors, the lineup included 324 felony suspects, with "some wanted for rape, robbery, assault and drug offenses," said Peter Elliott, the U.S. Attorney for northern Ohio.

Elliott said he hit upon the idea for Safe Surrender last year. He said he realized suspects might turn themselves in if they could do so safely, and he figured churches would be good safe havens.

When the suspects in Cleveland were asked why they surrendered, Gonzales said, "The overwhelming response was they were tired of running. … It's stressful."

Sean White had been on the run since 2002, when he walked away from a work-release program. At the time, White was 20 days into a 40-day DUI sentence at a Maricopa County jail. It was the wrong decision, he said, and life hasn't been easy since.

White lost a construction job because his driver's license was suspended, he said, and lack of income led his family of five to move from a three-bedroom home to a pay-by-week hotel.

Even more, he said, the main motivation for surrendering is to help solve his half brother's murder. Robert Dickey, 40, was driving to work when someone he stopped to help along the roadway fatally stabbed him in June 2005, White said. He said he hasn't been involved for fear of arrest.

"It's pretty much weighed me down every single day," White said. "Whatever I have to serve, pay, I want to get it over with so I can get on with my life."

In Maricopa County, where there are about 70,000 criminal warrants waiting to be served, according to Gonzales and county law enforcement, the operation was preceded by a media blitz featuring newspaper ads, church fliers and public service announcements on radio and television. In the days leading up to the roundup, Gonzales said, the marshals' phone line was "ringing off the hook" with calls from fugitives wanting details.

Gonzales, along with Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio and Attorney Andrew Thomas, stressed that defendants are not being offered amnesty — only a promise that prosecutors will consider the voluntary surrender.

White said he believes that turning himself in helped his case: He was free to leave after the proceedings. A county commissioner at the church quashed one of his warrants; the other will be addressed in a municipal court.

On Wednesday, Gonzales said he was surprised by the turnout so early in the program. "I thought it would start off slow and build up. This is good," he said. "It just shows the desperation."

Despite the program's initial success in Ohio, there have been problems. In Albuquerque, authorities abandoned plans because they lacked resources. And a surrender program in Camden, N.J., was canceled after the state Supreme Court balked because of concerns about mixing church and state.

Elliott and Gonzales said that while ministers support the program and churches provide a venue, Fugitive Safe Surrender doesn't involve preaching or proselytizing.

DOJ_NMG_0095299

"This is all about trust," Elliott said. "It's not a faith-based program. It is a law enforcement program that is faith-based in nature."

IMMIGRATION:

29 Immigrants Arrested For Visa Fraud (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, November 16, 2006

Federal agents on Wednesday arrested 29 people, mostly Pakistanis, who allegedly posed as Muslim religious workers to obtain special visas to enter the USA.

The immigrants, arrested in Boston; New York City; Buffalo; Hartford, Conn.; Atlanta; St. Paul; Newark, N.J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D.C., and Harrisburg, Va., face civil immigration charges and could be deported if they are found to have violated federal law, said Marc Raimondi, spokesman for Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). Agents involved in the investigation also arrested eight people on other immigration charges, he said.

The arrests were part of a probe into several organizations that posed as legitimate religious groups and filed false visa applications for the immigrants under the religious worker program, ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said.

The immigrants paid fees, sometimes several thousand dollars, for the fraudulent paperwork, Boyd said. He said he could not release the groups' names because the investigation was continuing.

The religious worker program allows churches, synagogues, mosques, temples and other religious organizations in the USA to sponsor visa applications for immigrants with specific religious training and experience. The visas allow a legal visitor to work only in a religion-related job for a limited time, generally no more than three years.

The immigrants arrested Wednesday worked at non-religious jobs, Raimondi said. Among them: gas station attendant, truck driver and factory worker.

"If these allegations are true, it is sad to see people misuse the religious-worker visa program in an attempt to gain fraudulent immigration status in the United States," said Arsalan Iftikhar, national legal director for the Council on American-Islamic Relations. "In a time where increased dialogue is needed between people of all faiths, it is imperative that initiatives like the religious-worker visa program continue to bring credible religious workers of all faiths to America."

As Congress has wrestled with immigration policy since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, ICE has increased enforcement efforts against document fraud, fugitive aliens convicted of violent crimes and workplaces that employ illegal workers.

In a report released in July, the U.S. Bureau of Citizenship and Immigration Services said the religious-worker classification was "historically considered to have a high fraud rate."

The agency said it examined a sample of religious-worker immigration petitions submitted over a six-month period and found fraud in one-third of the cases.

DHS Watchdog Warns 'Fence' Cost Will Grow (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration's proposal to secure the nation's borders with a high-tech "virtual fence" is likely to cost far more than the $2 billion that industry analysts initially estimated, possibly up to $30 billion, a government watchdog agency warned yesterday.

According to the Homeland Security Department inspector general, the ambitious plan to deploy sensors, cameras and other surveillance technology along 6,000 miles of the borders with Canada and Mexico runs the risk of runaway costs because of poorly defined objectives and a vastly overstretched contracting staff at the department.

The dramatically higher estimates, delivered to House members by Inspector General Richard L. Skinner, injected a new dose of skepticism into the national debate to curb illegal immigration, which has focused in large part on gaining control of the borders.

Critics have charged that a Republican-led Congress and President Bush approved legislation with much fanfare this fall authorizing the construction of a 700-mile fence along a third of the Mexican frontier without funding the work.

Now, the feasibility of the Bush administration's preferred plan, to which Congress has dedicated $1.2 billion and which is beginning on a pilot basis along a 28-mile stretch south of Tucson, drew fresh doubts from Congress as it moves into Democratic control.

DOJ_NMG_0095300

Immigration-policy experts said the red flags raised over the border-security initiative could increase pressure on Congress to act on other measures they say are needed, such as stepping up enforcement against U.S. employers who hire illegal workers, cracking down on immigrants who overstay their visas, and overhauling legal immigration channels.

"If it's going to cost 8 to 30 billion dollars," asked Deborah W. Meyers, a senior policy analyst at the Migration Policy Institute, ". . . is that really the most effective way of achieving the policy goal?"

Bush administration allies said the report underscores the need for a guest-worker program, which the president has proposed, to meet the demand for labor in this nation and reduce pressure at the border by illegal crossers.

Members of a House homeland security oversight panel stressed yesterday how the government's poor track record on border enforcement undermined their confidence. A much smaller attempt in the 1990s to deploy remote-sensing technology on the border "started as a $2 million program and turned into a quarter-billion-dollar disaster," said Rep. Mike Rogers (R-Ala.), becoming "a poster child of government waste and mismanagement."

"It seems like deja vu all over again," said Rep. Kendrick B. Meek (D-Fla.).

Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R-Ind.) contrasted the administration's assertion that it could gain control of the border by 2009 with what the White House was prepared to pay for. Souder said he was "baffled" by the department's selection in September of aerospace giant Boeing Co. to lead the open-ended effort without more certainty about final cost.

"It could be between 2 and 30 billion dollars, you're not sure which? . . . So it's pie in the sky, 'give us your best shot'?" Souder said. "It just seems extraordinary."

Gregory Giddens, director of the DHS Secure Border Initiative program, and Deborah J. Spero, deputy commissioner of Customs and Border Protection, said cost estimates are premature because the administration has not settled on a strategy or decided what it will buy. The cost could be far lower and, responding to congressional pressure, DHS will provide a more detailed blueprint of its plans by Dec. 4.

"We do not have a cost estimate publicly," Giddens said.

Industry sources also expressed surprise at the inspector general's estimate, which ranged from $8 billion to $30 billion. The lower figure had been discussed informally, according to people familiar with competition among Boeing and four other firms. The consensus estimate given publicly, though, was that the project would be worth $2 billion to $2.5 billion.

Former DHS inspector general Clark Kent Ervin said agency officials have underestimated the cost of major programs in the past, partly to sell them to Congress and partly because DHS contracting officers were overwhelmed. In August, 69 of 252 jobs in the office managing the Secure Border Initiative Network project were filled, Skinner reported, and plans call for two-thirds of contract overseers to be contractors.

We Must Start Over On Immigration Reform (HILL)

By Manuel A. Miranda

The Hill, November 16, 2006

The recent election did not reward hard-liners on immigration, but voters and those who chose not to vote also punished Republicans for an irresponsible immigration solution in the Senate.

Just before the election, the president signed the Border Fence Law. It was not the immigration bill he wanted. Last year, House Republican leaders stopped cold the president's proposal that would have used a guest-worker program as the path to legalize over 12 million illegal immigrants. With far less reluctance, House Republicans rejected a Senate bill that made the president's guest-worker plan worse — much worse. This was a rare act of statecraft, if not courage. All Americans want a solution to address our failed immigration policy, but not necessarily that one.

Exit polls show that 57 percent of voters want to offer a legal status to illegal immigrants, while 38 percent want to deport them. Those are two sizeable, countervailing numbers that politicians should not ignore. Election over, it is time for a cohesive immigration reform.

We all need to take a deep breath and start working for a reform short on slogans and Band-Aid solutions and long on far-sighted policy. Conservatives especially need to throw cold water on our faces. The loss of the Republican leadership in the House means the jig is up. A Senate filibuster is the only hope to block another bloated bill that fails to solve the real problem: America's short-sighted immigration policies.

In 2001, President Bush promised the then-president of Mexico, Vicente Fox, that he would seek a legal status for America's illegal immigrants, over 70 percent of whom are Mexican. In return, the Mexican president promised major fiscal reforms so his people might stay home. Fox never made good. Mexico's fiscal policies only worsened, pushing more Mexicans across the border. President Bush should not feel obliged.

DOJ_NMG_0095301

The White House needs to give up the guest-worker program as the only solution, and congressional leaders on each side must distance themselves from the simplistic desires of their supporters. Each major interest can get something, without abandoning America's interests.

All experience suggests that a guest-worker program that is not temporary does more long-term harm than temporary good. It will certainly not work if its true purpose is the legalization of millions. Even so, there is only one good argument against a true guest-worker program: This country has never intentionally sought a peasant class. We would not be the same America if we start now.

A guest-worker program, however, that is truly temporary, and measured to obtain targeted regional and sector-driven goals, can be achieved without injuring our national character. So there is room to give the president, Mexico, liberals, free-traders, bishops and pastors what they want: legal status for some, though not all, illegal immigrants.

No one could reasonably disagree with placing security and employment enforcement first. And no one should be so cold-hearted as to ignore the harm we do with policies blind to the failure of the source country that exports its poor. Illegal immigration is a human tragedy that disrupts lives and separates families. It is a failure of two governments: the one that fails its people and the one that invites their departure for cheap labor's sake. A cohesive reform cannot leave unaddressed the obligation of our neighbors to heal themselves.

Political reality suggests that there will be no solution that disguises an amnesty or fails to legalize millions, but there will be no cohesive reform if millions today translate into tens of millions tomorrow. A policy reform that does not put everything on the table, including the so-called "anchor baby" policy, by which the children of illegal immigrants (and even tourists) become citizens upon mere birth here, and chain migration, by which whole clans get a foot in the door, is no reform at all.

Achieving a cohesive reform requires abandoning Band-Aid solutions. The truth is that, barring disparate regional impacts, which are real, America can absorb (and assimilate) millions of people, but just doing that is not a policy. And neither is a border fence.

The greatest obstacle to immigration reform has been the confines of this past year's debate. We must start over.

Miranda is former immigration counsel to Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). He became a citizen in 1976.

No Mandate For Amnesty (USAT)

By Mark Krikorian

USA Today, November 16, 2006

President Bush and his Democratic allies on immigration are pointing to the results of last week's elections as a mandate for what they call "comprehensive" reform — but what most people would rightly call amnesty for illegal aliens.

The results suggest nothing of the kind; in the face of deep discontent with Republicans over Iraq and a cascade of scandals, immigration probably didn't decide any races at all, largely because most Democrats wisely avoided any mention of amnesty and focused on enforcement.

Assuming the election analysis by the president and others is a sincere mistake, however, it likely stems from a misunderstanding of the options we face to deal with the illegal population of about 12 million people. Almost all polling has offered respondents only the unpalatable choice of mass deportations or amnesty.

But there is a third way, and that is the approach embodied in the bill passed nearly a year ago by the House. Sometimes called "attrition through enforcement," such a policy would strictly enforce immigration laws (something we have never tried) so as to limit new illegal settlement and cause illegal immigrants already here to go home over time.

The result would be an annual decrease in the illegal population, instead of continuing increases. Research by my Center for Immigration Studies found that this approach could cut the illegal population by half in five years, requiring only a modest increase in resources and using only normal law-enforcement tools.

In a pre-election poll of likely voters, done for the center by the Polling Company Inc. using neutral language (i.e., without the words "amnesty" or "aliens"), 44% backed enforcing laws "to cause illegal immigrants to go home over time." An additional 20% wanted roundups and deportations; only 31% supported legalization. When offered the full range of choices, amnesty is rejected 2-1.

Supporters of legalization would do well to keep this in mind, lest they be surprised in the presidential election of 2008.

Mark Krikorian is executive director of the Center for Immigration Studies, a think tank that supports tighter controls on immigration.

DOJ_NMG_0095302

TAX:

The Economic Agenda (WP)

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

THE MIDTERM elections were in part a repudiation of Republican economic priorities. The economy has grown strongly for five years even though it is slowing now, but the fruits of prosperity have not been shared widely. While corporate profits and pay for people at the top have risen, the majority of the workforce has experienced a stagnation of pay that stretches back, with only brief respites, to around 1980. The Republican Party has veered between denying the data and acknowledging middle-class anxiety while offering nothing to assuage it. The Democrats have understood the nation's economic insecurity, and they have been rewarded.

Having diagnosed the problem correctly, Democrats need a prescription. Some remedies that were tested during the campaign are not promising. As Slate's Jacob Weisberg has written, Democrats offered a mixture of economic populism (blaming middle-class insecurity on rich Americans) and economic nationalism (blaming middle-class insecurity on poor foreigners). But a populist drive to impose a surtax on energy companies will guarantee higher energy prices by deterring investment in new sources of supply. A populist attack on pharmaceutical companies will produce a lobbying war without solving the problems of health care. The real waste in the system is not that people overpay for drugs, but rather that they consume tests and other services without regard to their cost.

As for economic nationalism, clamping down on trade might help workers in declining manufacturing industries. But restricting imports would push up prices for people in the service sector, which includes hotel janitors, fast-food workers and other modestly paid groups, so the net effect on poor and middle-income families would probably be negative. Restricting immigration sounds like a good way to push wages up -- if there are fewer workers, surely the price of their work will rise? But economic studies find this effect is either negligible or nonexistent. Restricting the supply of low-wage labor may simply cause labor-intensive industries to shift abroad, or it may drive employers to buy extra tools and machines and so get by with fewer workers. Either way, a reduction in the supply of workers may be matched by lower demand for workers, which would explain why U.S. cities without immigrants haven't experienced more wage gains than cities with lots of them.

The good news is that the Democrats are not tied to these bad policies. One populist promise on which they propose to act promptly happens also to be reasonable: Raising the federal minimum wage makes sense because it is so low that lifting it probably won't hurt job creation. Beyond that, Democrats need to come up with policies that address inequality while not damaging growth, starting perhaps with tax reform. The existing system of tax breaks for savings, homeownership and health care favors the wealthy while draining billions from the government. Restructuring these tax breaks could shrink the deficit while freeing money for Democratic spending plans. Moreover, the Bush administration is on record as supporting tax reform. Here is an opportunity to make bipartisan progress: in a word, to govern.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Put Nominations Back On Table (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — White House officials said Wednesday that President Bush would renominate six of his earlier choices to sit on the federal appeals court, leaving Democratic senators and other analysts to ponder what message he is sending.

At least four of the nominations have been declared dead on arrival in the Senate by Democrats who have consistently opposed them as unacceptable. All six nominations will remain before the Senate through the lame-duck session of Congress and then will expire.

When the 110th Congress is seated in January, Mr. Bush can deliver another list of judicial nominees to the Senate, which will by then have a Democratic majority.

Mr. Bush's motive in sending up the nominations has been closely analyzed, with several Democrats and liberals labeling it as provocative and a sign that he does not intend to seek compromise as he suggested he would after Republican losses in the elections last week.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Senator Charles E. Schumer, Democrat of New York, who is a member of the Judiciary Committee. "For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base rather than an indication of things to come."

DOJ_NMG_0095303

Senator Patrick J. Leahy, Democrat of Vermont, who will be the leader of the Judiciary Committee, said, "Barely a week after the president promised to change course by working in a bipartisan and cooperative way with Congress, it is disappointing that he has decided to 'stay the course' on judicial nominees."

But Edward Whelan, the president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center, who has supported Mr. Bush's judicial nominations throughout the first term, said Democrats were engaging in "rhetorical gamesmanship." He said that despite the changed numbers in the Senate, Mr. Bush was not obliged to offer a unilateral surrender. He said the president was resubmitting the nominees for the lame-duck session because Democrats had refused to comply with the usual courtesy and moved to have the nominations expire at the last recess.

The four nominees whose chances of confirmation are viewed as nearly impossible are: William J. Haynes II, the Pentagon's general counsel who was involved in setting many of the interrogation policies for detainees; William G. Myers III, a longtime lobbyist for the mining and ranching industries and a critic of environmental regulations; Terrence W. Boyle, a district court judge in North Carolina; and Michael B. Wallace of Mississippi, a lawyer rated unqualified for the court by the American Bar Association.

The other nominees, who have not aroused as much opposition, are N. Randy Smith, a district judge in Idaho, and Peter D. Keisler, assistant attorney general for the civil division of the Justice Department.

White House Resubmits Appeals Court Nominees Opposed By Democrats (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, The Associated Press

AP, November 16, 2006

The Bush administration, trying to push through judicial nominations before Republicans lose control of the Senate, resubmitted six nominees deemed by Democrats too conservative for the federal bench.

Five nominees were the subject of an angry exchange in August when Democrats said their selection was a sop to the president's conservative base.

The White House on Wednesday submitted Terrence Boyle of North Carolina and William James Haynes II of Virginia to the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va.; Michael Brunson Wallace of Mississippi to the 5th Circuit in New Orleans; Peter Keisler of Maryland to the District of Columbia Circuit; and William Gerry Myers III and Norman Randy Smith, both of Idaho, for the 9th Circuit in San Francisco.

Everyone except Keisler has generated intense opposition from Democrats.

Under Senate rules the nominations must be resubmitted after Congress takes an extended break, as was the case this year for the 2006 election.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., a member of the Judiciary Committee. "For the sake of the country, we hope that this is an aberration because the president feels he must placate his hard-right base, rather than an indication of things to come."

Sen. Jon Cornyn, R-Texas, a vocal backer of many of Bush's judicial picks, said he thought it would be "very tough" to get the nominees through the Senate during the lame-duck session. But, he added, "Hope springs eternal."

Cornyn said judicial nominees will test the Democrats' stated desire to run the Senate with greater bipartisanship.

"We'll see whether now that they're in majority status, if we're going to have ideological litmus tests for judges," Cornyn said.

The president's picks for the federal bench have sparked angry debate in the Senate. The incoming majority leader, Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada, once threatened to filibuster Boyle's nomination if it came to the full Senate.

Haynes was an architect of the Bush administration's eventually abandoned policy on the treatment of terrorism detainees. He later told a Senate panel that reversing the policy was the "right thing to do."

Bush this week also has sent several nonjudicial nominees to the Senate. One was Kenneth Y. Tomlinson, renominated as chairman of the Broadcasting Board of Governors, the agency that directs U.S. overseas broadcasts. His nomination has bogged down because of allegations of misconduct. A report released in August by the State Department's inspector general said Tomlinson misused government funds for two years as the board chairman. He disputed the allegations.

Bush Resubmits Six U.S. Appellate Court Nominees (Update1) (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095304

Nov. 15 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush resubmitted six appellate-court nominees, who earlier drew objections from Democrats, for Senate consideration in the waning days of the Republican majority.

The Senate returned the six appeals-court nominees to the president in late September when Congress recessed to campaign for midterm elections. The elections gave Democrats a majority in the Senate starting in January and the power to block confirmation of the nominees.

Bush's decision to resubmit the six nominees was criticized by Vermont Democrat Patrick Leahy, who will be chairman the Judiciary Committee in the Democratic-controlled Senate.

``The president is choosing partisanship over progress and division over unity," Leahy said in a statement. ``The signal the president is sending by renominating these controversial candidates is regrettable."

Bush spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore said the White House is ``hopeful that the days of obstruction are behind us."

``We view this as a logical step in the judicial nomination process," she said.

The Judiciary Committee's current chairman, Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter, said yesterday, ``It is obvious that they cannot move" through the Senate before the Democrats take control.

Defense Department Counsel

The resubmitted nominees include William J. Haynes II, the Defense Department's general counsel who helped devise military interrogation policies for suspected terrorists. Democrats and some Republicans argue the interrogation policy encouraged abuse of prisoners seized in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Democrats, including Senator Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, have questioned whether Haynes was evasive during a July hearing when he was questioned about how the interrogation policy was adopted.

Haynes, 48, was nominated for a seat on the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Virginia. Also nominated for that court was Terrence W. Boyle, 60, a federal trial judge in North Carolina who Democrats argue has shown hostility to employment discrimination lawsuits.

Bush also renominated Michael B. Wallace, 55, a Jackson, Mississippi, lawyer who the American Bar Association's judicial screening committee found professionally ``unqualified" for a seat on the New Orleans-based 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Wallace is a former aide to Senator Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican.

Myers

William G. Myers III, 51, a mining and ranching lobbyist, was renominated for a seat on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco. Democrats object to Myers' record as an opponent of environmental laws, arguing that as the Interior Department's solicitor he promoted corporate interests over enforcement of regulations to protect federal land.

Peter D. Keisler, head of the Justice Department's civil division, was renominated for a seat on the Washington-based D.C. Circuit.

The panel's eight Democrats objected in July to considering Keisler's nomination, citing a longstanding dispute over whether to fill the vacancy on the Washington court. During Bill Clinton's presidency, Republicans refused to act on nominations to fill the seat, citing a decline in the court's workload.

California Democratic Senator Dianne Feinstein has opposed the confirmation of N. Randy Smith, an Idaho resident, on the basis that he was nominated to fill a seat on the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals traditionally reserved for a California resident.

Leahy has suggested that Bush nominate Smith for the Idaho seat that Myers has been picked to fill.

Bush Renominates Judicial Picks (WP)

By Peter Baker

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

President Bush renominated six previously blocked candidates for federal appeals court yesterday, triggering the first real battle with ascendant Democrats since the midterm elections and signaling what could be the start of a fierce two-year struggle over the shape of the federal judiciary.

The move heartened conservatives who worried that Bush would scale back his ambition to move courts to the right and outraged liberals, who called it a violation of the spirit of bipartisanship promised since Democrats captured Congress. Both sides saw it as a possible harbinger for the remainder of Bush's presidency, particularly if a Supreme Court vacancy opens.

The decision to send back the six nominees, along with four new candidates for the bench, was a provocative maneuver intended to signal that Bush does not plan to cower in the face of an opposition Congress, because the Senate almost certainly will not act on them in the lame-duck session that adjourns next month. If Bush wants to keep pushing for these nominations, he will have to resubmit them in January, when the Senate reconvenes with a 51-vote Democratic majority.

DOJ_NMG_0095305

"We are hopeful that the days of judicial obstruction are behind us," said White House spokeswoman Emily Lawrimore. Noting that a Republican Senate confirmed 15 of Bill Clinton's nominees to the federal appeals bench in his last two years as president, she added: "We are hopeful that President Bush's nominees will receive a fair up-or-down vote."

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.) said none of the six would be confirmed. "It's a real slap in the face," he said by telephone. "It basically makes you think the talk of bipartisanship is just talk. . . . I guess it's a sop to the right, but if he's going to keep doing sops to the right, it means they didn't pay attention to the results of the election."

Judgeships have been a priority for conservatives and a major flashpoint between Bush and congressional Democrats. A group of centrist senators from both parties last year brokered a truce in the nomination war and Bush secured confirmation for two Supreme Court nominees, John G. Roberts Jr. and Samuel A. Alito Jr. In his final days on the campaign trail, Bush warned supporters that a Democratic Senate would never have confirmed Roberts or Alito and would stonewall future nominations.

Now he appears ready to test that proposition. None of the six nominees resubmitted yesterday received a Senate floor vote: Michael B. Wallace for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 5th Circuit; William J. Haynes II and Terrence W. Boyle Jr. for the 4th Circuit; William G. Myers III and Norman Randy Smith for the 9th Circuit; and Peter D. Keisler for the D.C. Circuit.

In addition, he sent four new nominations: James E. Rogan to the U.S. District Court in California; Benjamin H. Settle to the district court in Washington state; and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott W. Stucky to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Rogan, a Republican former congressman, is the most prominent of the four, having served as one of the House managers who prosecuted Clinton during his 1999 impeachment trial.

Four of the previously blocked nominees were criticized as unqualified or too conservative. One of the others ran into objections from California senators who did not want his seat moved to Idaho and the last was stalled by assertions that the caseload on his circuit did not justify another judge. Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) said Tuesday that he would not move the nominations during the lame-duck session.

Elliot Mincberg, legal director of the liberal People for the American Way, said: "This is a disturbing sign . . . in terms of Bush trying to reach out for genuine consultation and consensus. But even more important will be what he does in January. If he takes the same tack in January, then he signals that he wants confrontation."

Conservatives hope that is what Bush wants and say it will test Democrats' commitment to bipartisanship. "The president's sending the message that he's not going to deviate one iota from his judicial philosophy, which is that he's going to send up nominees who don't legislate from the bench," said Jay Sekulow, chief counsel of Pat Robertson's American Center for Law and Justice, who advises the White House.

Bush Resubmits 6 For Judgeships (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

The White House yesterday resubmitted six contentious judicial nominees to the Senate in what Republicans said was a signal President Bush will fight over judges even under Democratic control, and Democrats said proves the president already has forsaken bipartisanship.

In addition to the six resubmissions -- needed because the nominees had been automatically returned to the White House during the October recess -- Mr. Bush also sent over four new nominees.

The White House said the nominations are "a logical step" meant to keep the confirmation process on track.

"These renominations simply restore the nominees to the position they were in prior to the [October] recess, when the nominees were pending in the Senate and awaiting fair consideration of an up-or-down vote," said Emily Lawrimore, a White House spokeswoman.

But several of those nominees would have a difficult time gaining a majority vote, and with little time left in this year's session and with Democrats about to take control next year, nothing is likely to happen.

"There is zero, zip, zilch chance of any of these judges making it through the Senate killing fields in the waning days," said one Republican aide, who has watched the nominees situation but asked not to be identified. "Without a plan for successful confirmation from the White House, the only point is to fly the flag as the judicial-confirmation ship slips beneath the waves. Burble, gurgle."

All nominees expire at the end of this year, and Democrats said with so little time left, Mr. Bush's move proves he is playing a partisan game rather than trying to work with them.

"Democrats have asked the president to be bipartisan, but this is a clear slap in the face at our request," said Sen. Charles E. Schumer, New York Democrat and a point man for his party on judicial nominees.

DOJ_NMG_0095306

But Sean Rushton, executive director of the Committee for Justice, a conservative group that advocates for judges, said Democrats forced the issue by denying Mr. Bush the usual courtesy of carrying the judges over the recess. That is why Mr. Bush had to resubmit the six contentious ones yesterday.

"It's a bullying tactic to try to paint the president into backing off from these nominees," he said.

The six resubmissions are Terrence W. Boyle and William James Haynes II to the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, Peter D. Keisler to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, William Gerry Myers III and Norman Randy Smith to the 9th Circuit and Michael Brunson Wallace to the 5th Circuit.

The new nominees are James Edward Rogan to the U.S. District Court for the Central District of California, Benjamin Hale Settle to the District Court for the Western District of Washington and Margaret A. Ryan and Scott Wallace Stucky to the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces.

It is a curious end to a year that began with the confirmation of Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. to the Supreme Court. But since then, confirmations have dropped off. One key senator earlier this year blamed the White House for not sending up new nominees fast enough, though Mr. Rushton said the Senate leadership failed to push the pending nominees.

House, Senate Pass Stopgap Funding Bill (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Congress passed a bill Wednesday that keeps open those agencies awaiting approval of their budgets as lawmakers seek a deal on lots of unfinished fiscal business.

The temporary spending measure sped through the House and Senate on voice votes. Without passage, 13 Cabinet agencies would have had to close down Friday at midnight. When President Bush signs the bill, the government will remain open through Dec. 8.

The bill's passage was the only significant accomplishment Wednesday by the postelection Congress. Senate leaders had hoped to turn to an agriculture spending bill and a bill to allow civilian nuclear fuel shipments to India, but lawmakers quickly bogged down.

Republican conservatives want to slow the appropriations process. They fear that Appropriations Committee members will muscle through a massive spending bill full of parochial projects as one of the last acts of Congress before Republicans lose control.

Farm-state Democrats, meanwhile, demanded a vote on a multibillion dollar billion farm disaster aid plan as part of the agriculture spending measure.

The net result was gridlock broken only by passage of the stopgap measure.

Congress has yet to finish nine of 11 spending bills for the budget year that began Oct. 1. Those bills total more than $460 billion. The only practicable way of finishing them before lawmakers exit Washington for good in December is to bundle them into one or more multiple bill proposals.

But there are divisions among Republican over whether to even try to advance the spending bills. Without GOP unity, it will be virtually impossible to do so. That raises the prospect that Democrats will have to tackle the difficult task after taking control of Congress in January.

Past Is Not Prologue For Gates (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Democrats could find themselves walking a fine line as the chamber takes up Defense Secretary nominee Robert Gates, weighing the value of regime change at the Pentagon after six stormy years of Secretary Donald Rumsfeld against their new position of power as an incoming majority.

The dozen sitting Democrats who voted against Gates when he took over as CIA director in 1991 face a particular challenge as they re-examine old allegations about Gates's role in intelligence-gathering during the Iran-Contra affair. Several CIA colleagues came forward then to charge Gates with twisting intelligence to fit the White House agenda, criticism that had derailed an earlier Gates bid to head the agency.

The Senate's Democratic majority ended up confirming Gates in 1991, with eight members who are still serving voting yes — including new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.).

Yet, those 12 Democratic votes against Gates in 1991 appear to set little precedent for Senate Democrats ready to replace Rumsfeld's combative and closed leadership style with Gates, a former member of the independent Iraq Study Group that will soon weigh in on the Iraq war policy.

DOJ_NMG_0095307

The first senator to reveal that he would reverse an old vote against Gates was Joseph Biden Jr. (D-Del.), who told ABC's "This Week" on Sunday that a desire to change course in Iraq would overcome his former skepticism about Iran-Contra.

"To put it very, very bluntly, as long as he's not there, Rumsfeld is there," Biden said.

Another Democrat who had opposed Gates's CIA bid, Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.), then attributed his vote to unanswered questions about Gates's politicization of intelligence, a charge reminiscent of some war critics' view that the Bush administration "cherry-picked" intelligence to justify invading Iraq.

"In the spirit of moving along," Baucus said on Monday, he would likely support Gates this time around. "Gates is certainly qualified."

Sen. Jay Rockefeller (D-W.Va.), who will take over the Intelligence Committee next year, gave a floor speech against Gates in 1991. Rockefeller said in a statement last week, however, that choosing Gates to head Defense "may signal that [Bush] is searching for a realistic and pragmatic approach in Iraq and the war on terror."

Other Democrats set to become committee chairmen in January voiced discontent 15 years ago over Gates's role in sharing intelligence with Saddam Hussein during Iraq's 1980s war with Iran, including Sens. Edward Kennedy (Mass.) and Tom Harkin (Iowa). Seven other sitting Democrats voted against Gates then: Jeff Bingaman (N.M.), John Kerry (Mass.), Frank Lautenberg (N.J.), Kent Conrad (N.D.), Chris Dodd (Conn.), Carl Levin (Mich.), and Paul Sarbanes (Md.). Sen. Jim Jeffords (I-Vt.), who, like Sarbanes, is retiring this year, also voted against Gates.

Levin will take over the Armed Services Committee next year, but he is not likely to gavel in any Gates hearings. Levin and current Armed Services Chairman John Warner (R-Va.) are planning to start the confirmation process when the Senate returns from Thanksgiving recess and complete it as soon as possible.

What is unclear is whether Democratic senators will view their past votes on Gates as a precedent; the caucus's unified effort to effect positive change in Iraq and begin a phased redeployment of troops is certain to play into the debate. Reid, who voted to install Gates at the CIA in 1991, said at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast yesterday that he welcomes a swift process.

"There is some urgency in our minds to move this along as quickly as possible," said Reid, who noted that Gates's ties to Iran-Contra did concern him. "I certainly want to get rid of Rumsfeld, sooner rather than later."

Levin has said that he will re-examine Gates impartially, adding this week that "the last 15 years are more important to me [than Iran-Contra]. … I'll give him a fresh, fair hearing."

Democrats are conscious of the need to thoroughly examine Gates before sending him to replace Rumsfeld, who had become a symbol of the Bush administration's Iraq missteps for members of both parties. Sen. Charles Schumer (N.Y.), Democrats' new third-ranking leader, was in the House during Gates's last confirmation vote but cautioned that Democrats "do not want to do anything dilatory."

Democrats will be asking, "Does he have an independent mind?" Schumer said.

Reid and Schumer addressed several other future goals at the Monitor breakfast. Senate Democratic leaders are considering legislation to establish criminal penalties for election fraud and manipulation, a response to widespread reports last week that Democratic voters were targeted with late-night robo-calls and efforts to mislead them away from the polls.

Reid also hinted that the outside fundraising groups that have become pivotal to Democratic campaign operations would be scrutinized by the Democratic majority.

"We're going to have to take a real close look at 527s," Reid said.

Lott Beats Alexander 25-24 For Comeback (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Senate Republicans chose Trent Lott (Miss.) as their new whip yesterday by the narrowest of margins, cementing his comeback after four years out of leadership and signaling a GOP minority ready to assert itself and bounce back from defeat.

Lott bested Sen. Lamar Alexander (R-Tenn.), who began openly campaigning more than a year ago, by 25 votes to 24. Senators said Lott's proven negotiating ability and his institutional knowledge made the difference as Republicans prepare to move into a full cycle of minority status for the first time since 1995.

Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.), who was unopposed in his bid for conference chairman, said "experience" was the singular force behind Lott's last-minute triumph against the well-liked Alexander. "There's nobody better at working with other folks, including across the aisle, than Trent."

Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) echoed that sentiment, saying, "I want people with confidence and people who will work well with the Democrats" in the leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0095308

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) noted Lott's rededication to the party as he worked his way back from the turbulence of 2002, when the Mississippian was forced out as majority leader under pressure from the White House after making remarks seen as racially insensitive.

"Trent Lott was a great team player after suffering a great emotional defeat for him," said Allard, who publicly supported Alexander. "He has worked hard since then. I think [Lott backers] appreciate that."

Lott has called the whip's post the best job in the capital, and yesterday said it was the "job I have loved to do the most." The longtime House whip, who also won a one-vote Senate whip election in 1995 against former Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), must now try to divert the media attention he naturally attracts toward the Republicans' new majority leader, Sen. Mitch McConnell (Ky.).

Arriving before the cameras yesterday, the new GOP leadership team referred to McConnell one question about the conference's post-election mood – "upbeat," he said, "which may surprise you" – before the topic turned to Lott. The new whip demurred, seeking to shift the spotlight back onto McConnell, "where it belongs." McConnell then closed down the press conference.

The challenge McConnell and Lott face in ensuring that the latter does not upstage the former will be amplified as senators jostle to position themselves for presidential bids. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), the GOP's frontrunner, was a strong Lott booster as the latter delayed any public campaigning until Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), the natural heir to the whip job, lost his reelection race.

Less than 18 months ago, Lott was the subject of rampant retirement rumors after Hurricane Katrina tore through the Gulf Coast, demolishing his family home in Pasacagoula, Miss. But the personal setback appeared to reinvigorate the institutionalist Lott, who took on an increasingly helpful role for the GOP leadership led by the man installed to replace him, outgoing Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.).

Lott also led the way at times as Republican lawmakers asserted their independence from the Bush administration. Lott publicly warned the president in March that if he vetoed legislation negating a ports takeover by a Middle-Eastern company, "Okay, big boy, I'll just vote to override your veto."

That independence was a factor for Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine), another Lott backer, who said the events of 2002 were water under the bridge.

"Trent understands … that what the president may want may not be what we can advance," said the centrist Snowe. "You have to have a broader umbrella for all Republicans. Not every Republican is going to be able to vote the same way."

Republican senators cast a unified vote for the rest of their leadership, including Sens. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) as GOP Policy Committee chairwoman, John Cornyn (R-Texas) as conference vice-chairman and John Ensign (R-Nev.) as National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman.

Cornyn said yesterday that the closeness of the whip vote would leave no lingering tension in the conference, adding that Alexander would play a key role.

"I would not be surprised," Cornyn said, if a leadership position tailored to Alexander's strengths were created. Senate Democrats crafted their own new post this week for their victorious campaign chief, Charles Schumer (N.Y.).

Cornyn, whose new mandate is to hone and articulate the GOP message, also described a willingness among Republicans to heed the Democratic majority's call for bipartisanship but rebel when it is called for. "It doesn't mean we are going to be unnecessarily partisan … but we can shape, or in some cases stop, legislation," he said.

McConnell had a similar message, telling reporters that "we represent a vigorous body of 49, and hopefully a minority that is only in this position for a couple of years."

Republican Sens. Judd Gregg (N.H.) and Gordon Smith (Ore.) gave Lott's nominating speeches, according to sources, while Sens. Bob Bennett (Utah) and Johnny Isakson (Ga.) gave Alexander's.

Democrats, who faced no contested leadership races, were watching the contest almost as avidly as Republicans. Mississippi Rep. Gene Taylor (D) issued a statement hailing Lott's win, and new Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) said at a breakfast interview yesterday morning that he has "great affection for Trent Lott."

"Behind the scenes the past two years, he has been extremely helpful to me," Reid said.

Roxana Tiron contributed to this report.

Lott Returns To Senate Leadership (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Mississippi's Trent Lott barreled back into the Senate Republican leadership as party whip when the 110th Congress convenes in January.

DOJ_NMG_0095309

The narrow 25-24 caucus vote echoed Mr. Lott's 1994 victory when he wrested the same No. 2 party post from former Wyoming Sen. Alan Simpson. But this triumph also spelled redemption for a man who rose as high as Senate majority leader before falling precipitously in 2002.

For President Bush, the Mississippian's return could be a mixed blessing. Mr. Lott blamed the White House for contributing to his ouster, but he brings a set of legislative skills that the administration sorely needs to move its agenda in the new Democratic-controlled Congress.

After four years of Bill Frist, the retiring Senate leader who never seemed at home in the chamber, Republicans are hungry for a proven expediter. Mr. Frist's Tennessee colleague, Sen. Lamar Alexander, who began campaigning for the whip's post a year ago, couldn't withstand Mr. Lott's late surge.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.) said of Mr. Lott: "He goes across the aisle better than any other member of our caucus. He has an intuitive sense of the way this place works."

"He's the best I've seen in 20 years in the Senate in working both the Senate and the other side of the Capitol," said Sen. John McCain (R., Ariz.).

Mr. Lott fell from power after suggesting at a televised party in December 2002 that the nation would have had fewer problems if the segregationist policies of the old Dixiecrat Party in the South had prevailed. He denied any racist intent but was rebuked by the president and complained that the White House encouraged efforts to replace him with Mr. Frist.

Mr. Lott was emotional after his triumph and pledged his loyalty to the new Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R., Ky.). Mr. McConnell had signaled privately that he wouldn't work against Mr. Lott's comeback, but the victory also reflects changes in the senator as a person.

Mr. Lott reached out to colleagues like Sen. McCain, with whom he had fought in the past. And in seconding the nomination, Oregon Sen. Gordon Smith said Mr. Lott was stronger for having dealt with the twin setbacks of losing his leadership post and seeing his home state and Gulf Coast house devastated by Hurricane Katrina.

"If any man has gotten a one-two punch and gotten off the mat a better man, it's Trent Lott," Mr. Smith said.

Mr. Lott's return also underscores the human dimension of leadership elections in Congress, a huge factor again today for House Democrats deciding on majority leader for the coming Congress. Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the party whip, is seeking the post, but faces stiff resistance from Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha, a Marine Vietnam veteran who has helped to galvanize public support for the party by speaking out against the Iraq war.

Part of the fight is about loyalties, most notably those of Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.), the future speaker who publicly endorsed Mr. Murtha, a friend. Part also is about ideas. The 74-year-old Mr. Murtha has risked much of what he has in the House to press his case for a stronger stand on Iraq. And part is about money and the ethical problems that persist for Congress after an election in which corruption was an issue for voters.

Public Citizen, the consumer nonprofit group, last night released a study showing that Mr. Hoyer ranks far higher than Mr. Murtha in his dependency on special-interest political funds. But as the race tightens, Hoyer supporters have focused on Mr. Murtha's ethical scrapes and role as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam bribery scandal in 1980.

A videotape of Mr. Murtha meeting with an FBI operative posing as a cash-wielding Arab sheik was resurrected earlier this year by conservatives attacking his stand on Iraq. It has now come into play in the leadership race and could be fatal.

Mr. Murtha denies taking any money but remains very much an old school politician who lives by his own code. Others in similar circumstances have redeemed themselves in the public's eye by becoming reformers; Mr. Murtha is much more resistant to new rules as the solution, though he has promised to back an ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi.

House Republicans also have their caucus races -- and divisions -- which will play out tomorrow. Ohio Rep. John Boehner appears increasingly confident of keep his post as the new minority leader after Rep. Joe Barton (R., Tex.) withdrew last evening and pledged to support Mr. Boehner against the remaining challenger, Rep. Mike Pence (R., Ind.).

Write to David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com2

Senate Republicans Tap Lott For No. 2 Leadership Job (USAT)

By Bill Nichols And Kathy Kiely

USA Today, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Senate Republicans picked a blunt White House critic to be their party's second-in-command Wednesday, as they resurrected the political career of a lawmaker who once made comments viewed by some as racially insensitive.

President Bush called Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott from Air Force One to offer congratulations after Lott won the GOP's minority whip job over Sen. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, who had predicted victory Tuesday night.

DOJ_NMG_0095310

"We have a lot of important priorities to work on and as the president told Sen. Lott, he very much looks forward to working with him," White House spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

Lott stepped down as Senate majority leader in 2002 after he suggested the nation would have been better off if then-senator Strom Thurmond of South Carolina had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run as a segregationist "Dixiecrat."

Since then, Lott has not shied from criticizing the White House.

·"They still need men and women of gravitas and stature," Lott said of the administration in March, while also predicting that Bush would "be a drag in the fall" elections if his approval ratings did not rise.

·"The White House can become a cocoon. The president and vice president have to make sure they reach out and listen to a variety of voices," Lott warned in an interview with USA TODAY before Bush began his second term.

Lott was more circumspect Wednesday as he joined Kentucky's Mitch McConnell, who was elected GOP leader, as the power brokers in the new Republican Senate minority.

Democrat Harry Reid of Nevada will be majority leader and Dick Durbin of Illinois will serve as majority whip when the new legislative term begins in January.

Even though Democrats will have a 51-49 vote edge in the Senate, the minority party can use parliamentary tactics to block legislation and nominations. McConnell said he would "lead a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 votes to do anything."

Lott said he is "honored to be part of this leadership team … and to do a job that I've really loved the most: count the votes." He also previously served as whip in the House and Senate.

Lott's spokeswoman, Susan Irby, argued that the senators' vote of confidence in Lott was a credit to his "proven talent" as a vote counter and not a jab at Bush.

Paul Light, a professor of public service at New York University, believes administration officials likely are not so sanguine in private. "I doubt they're saying, 'Gee, how great it is to see Trent back in the leadership chain,' " Light said.

Lott beat Alexander on a 25-24 vote in a secret ballot. The whip serves as the party's chief vote counter and legislative tactician and is charged with enforcing party loyalty.

For Republicans, their leadership contest returns to the limelight a canny Southerner whose career seemed in tatters. In 2002, Lott said he was just trying to make Thurmond feel good at his 100th birthday party. Lott apologized repeatedly for his remarks.

"For Lott, it's a four-year journey from presumed ruin to undeniable redemption that is nothing short of remarkable," said Sid Salter, a Mississippi political analyst and newspaper columnist for The Clarion-Ledger in Jackson, Miss.

Sen. George Voinovich, R-Ohio, said some colleagues supported Lott because he'd not only been publicly embarrassed but also lost his Pascagoula, Miss., home in Hurricane Katrina. "This guy has been through hell," Voinovich said. "There was some feeling that Trent got a bad deal several years ago. … This was some way of letting him know there is redemption."

Lott is currently living out of a trailer on the site where his home used to be while he waits for insurance claims to be settled in court.

"Senators, like most Americans, like a comeback," Alexander said.

Republicans Return Lott To Leadership (AP-Y)

By Laurie Kellman, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

Less than a half-hour after Republican senators voted to return Sen. Trent Lott to their leadership team, the Mississippi senator's phone rang. It was Vice President Dick Cheney, calling with congratulations on his election as the Senate's Republican whip, the No. 2 post, behind GOP minority leader-elect Mitch McConnell.

A few hours later, Cheney again delivered an atta-boy in person during a GOP policy lunch. So did White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolton. And President Bush rang from Air Force One.

Lott's redemption had begun — just four years after the same White House helped engineer his ouster as the party's Senate leader.

It must have been sweet. Lott, 65, did little to hide his resentment during his exile from the party's top Senate ranks, shoved out for rhetorical offense: At Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday bash, Lott had saluted the South Carolina senator with comments later interpreted as support for southern segregationist policies.

Lott explained. He apologized. But some Senate colleagues undermined him, he wrote in a book last year. White House officials demanded his ouster. And perhaps worse, Bush hurt his feelings by disavowing the comments in a tone that was "devastating ... booming and nasty."

DOJ_NMG_0095311

What a difference four years makes. Bush's popularity is drooping over the war in Iraq. Angry voters stripped Republicans of their majority in the Nov. 7 elections. And in a 100-member chamber in which Democrats hold the majority by one senator, Lott is the Republican in charge of lining up and counting votes for the next two years — when members of both parties will be seeking legislative accomplishments to tout on the 2008 campaign trail.

That makes him powerful enough to get the White House's attention once again.

En route to Singapore, Bush "told Senator Lott that he looked forward to working with him in the upcoming Congress," according to White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

Another event during Lott's exile changed his relationship with the White House: Hurricane Katrina. The massive storm devastated Lott's home state, not to mention his historic oceanside home in Pascagoula. He found his refrigerator a few blocks away in a neighbor's yard. For him, the administration's bungled response was personal. He considered retiring this year, after three terms in the Senate and eight in the House.

But even as he was making that decision, Lott hinted to a reporter that he'd like to return to leadership.

"I might do it just to make everybody nervous," he said last year.

The comeback is an apt outlet for Lott's talents. He was the rare majority leader who seemed to relish the vote-wrangling duties that some of his predecessors loathed. Lott appropriated former majority leader Howard Baker's derisive description of the job for the title of his tell-all memoir last year: "Herding Cats: A Life in Politics."

Last week, Lott began an under-the-radar campaign for whip, notwithstanding Tennessee Sen. Lamar Alexander's 18-month bid for the same job.

He shifted into prime cat-herding mode Tuesday evening when senators returned to the chamber for their first vote since the election. Buzzing from one colleague to the next, sitting, standing, gesturing and pausing to count a list of supporters, Lott lined them up even as Alexander's office boasted of as many as 30 votes.

The next morning, the mild-mannered Tennessee senator estimated Lott had peeled off three senators who had committed to Alexander but changed their minds. Lott won the election 25-24.

Living proof that there can be second acts in politics, Lott was uncharacteristically mum when he strode out of the caucus with the rest of the newly elected GOP leadership team. He was sticking to the pledge he made during his quiet campaign to not overshadow his party's new leader, McConnell. Asked if he felt vindicated, Lott just pressed his lips together and shook his head.

Trent Lott Rejoins Senate GOP Leadership (LAT)

By Johanna Neuman

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Four years after he was ousted as majority leader for racially insensitive remarks at Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, Mississippi's Trent Lott returned to the GOP leadership ranks today.

In an election closer than the one that put Democrats in charge of the Senate, Republicans today narrowly chose Lott for the vote-counting whip position over Lamar Alexander of Tennessee by a 25-24 vote, giving Lott the No. 2 leadership slot.

Lott was forced to resign as majority leader in 2002 after the Bush White House joined a chorus of criticism over remarks in which Lott noted that Mississippi voted for South Carolina's Thurmond when he ran for president in 1948 on a states' rights platform that supported racial segregation.

"We voted for him," said Lott. "We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years either."

Lott explained that he had just made an off-the-cuff remark, but as demands grew for his resignation, he went on Black Entertainment Television to repudiate past votes against civil rights legislation and to affirm his support for affirmation action programs.

With the drumbeat growing for his removal, White House maneuvering forced Lott to resign his leadership post to make room for Tennessee's Bill Frist. In the years since, Lott has nursed his skills as a backbencher — talents for vote-counting and behind-the-scenes maneuvering now critical to a GOP in the minority. In his own campaign for reelection as a senator last week, Lott won with 64% of the vote.

"We're going to be a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 to do anything," said Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, elected unanimously to be the new Senate GOP leader. Introducing his new leadership team, McConnell said, "Hopefully, we're a minority that will only be in that position for a couple of years."

Lott deflected efforts by reporters to question him about his return to the leadership ranks, saying "the spotlight" should be on McConnell.

Hill observers were buzzing at the feat because Alexander — a former governor and Cabinet secretary — had campaigned for more than a year as a clean face choice for a demoralized party and had been boasting that he had the votes.

DOJ_NMG_0095312

The vote within the Republican caucus could also reflect unhappiness with President Bush for engineering the switch to Frist, who was not considered a strong leader.

Other members of the new leadership team include: John Kyl of Arizona, Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, John Cornyn of Texas and John Ensign of Nevada, who will head the Republican senatorial campaign dedicated to returning Republicans to power after the 2008 elections.

"We have a lot of incumbents to protect," he said. Expressing hope that "this title of minority we only have for two years," Ensign said, "We're going to look for a couple of (Democratic) targets."

johanna.neuman@latimes.com

In The End, It's Lott By A Single Ballot (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

Proving himself once again to be the master vote-counter the job requires, Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) orchestrated a stunning return to the GOP leadership Wednesday by pulling off a one-vote upset of Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) to become the next Senate Minority Whip.

The former Majority Leader bested Alexander on a secret ballot tally of 25-24, but few dared to predict the outcome before Senators convened behind closed doors to elect their chain of command for the 110th Congress. Even heading into the vote, Alexander suggested the tally would be close and jokingly hoped the final outcome would reflect the 27 solid commitments he was convinced he had at 11 p.m. the previous night.

"I think Trent proved to be a better vote counter and I think Senators, like most Americans, like a comeback," Alexander said afterward. "He deserves great credit for that."

In signature Lott style, the veteran Senator was able to win by corralling a solid base of support, picking off a number of Alexander's backers and working his candidacy right up to the Wednesday-morning vote. Lott was seen walking into the Old Senate chambers talking with Sen. Lisa Murkowski (Alaska), whom several GOP Senate aides characterized as one of the few remaining undecided lawmakers.

The vote in the Whip contest came after the Republican Conference confirmed Sen. Mitch McConnell's ascension to Minority Leader. He replaces retiring Sen. Bill Frist (Tenn.) as the GOP leader.

Lott's coup was somewhat remarkable given he entered the race long after Alexander, who had been campaigning for the job for more than a year. Lott, ousted as the Majority Leader in December 2002 after making remarks perceived as racially insensitive at the late Sen. Strom Thurmond's 100th birthday party, had been campaigning quietly in recent weeks but didn't formally jump into the Whip hunt until Monday night.

Yet the Mississippi Senator has made no secret that serving as the Republican Whip had been his most pleasurable leadership experience to date, and reiterated that sentiment Wednesday, saying he was delighted to "do a job that I've always really loved most, and that's count the votes."

Lott formerly served as the House GOP Whip and later as the Senate Republican Whip, a slot he also secured by a narrow one-vote margin when he took on and beat then-Sen. Alan Simpson (Wyo.). Just as Alexander was viewed as the frontrunner for the Whip job, many had predicted Simpson would outpoll Lott during that race in 1994.

Lott said he was "exhilarated to have the opportunity" to get another shot in the Republican leadership (those close to him said it would have been his last try at a comeback had he failed). As he campaigned, Lott and his allies touted his battle-tested abilities as a Whip, experience at making a deal and knowing how to be effective as a member of the minority — a status the Republicans have experienced only briefly over the past dozen years.

In the end, "it came down to negotiating skills and a strong professional relationship with Democrats, both rank and file and the Democratic leadership," said one GOP Senator who supported Lott. "And, I think, a common sense understanding of what Republican Members want from their leadership."

Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine), a Lott supporter, said the job "does require someone who's got that institutional knowledge and appreciation of what it's going to take not only to help rebuild the Republicans within the institution, but also nationally."

Even Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.), the incoming Majority Leader, gave a nod to Lott's political skills, saying: "I have great respect for his abilities ... behind the scenes he's been very helpful."

But for all Lott's attributes, he also may need to spend part of his honeymoon proving to his critics that he won't be overly outspoken or constantly overshadowing McConnell. Lott sought to dispel those concerns both privately to Senators on Wednesday morning, and again to the public when he emerged with McConnell and the five other newly elected leaders following the votes.

DOJ_NMG_0095313

Perhaps the strongest signal sent to his Conference came in the form of the two men he chose to nominate him: Sens. Gordon Smith (Ore.) and Judd Gregg (N.H.), who had only moments earlier performed the same task for McConnell.

The media savvy Lott spoke only briefly to the press, and when asked to talk about his return to the limelight with a victory over Alexander, he deferentially turned to the incoming Minority Leader, saying: "The spotlight belongs on him."

Snowe said Lott expressed that same desire to his colleagues in private, saying she believes such a posture "is most appropriate."

"He understands that his role is to help reinforce what the leader's going to be trying to achieve on behalf of all the Conference."

Beyond that, Lott will undoubtedly have to ride through the replay of how he fell from grace as the Majority Leader just four years ago. Lott's colleagues forced him from the helm after he implied that had Thurmond, a 1948 candidate for the White House, been elected president on a segregationist platform, we could have avoided "all these problems" we have today.

Several Republican Senators said Wednesday that it is time to let the past go.

"I think that people understand that he has been deeply apologetic and regrettable for having made those remarks," Snowe said.

Clearly, Lott's past was his greatest selling point and perhaps shortcoming, given those backing Alexander said it was a fresh face and loyalty they sought. Still, most agreed the closeness of the outcome for the Whip job signified that the two Senators are both well-liked and respected, and insisted there is not a division among them about how best to move ahead in the next session.

"Lamar had a lot of support, but there is a lot of confidence in Trent as a Whip," explained Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the newly elected Conference chairman. "This is a victory for Trent as a Whip, but this is not a loss for Lamar."

"If there was ever a leadership race where people liked both people, it was this one," said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (Texas), the new Policy Committee chairwoman. "Both are recognized for their very strong characteristics ... I don't think there was a vote against either one of them."

In fact, shortly after the results were announced, several Republican aides and Senators suggested that Alexander might find a place at the leadership table after all. Sen. John Cornyn (Texas), the new vice chairman of the Conference, said he expected Alexander will have an "important role" in the next Congress, and that there will be "additional ideas on that."

Republicans enter the 110th Congress with 49 Senators, six seats fewer than in the current Congress following their crippling electoral loss last Tuesday. Despite the turn of events, Republicans attempted to put a brave face on their new status, and each talked about their razor-sharp focus on toppling the Democrats and taking control of the Senate in 2008.

In addition to tapping McConnell as their Minority Leader and Lott as Whip, GOP Senators unanimously chose Kyl as Conference chairman, Hutchison as Policy Committee chairwoman, Cornyn as Conference vice chairman and Sen. John Ensign (Nev.) as National Republican Senatorial Committee chairman.

"My responsibility is to make sure the title of minority party is a title we only have for two years," Ensign said.

Emerging as the incoming leader, McConnell described his Conference as "very upbeat, which may surprise you." McConnell, who is vacating the job as Whip, added that the Republicans' margin in the Senate should not be discounted, noting that it takes 60 votes to pass legislation in the chamber.

"We will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority and hopefully a minority that is in that position for only a couple of years," he said, referring to the 2008 elections.

Sen. Lott Returns To GOP Leadership With One-Vote Victory (CQ)

By Daphne Retter

CQ, November 16, 2006

Senate Republicans proved on Wednesday that there can indeed be second acts in politics, electing their former leader Trent Lott of Mississippi to the No. 2 minority leadership post for the 110th Congress.

Lott prevailed over Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., by a single vote in a race he jumped into only this week, after the Nov. 7 elections gave Democrats control of the Senate by a 51-49 margin. Alexander began lining up support nearly a year ago

Lott, 65, will serve as GOP whip under newly anointed Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who was unopposed in his bid to succeed retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn. McConnell has served as whip for the past four years.

Alexander announced a week ago that he had lined up more than 25 votes — a majority of his caucus. But secret ballot elections for leadership posts are notorious for wrecking all advance nose counts.

Lott's victory is sweet redemption for a man whose long public career appeared to derail four years ago. Just weeks after Republicans chose him as majority leader following the 2002 elections, he was pressured out of the job after suggesting that the country would have been better off had former Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C. (1954-2003), won the presidency in 1948 running on his segregationist "Dixiecrat" platform.

DOJ_NMG_0095314

He contemplated retiring at the time, but decided he still could help funnel much-needed federal largess to Mississippi, one of the nation's poorest states. He hunkered down, and took over the chairmanship of the Rules Committee — a consolation prize he was given at the time by the new Frist-McConnell leadership team. McConnell had chaired the committee before he was chosen as whip.

Now, Lott — newly elected to a fourth Senate term — will be McConnell's deputy. Unlike the Kentuckian, a backstage operator with little appetite for dealing with the media, Lott glories in the give-and-take with reporters. His pithy assessments of the Senate's dynamics and quotable views on issues of the day have made him a media favorite.

The whip's race was the only contested leadership election for Republicans. Although no official announcements were available at mid-morning, Jon Kyl of Arizona was expected to replace Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania as Republican Conference chairman. Santorum was defeated in his re-election bid Nov. 7.

Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas was in line to be the Republican Policy Committee chairwoman, Kyl's current spot.

John Ensign of Nevada was expected to head the National Republican Senatorial Committee in the 2008 election cycle. Republicans will be defending 21 seats in 2008, compared with 12 Democratic seats in play. The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee will again be chaired by Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., whose record-breaking fundraising in the 2006 cycle gave Democrats a huge boost in their successful drive to recapture the majority.

In Senate Shift, Big Comeback For Trent Lott (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — In their rehabilitation campaign, Senate Republicans will rely heavily on a man whose recent history is itself a testament to sudden falls, unlikely recoveries and the fickle hands of fortune in American politics.

Senator Trent Lott of Mississippi, who went from Senate minority leader to presumptive majority leader to disgrace in a matter of days four years ago, was elected minority whip, the party's second-ranking Senate leadership position, on Wednesday.

Usually, the choice of a whip, a vital but unglamorous job, would draw little attention. But the election of Mr. Lott offers an unlikely study in professional redemption.

"One thing that this proves is that the United States Senate, like the American public, likes a comeback story," said Senator Lamar Alexander, the Tennessee Republican whom Mr. Lott defeated by a single vote.

Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who was said to be an important supporter of Mr. Lott, added, "He paid a pretty high price for the statement he made."

Mr. McCain was referring to a 100th birthday party toast for Senator Strom Thurmond, Republican of South Carolina, in which Mr. Lott seemed to praise Mr. Thurmond, a longtime segregationist, for his 1948 presidential campaign. Noting that his home state had voted for Mr. Thurmond then, Mr. Lott added: "We're proud of it. And if the rest of the country had followed our lead, we wouldn't have had all these problems."

Mr. Lott, who was in line to be the Senate majority leader, explained his comments as a well-intentioned tribute to a longtime colleague. He issued serial apologies, but was eventually forced to give up his leadership position.

"We all believe in redemption," Mr. McCain said Wednesday, adding, "Thank God."

Republicans favored Mr. Lott for the leadership post largely because of their election losses last week. With Republicans now a minority in the Senate, Mr. Lott was seen as effective in rounding up votes and striking deals. Several senators said the caucus badly needed his legislative expertise, including his ability to work across party lines. (Among the first well-wishers to call him Wednesday were two Democrats, Tom Daschle, the former Senate Democratic leader, and Senator Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts.)

Mr. Lott declined to be interviewed, citing a desire to allow the incoming minority leader, Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, to serve as the spokesman for the leadership team. "I'm going to shock you and defer," Mr. Lott told reporters. "The spotlight belongs on the leader today."

Mr. Lott, 65, made his way back into prominence by deploying the same skills that have sustained his political career. He courted and counted his votes carefully. He quietly did committee work and dutifully attended hearings. He earned credit by running for re-election this year rather than retiring, thereby saving what might have been a vulnerable Republican Senate seat. And he bided his time.

Mr. Lott has always been vigilant in allowing reason and results to prevail over emotion. He is a fierce pragmatist, who has spoken of his father's alcoholism and its effect on him. "It makes you maybe grow up a little early," he said in 1997.

DOJ_NMG_0095315

He has always craved order and leaves little to chance. In the throes of his crisis in 2002, Mr. Lott spent hours bunkered in his home in Pascagoula, Miss., methodically calling friends and colleagues — 50 calls a day — in an effort to save his job. It was a rigorous and disciplined process, similar to the one he followed in recent days as he campaigned quietly for the whip post. He contacted colleagues by phone and in person, emphasizing his ability to get results, his encyclopedic grasp of Senate rules and his skill in working closely with the House.

Once forced out of the leadership, Mr. Lott complained bitterly that Republican senators and the Bush administration had betrayed him.

"I'd been knifed in the back," Mr. Lott wrote in his book, "Herding Cats: A Life in Politics." "But in order to be effective again," he wrote, "I had to shake some of the hands that held the daggers."

Mr. Alexander recalls seeking Mr. Lott out to make sure he attended a celebration for new senators soon after he stepped down in 2002. Few expected Mr. Lott to attend, and he was not in a celebrating mood. But he showed up . "He wasn't pouting, "Mr. Alexander said. "He wasn't feeling sorry for himself."

Mr. Lott largely undertook his campaign for whip in one-on-one discussions, figuring that a visible effort would bring attention to his past troubles and perhaps scare off potential supporters.

"Nobody knew where he was; it was a stealth candidacy," said former Senator John B. Breaux, Democrat of Louisiana and one of Mr. Lott's closest friends. "His strategy was, 'Run silent, run deep,' like the old submarine."

Mr. Lott's "stealth" return was also forged over many quiet dealings and much legislative grunt work. "He reimmersed himself in committee work, went to a lot of hearings and asked a lot of questions," said Senator Olympia J. Snowe, Republican of Maine. "Once you've been a leader, it's hard to come back and do these things."

Mr. Lott's public fall was followed by a series of blunt remarks befitting a man who felt he had little to lose. "They're going to have to deal with me," he said of the Bush administration in a Time magazine interview in September 2003. "And they need to keep me in mind because I can be a problem."

He became a critic of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld ("I'm not a fan," he said in 2004.), the failed Supreme Court nominee Harriet E. Miers and Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales. He said President Bush should be "ashamed of the abysmal" way he had treated former Treasury Secretary John W. Snow, who resigned this year after months of lukewarm support from the White House. And he took repeated shots at Senator Bill Frist of Tennessee, his successor as Republican leader. (Mr. Frist did not seek re-election this year.)

Mr. Lott was at his most fervent after Hurricane Katrina. He became a vocal critic of the Federal Emergency Management Agency, challenged insurance companies that refused to cover damages from the storm and helped secure federal relief money for homeowners.

The hurricane destroyed Mr. Lott's home on the Gulf Coast and marked a pivot point in his life and career. Mr. Lott and his wife, Tricia, had decided in 2001 that he would not run for re-election this year. But the hurricane, which he called "a disastrous event of biblical proportions," spurred a reassessment. "I concluded that I still have a zest for the job here in Washington," he said in a news conference early this year. One of the many congratulatory calls to Mr. Lott on Wednesday came from Donna Brazile, a Democratic strategist and Louisiana native, who said she gained respect for Mr. Lott after the storm.

"I believe in reconciliation; I've always believed in that," Ms. Brazile said. "I'll never forget the morning that I had to suck it up and call Trent Lott to help me with my relatives in Mississippi." She added, "On Katrina, he's just been a champion."

Among the other callers were President Bush, from Air Force One. Vice President Dick Cheney offered his best wishes in person.

"It's just a hugely significant political victory for Trent, especially after he had the rug cut out from under him," Mr. Breaux said.

He said he believed Mr. Lott would thrive, given the makeup of the Senate and his ability to work with Democrats .

Mr. Breaux hastened to add a caveat: "Trent promised me he'd never give speeches at any more birthday parties."

Lott Rejoins Senate Leadership (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Four years after racially impolitic remarks cost him the Senate's top post, Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.) rejoined Congress's leadership ranks yesterday when his Republican colleagues turned to the veteran insider and skilled vote-counter to help them plot their return to majority status.

By a 25 to 24 secret-ballot vote, Lott defeated Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) for the position of minority whip, the party's second-highest post. As expected, GOP senators elected Mitch McConnell (Ky.) as Senate minority leader for the new Congress that will convene in January. But his victory was tempered by Lott's come-from-behind win over Alexander, who was seen as McConnell's and the Bush administration's preferred choice for whip.

DOJ_NMG_0095316

Lott's feat ranks among the more impressive political comebacks of recent times, just as his fall from grace in December 2002 was spectacular and painful. At a 100th-birthday party for then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), Lott said the nation "wouldn't have had all these problems" if Thurmond had been elected president in 1948. Thurmond had run on a segregationist platform as a Dixiecrat that year, and critics denounced the remarks as racist.

Lott said he was simply flattering an old man. But Bush administration supporters and other Republicans helped engineer his ouster just as he was about to become Senate majority leader again after the 2002 midterm elections, replacing him with Sen. Bill Frist (R-Tenn.). Now Frist is retiring, and Republicans are reeling from last week's elections, which gave Democrats a 51 to 49 edge in the Senate and a bigger margin in the House.

As GOP senators emerged from their closed-door meeting at the Capitol yesterday, several said the shock of last week's results prompted wavering colleagues to vote for Lott, who has spent 34 years in Congress (to Alexander's four), and much time negotiating deals and crafting compromises.

"We're going through a major transformation from the majority to minority status in both the House and Senate," said Sen. Olympia J. Snowe (Maine), a prominent GOP moderate and Lott supporter. "So it does require somebody who's got that institutional knowledge and appreciation for what it's going to take not only to rebuild Republicans within the institution but also nationally." Implicitly noting that Lott has never been close to President Bush, Snowe added that "there are times when you can't put all your eggs in the president's basket."

The White House said Bush, en route to Singapore, telephoned Lott from Air Force One to congratulate him.

Snowe said she thinks that Americans are ready to forgive Lott's Thurmond remarks. "He regrets it and has apologized," she said. "I think people have admired how he has been able to come back from that. He paid a heavy price, and he deeply regrets that, obviously."

Lott, 65, was uncharacteristically mum after the elections, telling reporters that it was McConnell's day to shine. Asked if he had any new reflections on the 1948 presidential race, he laughed and said, "Oh no, not at all. I'm strictly looking forward."

Almost from the day he joined the House in 1973, Lott -- a former cheerleader at the University of Mississippi -- was a genial and savvy insider who craved leadership posts. He was elected House minority whip in 1980, and 14 years later he became the first Republican to have been elected whip in both chambers. In that 1994 Senate GOP election, much like yesterday's, most party leaders opposed Lott, but many rank-and-file members rewarded him for years of friendship and guidance. He was Senate majority leader from June 1996 through mid-2001, except for a brief period in January 2001.

Yesterday, colleagues said the GOP's new minority status calls for a leader who has lived through such an experience and knows when to cut deals with the majority and when to stand firm. Alexander, a former governor and two-time presidential candidate, is well-liked, said Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), a Lott supporter. "But, at the end of the day, what helped swing it for Lott was that experience in the minority and knowing what the tactics and rules of engagement are," he said.

Referring to Lott's Thurmond comments, Thune said that Americans believe in redemption. "It's one of those things that happened fairly long ago," he said, "and people have moved on."

Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, was less forgiving. "For many African Americans the sting of Trent Lott's hurtful words are unlikely to expire anytime soon," he said in a written statement. "However, his Republican colleagues have given him a second chance to address many of the glaring disparities that impact poor people, particularly African Americans, that he and his party have ignored for so long."

Lott Returns To GOP Leadership Position (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON - Four years after his racially incendiary remarks forced him to step down as Senate Republican leader, Trent Lott of Mississippi was born again politically on Wednesday, winning the second-ranking post of Republican whip.

As expected, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky was chosen unanimously for the top job of Senate minority leader, beginning in January.

The new Senate GOP leadership team represents a return to pragmatism. They're seasoned GOP parliamentarians who are expected to cross party lines and buck the White House more often than did retiring Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., who concentrated more on pleasing the president and the Republican Party base that's key to his presidential hopes for 2008.

McConnell and Lott are Senate traditionalists, and while both are conservative partisans, they also know how to cut deals to get things done.

DOJ_NMG_0095317

"I can work with Mitch," said the next Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, D-Nev., who praised McConnell's understanding of how the Senate operates. Reid's deputy, Sen. Richard Durbin of Illinois, said dealing with McConnell would be a "double-edged sword" because as much as McConnell might see the benefits of cooperation, he also would be skilled at obstruction when he chose.

In an interview, Lott said it was "very likely" that Republicans would join Democrats in increasing the minimum wage if it could be packaged with incentives for businesses. "I have a pragmatist side to me and I'm also a populist. I have a blue-collar, working-class family background, and that feeling wells up in me sometimes."

The next big congressional leadership showdown comes Thursday. House of Representatives Democrats will select their No. 2 leader for the next Congress, when they'll be in the majority for the first time since 1994.

The contest pits the popular moderate Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland against Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, who led Democrats in questioning the Iraq war over the past year and has the support of incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif.

But Murtha also has some ethics issues.

Murtha was a target in the federal Abscam probe of congressional corruption a quarter-century ago. He refused to take a bribe from undercover FBI agents, but a secret film of the exchange shows him suggesting that he might be open to a cash payoff later: "You know, we do business for awhile, maybe I'll be interested," Murtha said. He was never indicted.

Voters last week rejected Republican rule in Congress in part because of disgust with corruption scandals. If the first decision newly elected House Democrats make is to choose Murtha as their No. 2 leader, they risk tarnishing their image on ethics before they even take power.

In addition, Murtha has a reputation for playing pork-barrel politics as one of the House's key appropriators. Another reason voters rejected Republicans was because of their outrage at their soaring spending, especially on special "earmarks," or pork projects inserted into spending bills by appropriators such as Murtha as special favors for lawmakers in exchange for their support.

Elevating Murtha thus could undercut the credibility of Pelosi's vow to rid Capitol Hill of corruption. But Murtha is a loyal lieutenant to Pelosi, and she's said to have a grudge against Hoyer, who challenged her unsuccessfully for party whip in 2001.

On Wednesday, however, it was the Senate Republicans' secret-ballot elections that captivated Capitol Hill.

"We are unified in our desire to work with the Democrats across party lines to see what we can accomplish for the country," McConnell said, with his leadership team at his side. "But we will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority and hopefully a minority that is only in that condition for a couple of years."

McConnell has largely supported the president and corporate America and led a high-profile attempt to block campaign-finance limits, saying they infringed on free speech. He also crossed party leaders in blocking a ban on flag burning. He's married to Labor Secretary Elaine Chao.

As for Lott, several Republicans said their party has benefited over the years from his brokering of bipartisan deals for a higher minimum wage, welfare reform, health insurance portability and tax cuts.

Lott edged out Tennessee Sen. Lamar Alexander for the whip's job by one vote, and GOP senators at the closed-door session said the Mississippian's eyes filled with tears upon his victory.

In an interview later, Lott said his return to leadership "takes on extra meaning for me because of how I exited it and what I went through last year. I lost my mother and I lost my house (to Hurricane Katrina). All of that just kind of welled up in that moment."

Lott was forced to step down as the Republicans' leader in 2002 after his remarks at a 100th birthday celebration for Sen. Strom Thurmond, who'd run for president in 1948 as a segregationist. Lott had said that "we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years" if Thurmond had won.

Lott's subsequent apology and explanation that he'd meant to honor Thurmond's life accomplishments, not segregation, failed to save him.

With President Bush's backing, Frist, a heart surgeon with weaker political instincts and less experience than Lott, stepped in, but he's been roundly criticized for political miscalculations.

Lott, meanwhile, has worked behind the scenes to redeem himself with colleagues, and he drew bipartisan praise last year for advocating for Hurricane Katrina victims.

He'd planned to retire, but after Katrina, chose to seek re-election. "I worked very hard to show I can take a lick and keep on going, and I was not just going to go away and sulk and give up the ghost. I took my lumps and I licked my wounds, and I came back."

Reid called Lott's victory "a great comeback."

Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, a swing vote on many issues, said of Lott, "Because of where we are today and because he did have those skills, we needed to take advantage of his capabilities and talents and skills and institutional knowledge."

DOJ_NMG_0095318

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Lott "is the most adept at getting legislation passed of anyone I've ever known, probably . . . I think most people think he paid a pretty heavy price for the mistake that he made. We all believe in redemption, thank God."

The More Things Change ... (NYT)

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

As victorious Democrats choose the Capitol hierarchy to promote their promises of reform, and Republicans choose their new minority leadership, they are entitled to their own best judgments. With that in mind, we have no prime candidates to tout for caucus leadership. We just want to remind lawmakers of the one clear message from this muddled election season: voters wanted something other than the old back-scratching status quo.

So far, the Democrats seem not to have paid much attention to the tattered baggage lugged into the limelight by Representative John Murtha of Pennsylvania, the Iraq war critic who is Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi's choice for second in command. And yesterday, Republicans resurrected Trent Lott, the Mississippi senator who fell from the majority leader's post three years ago.

For all his commendable instincts in articulating the Bush administration's Iraq failures, Mr. Murtha has long been known in the Capitol as a crude master of swapping pork-barrel budget goodies for lobbyists' campaign lucre. Only recently, he stood out for opposing strong ethics reform.

And while Ms. Pelosi is vowing to hammer home ethics reform as her first order of business, the Capitol newspaper Roll Call reported that Mr. Murtha was vulgarly belittling her program in private meetings with lawmakers. Mr. Murtha's ambition is directed against the current No. 2, Representative Steny Hoyer of Maryland, who also is no slouch in maintaining overly close ties to the K Street business and lobbying powers.

The Republicans' defeat at the polls has sparked decidedly Transylvanian initiatives: Mr. Lott, who tripped from power over racially charged remarks he made in a fit of Dixiecrat nostalgia, has returned to new life as No. 2 in the minority leadership. And Representative John Boehner, finished as House majority leader, is plumping for resurrection as minority leader. At least Speaker Dennis Hastert was chagrined enough to drop the gavel and head for the shadows in the face of the voters' verdict.

Voters can only hope the party conferences this week do not signal that the obvious lessons of Election Day are already being lost on the next Congress.

Alexander Spins Leadership Loss As Good For Constituents (NCP)

By Jared Allen

Nashville City Paper, November 16, 2006

After a last-minute and surprise loss in his bid to become the No. 2 Republican in the U.S. Senate, an upbeat Lamar Alexander on Wednesday tried to spin his stunning loss to former Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott as good for Tennessee.

Despite going into Wednesday morning's GOP conference leadership elections confident that he had secured more than a majority of the votes necessary to succeed Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., as Republican whip, Alexander lost by one vote to Lott, who had announced his intention to run for the leadership post only a week-and-a-half ago.

"Senator Lott conclusively proved he's a better vote counter than I," Alexander said in a Wednesday afternoon conference call with reporters.

Alexander, who had said as late as Tuesday night that he had 27 of the 49 Republican votes, ended up with the support of only 24 of his GOP colleagues, one shy of the 25 gained by Lott.

"Some people changed their minds," Alexander said with a laugh in describing what happened.

"I would have been better off if the vote had been 11 p.m. last night [when] I had 27 votes," he said.

Saying that last minute "changes or switches are not unusual," Alexander explained that he was likely beaten by a delayed backlash against those — including former Sen. Majority Leader and Tennessee Senator Bill Frist — who helped orchestrate Lott's ouster as Majority Leader four years ago.

"One of the senators said to me at lunch that this was about redemption. Some senators felt as though [Lott] was treated unfairly four years ago and wanted to give him a second chance," Alexander, who is now Tennessee's senior senator, said. "There are lots of personal feelings that come into decisions like this."

After remarking publicly that the United States would have been better off had then-Dixiecrat and segregationalist presidential candidate Strom Thurman won election to the White House in 1948, Lott was forced to step down as Republican leader.

Alexander said he harbors no ill will toward Lott, who he said remains his "good friend," and pledged to support both Lott and McConnell, who was elected to succeed Frist as the GOP leader.

DOJ_NMG_0095319

But Alexander said that while he openly wanted the whip post — which he campaigned for over a year for, and that he thought he had locked up after Sen. Rick Santorum (R-PA) failed in his bid to return to the Senate – he believes his loss will free him up to vote his conscience on issues, rather than fight for party votes.

"I'm a pretty independent fellow, anyway," the former Tennessee Governor said. "And having my independence increased on the issues I care about the most appeals to me a lot."

Alexander said education, energy, job creation and the environment will continue to sit atop his legislative agenda.

Senate GOP Focusing More On Big Picture Than Lame Duck (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, November 16, 2006

Newly elected Senate Republican Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) convened his new leadership team for the first time late yesterday afternoon to take stock of its party's recent setback at the polls and to plot the future.

The leaders discussed next month's leadership retreat and the importance of keeping open the channels of communication among themselves, but they did not discuss in depth how to handle the few remaining weeks of the Republican majority. Leaving Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) in charge of next month's agenda has created somewhat of a leadership vacuum in a growing split within the Senate GOP conference over spending priorities.

"We might have an opinion, but others are in charge right now," Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.), the newly elected Republican whip, said after the meeting when asked about the chamber's immediate agenda. Democrats take control of the Senate in January, but the remaining Republicans' legislative agenda in this Congress is significantly hampered by their poor showing at the polls.

Earlier in the afternoon, the entire Republican conference met to assess last week's election and discuss what they hoped to accomplish before turning power over to the Democrats.

Behind closed doors, frustrated Republicans voiced concern that they lost six seats because they have drifted away from their core principles, said participants.

First and foremost, Republican senators are distressed that the GOP is no longer regarded as the party of fiscal discipline, an anxiety that is fueling a debate over how to handle the pending appropriations bills. The unfinished spending bills make up a significant portion of the work leaders hope to complete during the lame-duck session in December.

While Frist, who will retire from the upper chamber at the end of the year, is still technically the majority leader, and outgoing Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) is still the GOP conference chairman, the real power in the Republican leadership has passed onto the new leadership team: McConnell, the Republican leader-elect; Lott, the Republican whip-elect; and Sen. Jon Kyl (Ariz.), the elected Republican conference chairman.

One of the new leadership's first challenges is to bridge schisms that have emerged within the Republican conference over how to handle the remaining spending bills.

But members confined their first meeting to other topics, according to participants.

At a closed-door meeting of the Senate Republican conference yesterday, lawmakers argued back and forth over whether to attempt to complete the nine outstanding appropriations bills.

A group of Republicans led by Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) argued that to cut costs, the spending bills should be left unfinished, said colleagues. DeMint believes that Congress should freeze spending at current levels by passing a stopgap measure funding government into next year.

"There are some people who want to do that and I think that's a very bad move," said Sen. Kit Bond (R-Mo.), a senior member of the Senate Appropriations Committee. "The Democrats have indicated that they want to cooperate, so I think we need to get everyone on the buggy and do the job we were elected to do."

Some Republican strategists believe that pushing the spending bills into next year would tie up the Democrats and make it more difficult for them to aggressively pursue their agenda on other issues such as Iraq, Medicare, and middle-class tax cuts.

A White House official said that is a major reason for why Democratic leaders are eager to cooperate on finishing the spending bills this year.

Meanwhile, another conservative Republican freshman, Sen. Tom Coburn (Okla.), has prepared nearly 40 amendments to strike earmarks in the pending agriculture appropriations bills. And he has made it known that he plans to attack other project-laden spending bills in the same way, setting his colleagues up for a slow legislative grind if they decide to pass appropriations bills individually in December, as some lawmakers have urged.

"His concern is that voters want to see the favor factory shut down, not turned over to new management," said John Hart, Coburn's spokesman. "The worst response Congress can have to the elections is to go on an earmark spending binge with one of the first appropriations bills."

DOJ_NMG_0095320

"I think there are a number of different fractures within the conference on the bills," said Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), chairman of the Homeland Security Appropriations Subcommittee. "There are people like myself who don't like to see the emergency spending being thrown in there, there are people like Coburn who don't like the earmarks, there are people like DeMint who think they should be kicked over to the next Congress like [former Sen. Tom] Daschle [D-S.D.] kicked it over to us, and there are people like [Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman] Thad Cochran [R-Miss.] who want to get it done because they think it's their job."

While some lawmakers are pushing for the stopgap spending measure, and others want to pass as many individual bills as possible, a third option would be to combine the bills into a massive omnibus spending package, or several smaller "minibus" packages.

GOP leaders had hoped to pass the agriculture bill before recessing for Thanksgiving, but that may not be possible because of nearly $9 billion in emergency spending that may accompany the legislation, drawing protests from conservative Republicans.

Leaders also hope to ratify a nuclear non-proliferation treaty with India. White House Chief of Staff Josh Bolten, who sat in on yesterday's Senate Republican conference meeting, exhorted the assembled lawmakers to pass the bill. Lawmakers said there was a chance of doing that last night.

A Senate GOP leadership aide said that in addition to the spending bills, other items on the December agenda include legislation giving Vietnam permanent normal trade status, a package of tax-cut extensions, and legislation addressing the threat of bioterrorism.

Senate Republicans have not yet placed offshore drilling legislation on their December agenda because it's not clear whether a similar bill could be passed in the House.

A House GOP leadership aide said that House Republican leaders would put the Vietnam trade bill back on the floor next month, as well as a package of tax-cut extensions. In a surprise vote, the House rejected the Vietnam trade measure earlier this week.

What tax cuts will be in the package is still the subject of bicameral negotiations.

The House aide said that Republican leaders, chairmen and rank-and-file members are also debating whether to finish the appropriations bills or postpone their completion until the next Congress.

May The Best Bulldog Win: GOP Rivals (HILL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Hill, November 16, 2006

House Republicans have already begun mapping their attack strategy for the next two years.

Leadership candidates have highlighted their plans to hammer the incoming Democratic majority for ethical lapses, fiscal irresponsibility and legislative mismanagement, borrowing from a playbook those same Democrats used with great success to unseat the Republican majority.

Leadership hopefuls have made regaining the majority the central thrust of their campaigns, but rank-and-file members are debating as to which candidates can successfully implement their attack strategies as well as the particulars of the individual plans.

Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), who is locked in a tight race with Rep. John Shadegg (R-Ariz.) to retain his post in the next Congress, released a detailed roadmap yesterday to unify Republicans on tough votes, offer viable alternatives to Democratic bills on the floor and target potentially vulnerable Democrats on every tough vote.

Blunt is trying to make his procedural knowledge a big advantage over Shadegg heading into a potentially tight election with the Arizona conservative.

In the strategy memo, entitled "24 Months to a New Republican Majority — A Plan for Victory," Blunt outlined 60 Democratic seats carried by President Bush in 2004 where Republican leaders will apply pressure either to flip Democrats on the floor or punish them in campaign materials for voting with party leaders.

"We must hold our Conference together to deny [presumptive House Speaker] Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) victory and force vulnerable Democrats to take tough votes," Blunt wrote. "This won't be as simple as going to the floor every day and simply voting 'no.' We will have to offer well-crafted alternatives that allow some of our Members to vote 'yes' on a better plan before voting on the Pelosi plan."

Blunt outlines amendments he would offer to projected votes implementing pay-go rules in the budget process, raising the minimum wage and allowing the federal government to negotiate drug prices with pharmaceutical companies, each of which is expected to be part of package offered by Democrats in the first 100 hours of their majority.

DOJ_NMG_0095321

"It's going to take a lot more than that," said Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill about offering amendments to sink the Democratic legislation. "There is consensus on each of these issues, and I think there will be a push for clean passage" on the popular measures.

Shadegg also offered members his own broad vision statement yesterday in which he promises to work with the next chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee to hold freshman Democrats accountable for the campaign promises they made during the last cycle.

In an echo of the GOP's combative stance, Rep. Bill Thomas (R-Calif.), the retiring chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, gave an impassioned speech to members yesterday during their regularly scheduled conference meeting, members and aides said afterward.

"The wake is over," Thomas told his Republican colleagues yesterday while imploring those who will remain next year to use their power as a minority to exploit divisions on the other side of the aisle.

Thomas, who has never shied from partisan sparring, told his soon-to-be-former colleagues to hammer Pelosi immediately for her attempts to elevate Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) to the majority leader post despite his role as an un-indicted co-conspirator in the FBI's Abscam investigation.

As members prepare to elect a new slate of leaders in the wake of their devastating electoral loss, Republicans appear likely to elect a slate of familiar faces to the leadership, even though many lawmakers are concerned this could send the wrong message to voters.

During a closed-door meeting of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), Blunt hinted that four members of the current leadership — himself; his chief deputy, Rep. Eric Cantor (R-Va.); Majority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio); and Republican Policy Committee Chairman Adam Putnam (R-Fla.) — will return to the leadership, an aide present said.

Blunt is trying to hold his post as whip despite a groundswell of support for Cantor. There has been talk of organizing a write-in candidacy for the Virginia Republican, but members and staff are doubtful that a member will stand up and nominate him in the conference meeting for fear of angering Blunt.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) circulated a letter yesterday outlining his own vision for Republicans in the minority in which he questions the wisdom of electing familiar faces to the leadership.

"Are House Republicans electing a leadership team to be an effective minority or a leadership team to regain the majority?" Gingrich wrote to members. "These are very different roles and require very different considerations, very different strategies and very different leaders."

Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.), the self-proclaimed "cheerful pugilist" who chairs the RSC, delivered a fervent speech to centrist members of the Tuesday Group yesterday that one aide present believed would sway at least a few members in attendance, even though Boehner is still considered the front-runner.

Pence ducked into an empty conference room with Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas), who is also running for leader, after making his presentation, but denied afterward that the two were conspiring against Boehner, the odds-on favorite.

In addition, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) announced his endorsement of Shadegg yesterday, even though Shadegg's team debated releasing the senator's endorsement during the race for leader last winter. Some House Republicans are not fond of McCain, claiming he's a liberal Republican who constantly seeks media attention.

Republicans have punted one of the biggest questions about their reorganization until after the reorganization caucus this Friday.

Rep. Deborah Pryce (R-Ohio), the outgoing chair of the Republican Conference, told members in their closed-door meeting yesterday that leaders would not introduce a revised conference rules package until members return from the Thanksgiving holiday. Staff for outgoing Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Rules Chairman David Dreier (R-Calif.) will work with the staff of the newly elected leaders to craft the final package.

The two big questions at this point regard term limits for ranking members — whether or not service as chairman counts against members in vying for ranking member slots and whether those ranking members will be chosen solely for seniority or will be allowed to make presentations to the reconfigured Steering Committee.

Most of the members vying for those slots have already made inquires with leadership about that process and will continue to angle for those slots as leaders craft the new rules.

"We're waiting on leadership selection," said Rep. Richard Baker (R-La.), the senior Republican on the Financial Services Committee, who was in a tight race to chair the committee before last week's loss. "It's too early at the moment to know how it will play out."

Baker's chief rival for the slot, Rep. Spencer Bachus (R-Ala.) — should Pryce and Dreier not ask to be considered — will also continue to campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0095322

"It matters," Bachus said of becoming the ranking Republican. "Whoever the ranking member is absolutely has a step up" in a potential future race to become chairman.

To Learn From '06, We Must Heed Lessons Of '94 (RC)

By Rep. John Boehner
Roll Call, November 16, 2006

In the wake of last week's defeat, Republicans have engaged in a serious and much-needed dialogue about our party and its future. This is a healthy exercise, and one from which Republicans will emerge stronger.

In my letter announcing my candidacy for House Minority Leader, I talked about my experiences in the early 1990s. Instead of settling for our minority status back in 1993-94 and adopting the mindset of a permanent minority, we set out to change things in a big way.

In 1994 we developed the vision that led to the "Contract with America," which proudly said that House Republicans were ready as a team to take on the Washington, D.C., status quo. One of the secrets of the contract's success was that we recognized the things that unite Republicans across the spectrum are tax cuts, spending taxpayers' dollars wisely, ethics and accountability, and reforming government programs to demand results. We also recognized these ideas and policies have the added benefit of bringing in more and more Americans to support the conservative cause.

If we want our majority back in 2008, House Republicans need to get back to these basics and rededicate ourselves to the reform mindset that put us in the majority. We need to rebuild the Republican coalition by focusing on conservative ideas that can win broad-based support not just among House Members, but among the American people.

It's something you've heard me say time and time again: Good policy equals good politics. Together, we'll produce a next generation of great Republican ideas while always adhering to our core principles: a smaller, smarter, less-intrusive federal government. We'll draw on the talents of every Member and look to the outside for solutions.

We'll aggressively sell these solutions inside and outside the Beltway, using traditional and new media, and our network of friends and allies throughout the country. This will be hard work — no one Leader can do this — but working together as a team, we can get it done.

We also must work to prevent, root out and punish corruption and ethics violations. In 1994 we changed our rules to deny prime positions to any Member who had been indicted. But the appalling behavior of various Members on both sides of the aisle makes it clear we must do more.

The existing ethics committee process must be faster, and we need to give it teeth. More to the point, I simply will not tolerate ethical misconduct in our Conference. Clear likelihood of serious transgressions will lead to suspension from important committee posts; guilt will lead to immediate and severe consequences.

The Minority Leader will need to hold every Democrat accountable for their behavior, their promises and their policies. The Leader will need to fight for fairness for all Republican Members, in committee assignments, resources and process.

The Leader will need to look in every corner of every Democrat-held district to help recruit candidates to win back the majority, and to ensure our candidates have the resources they'll need to compete and win. In short, the job of a Republican Leader in the minority will be to hold the job for as short a time as possible.

My collective experiences in the House — as a minority backbencher; as a co-author of the Contract with America; as Republican Conference chairman; as chairman of a committee; and as Majority Leader — have given me the perspective and experience our Conference needs to lead this effort.

These elections weren't a battle of ideas in which Americans embraced the values of Democrats over Republicans. We failed to meet the expectations of voters who supported us since 1994. Simply announcing our intention to return to our core principles is not enough. We need a Leader who knows how to build teams; how to articulate a vision for the future; how to set bold goals that bring out the best in our team; and how to achieve those goals.

I was in the minority once, and I hated it. I know how we got out of the wilderness, and I know how we built a majority that delivered reforms that changed American history. I know we can do it again. If House Republicans honor me with their vote, I will help lead the way.

Rep. John Boehner (R-Ohio) is House Majority Leader.

Conservative Democrats Seek Larger Role (AP-Y)

By Jim Abrams, Associated Press Writer
AP, November 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0095323

For a dozen years, the Democratic conservatives known as Blue Dogs have been baying at the moon, ignored by Republicans and tolerated by their more liberal Democratic colleagues. Now, these House lawmakers say that is about to change.

Republicans "did not lose their seats to liberal Democrats" in last weeks elections, said Rep. Mike Ross, D-Ark. "Republicans lost their seats to Blue Dog Democrats."

"We'll have a lot to say about what passes and what doesn't" when the 110th Congress convenes in January with Democrats in control for the first time in 12 years, said Ross, new communications director for the caucus.

With the addition of nine newly elected freshmen, the Blue Dogs claim 44 members, nearly 20 percent of the incoming Democratic majority. They will be led by Rep. Allen Boyd, D-Fla., and include Rep. Collin Peterson, D-Minn., in line to become the next Agriculture Committee chairman.

The Blue Dogs were formed in 1994 after Republicans swept the long-entrenched Democrats from power. They tend to be social conservatives on such issues as abortion. But their big issue is fiscal discipline — balancing the budget and reducing the federal debt.

Many in the group are from the South, and the group took its name from the old adage that southerners would vote for yellow dog if he were on the Democratic ballot. A blue dog, they decided, was a moderate or conservative "choked blue" by the Democrats in the years leading up to 1994.

Already, leaders from both parties are courting their votes. Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi, a California liberal, has promised to make "paygo," a Blue Dog-backed principle that any new spending be paid for with cuts in other programs or new revenues, one of her first legislative goals.

"Leader Pelosi looks forward to working with the Blue Dogs in the 110th Congress," said Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's spokeswoman. "They are important voices in our diverse caucus."

Rep. Mike Pence, R-Ind., who is running for the position of Republican leader in the next Congress, listed cooperation with the Blue Dogs as part of his platform.

"We also will attempt to restart the old GOP-Boll Weevil coalition that proved so successful in the 1980s to advance President Reagan's revolution," Pence said. "There are Blue Dog Democrats that want to balance the budget, address our nation's abounding debt, strengthen Social Security and protect life and marriage. Our minority will look for opportunities to work with them when there is agreement."

Linda Fowler, professor of government at Dartmouth College, said the influence of the Blue Dogs could depend on President Bush. If the president "shows interest in legislation on Social Security, the deficit, and fiscal issues that the Blue Dogs care about, then I think they will have a lot of leverage," Fowler said.

Americans, said Stephanie Herseth, a Blue Dog Democrat from heavily Republican South Dakota, "are looking for leadership from the center." She said they will seek consensus with other Democrats while at the same time will "certainly continue to work with our Republican friends in a bipartisan way."

On the Net:

Blue Dogs: http://www.house.gov/cardoza/BlueDogs/bluedogs.shtml

'Tuesday Dogs' May Join Forces (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And Susan Davis

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

In an effort to boost their influence in the sharply divided chamber, members of the moderate Republican and Democratic House factions indicated Wednesday that the two groups may coordinate efforts in the 110th Congress and could move to create a formal bipartisan coalition in the new session.

Members of the fiscally conservative Democratic Blue Dog Coalition and the centrist Republican Tuesday Group met in advance of the Nov. 7 elections, Rep. Jim Matheson (D-Utah) said Wednesday, to discuss areas where the groups could align.

“We have a lot of common interests,” Matheson, a co-chairman of the Blue Dogs in the 109th Congress, said of his meeting with Republican Rep. Mark Kirk (Ill.), who co-chairs the Tuesday Group.

According to Matheson, the moderate coalitions are most likely to work together on pro-growth and fiscal legislation, while Kirk cited issues such as expanding stem-cell research and portions of the “Suburban Agenda,” an effort spearheaded by Kirk that includes legislation to stop online sexual predators and improve access to health care.

“At this point, we’re starting a dialogue,” Kirk said in an interview Wednesday, adding that the recent influx of new moderate Democrats elected last Tuesday will bolster opportunities to govern “from the political center.”

Kirk said the two groups will hold a luncheon to swap legislative agendas when Congress returns the week of Dec. 4. There they will discuss the possible creation of a new bipartisan caucus that Kirk dubbed the “Tuesday Dogs.”

DOJ_NMG_0095324

With the defeat of six current Tuesday Group members, as well as a co-chairman, Rep. Charles Bass (R-N.H.), Kirk said the group also will hold leadership elections in December to name a new co-chairman. He estimated the group's roster in the next Congress to total 35 members.

Rep. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.) is one moderate viewed as a potential candidate for co-chairman, although others could step forward.

"There's a lot more that unites us than divides us," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), who will be a co-chairman of the Blue Dogs next year. "The American people expect us to reach across the aisle. There may be temptation to 'get even' [with Republicans in the 110th Congress], but I think that would be a huge mistake."

Although the Blue Dog leaders had attempted similar meetings with moderate Republicans in the current session, Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.) said he believes those efforts never came to fruition because of pressure from the GOP leadership.

"There may be more opportunity now," said Cardoza, a co-chairman of the coalition in the current Congress. Citing the number of moderate Republican losses in the recent elections, Cardoza added: "Now they're emboldened ... to be more aggressive on behalf of the national agenda, instead of the party agenda."

During a Wednesday morning press conference to introduce the newest Blue Dog lawmakers, several of the coalition's leaders stressed that the group will work on bipartisan efforts in the next session.

"The Blue Dogs believe in partnership, not partisanship," said Rep. Allen Boyd (D-Fla.), who along with Ross and Rep. Dennis Moore (D-Kan.) will chair the group in the new Congress. Rep. Stephanie Herseth (D-S.D.) will serve as the group's whip.

"We're not going to be a rubber stamp for anyone. We're going to help bring our party back to the middle," Ross said of the 44-member coalition, which includes nine freshman lawmakers. "We have a lot to say about what passes or doesn't pass when it reaches the floor."

The Blue Dogs also discussed their 12-point agenda, which calls on Congress to pass a constitutional amendment mandating a balanced budget; restore "pay as you go" budget guidelines through 2010; implement new rules requiring roll call votes for spending bills with more than $50 million in new spending; establish strict rules on emergency spending, as well as establishing a "rainy day" fund for those funds; subject any increase in the debt limit to a roll call vote; implement new rules requiring all Congressional earmarks to include publicly accessible justifications; new guidelines requiring a three-day minimum for Members to review legislation before a scheduled vote; as well as new guidelines requiring House committees to detail their oversight efforts in biannual reports.

What You Heard About 'Conservative Democrats' Winning Was Wrong (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

It quickly has become conventional wisdom that last week's Democratic House victory swept in a crop of moderate and conservative Democrats who'll both keep party liberals in check and help remake the image of the party of former Vice President Al Gore, Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) and soon-to-be Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

Well, I met dozens of Democrats running in 2006 — no, not everyone, but most of them — and I can't find much more than a couple who merit the label "conservative." That's not meant to be either criticism or praise. It's merely a statement of fact.

North Carolina Rep.-elect Heath Shuler surely qualifies as a culturally conservative Democrat, but the pro-life, pro-gun Democrat who is a member of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes is the exception, not the rule. Virtually all of the Democrats I interviewed were pro-choice, favored rolling back President Bush's tax cuts and sounded traditional Democratic themes on education, the environment and foreign policy.

In Connecticut, Reps.-elect Chris Murphy and Joe Courtney are pretty typical Northern liberals. In New York, Rep.-elect John Hall, who I didn't meet, appears to be quite left of center. Two upstate Democrats, Reps.-elect Kirsten Gillibrand and Michael Arcuri, have more moderate personas, but I wouldn't go so far as to call them conservatives, or even moderates.

Arcuri often referred to himself as a "Boehlert Democrat," a label that won't make conservatives who cringed at the voting record of retiring Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R) the least bit comfortable. Gillibrand, who is impossible not to like, didn't sound like a liberal firebrand, but I'd be surprised if her record was much different from that of most Northeast Democrats.

In Pennsylvania, there is no reason to believe that Reps.-elect Patrick Murphy and Joe Sestak will be anything but typical suburban Philadelphia Democrats: If you are a liberal, you'll like them, and if you aren't, you probably won't.

In Florida, Rep.-elect Ron Klein's state legislative voting record seems consistent with a liberal Democrat, and while some observers have pointed out that Rep.-elect Tim Mahoney talked a moderate line during his campaign and is a former Republican, my notes from my interview with him show that he has not supported a Republican presidential nominee for more than 20 years and seems likely to vote along traditional Democratic lines.

DOJ_NMG_0095325

Texas Rep.-elect Nick Lampson may have to vote like a moderate or conservative if he has any hope of winning re-election in Texas' 22nd district in two years, but his record when he was in Congress was not what one normally would identify as conservative, or even moderate.

My interview with California Rep.-elect Jerry McNerney suggests he's quite liberal. The same goes for Rep.-elect Steve Kagen in Wisconsin. I didn't interview Iowa's newly elected Member, Dave Loebsack, but his profile — he's a political science professor at Cornell College and ran against middle-of-the-road GOP Rep. Jim Leach from the left — suggests he's no moderate.

In Ohio, Rep.-elect Charlie Wilson is conservative on cultural issues, so that makes him a relatively moderate Democrat. But fellow Buckeye State Rep.-elect Betty Sutton certainly isn't a moderate, and although I didn't meet Rep.-elect Zack Space, I am told by people who did that his views seem fairly liberal.

I wrote after the previous cycle that I liked Indiana Democrat Joe Donnelly and hoped he'd run again, but I'd never call him a conservative Democrat. On the other hand, Rep.-elect Brad Ellsworth told me that he is pro-life, supports a constitutional amendment defining marriage and supports capital punishment, so he does appear to be a moderate Democrat.

Then there is Rep.-elect Baron Hill, who, if you ask him, probably will call himself a moderate Democrat. The only problem is that voters in Indiana's 9th district fired him two years ago because they thought he was a cultural liberal who tried to have issues both ways.

I've never met Rep.-elect John Yarmuth, who knocked off Rep. Anne Northup (R-Ky.) and has a reputation for being both very personable and very liberal. Kansas Rep.-elect Nancy Boyda is pro-choice, and as far as I can tell, there is no reason to see her as a moderate.

Kentucky Democrat Ken Lucas would have been a conservative Democrat, but he lost. Florida's Christine Jennings, a bank president, might have been moderate on business issues, but she apparently lost narrowly.

Colorado Rep.-elect Ed Perlmutter? Liberal. Iowa Rep.-elect Bruce Braley? Very liberal. Arizona Rep.-elect Gabrielle Giffords? Liberal, I think.

Now let me be very clear about my point. I'm not saying that it's good or bad that most of these Democrats are likely to be pretty typical members of their party. I'm only saying that's where they fit. A bunch of conservative Democrats didn't win election last week.

So how and why did the buzz get going that the Democrats elected last Tuesday foreshadow a different Democratic Party? I'm not sure.

Part of it may have been all the hype about Democrats "broadening the playing field" and possibly taking very Republican seats in Idaho, Nebraska, Colorado, Washington, Wyoming and Indiana. That didn't happen, though in some cases the Democrats running for those seats performed well above what would be expected for their party.

Though there were obvious exceptions, most of the House takeovers occurred in swing and Democratic-leaning districts, and those districts elected pretty conventional Democrats.

The election of Bob Casey Jr. (Pa.) to the Senate may have added to the impression that Democrats were sending moderates and conservatives to Washington, D.C. But again, Casey — who opposes legal abortion — is the exception, not the rule.

House Democrats way well attempt to steer a more moderate path between now and 2008, especially since their opportunities are limited with Bush in the White House. But if that happens, it would be the result of a pragmatic decision by party leaders, not the result of an infusion of moderates and conservatives into their party last week.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Which Bipartisanship Will Bush Choose? (WSJ)

By Newt Gingrich

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

The election results pose two enormous strategic choices for America. First, the obvious outcome of a Democratic-controlled Congress and a Republican White House is the need for bipartisan cooperation in order to get anything done. The key question is: Which kind of bipartisanship will emerge? Will there be a Ronald Reagan approach to bipartisanship which appeals to the conservative majority of the House? Or will there be an establishment bipartisanship which cuts deals between liberals and the White House? Second: Will the departure of Donald Rumsfeld and his replacement by Robert Gates lead to a tactical effort to minimize the difficulties of Iraq, or to a fundamental rethinking of the larger threats to American safety?

These two choices are strikingly interrelated. An establishment bipartisanship between the White House and liberal congressional leaders will almost certainly make it necessary to focus narrowly on how to minimize difficulties in Iraq and postpone consideration of the larger threats to America for the remainder of this and into the next presidency. By contrast, a conservative bipartisanship that knits together the House Republicans and the Blue Dog Democrats into a floor majority, working with a White House that emphasizes popular issues at the grassroots, would make it much easier to focus on the larger threats to American safety. (Such a bipartisanship could stress making the cap gains tax cut permanent; controlling set-asides and discretionary spending; oversight on failing bureaucracies and waste; English as the language of government; and biofuels as part of an energy policy.)

DOJ_NMG_0095326

How these bipartisanship choices are made will do a great deal to define our government and politics for the next few years. Each strategy cross-pressures a different part of the House and Senate. Each requires some members to choose between their loyalty to their values and those held by their districts on the one hand and their party leadership on the other.

A liberal establishment strategy will almost certainly split the GOP and lead to a grassroots rebellion against the kind of policies which a Pelosi-Reid alliance would force on the White House. House Republicans would find themselves split again and again as their leadership cooperated with Nancy Pelosi to bring forward liberal legislation. Conservative senators would find themselves blocking and filibustering liberal legislation brought forward by the Senate establishment Republican leadership and Harry Reid. Their supporters at home would be angrily insistent on active opposition to a liberal establishment legislative agenda.

On the other hand, a conservative populist grassroots strategy would almost certainly make daily interactions with liberal leaders more confrontational as they found themselves nominally chairing committees but losing votes on the floor and having their initiatives rejected by a conservative grassroots coalition. With a conservative populist grassroots strategy it is the 44 Blue Dog Democrats who would find themselves cross-pressured. In the House, some 54 Democrats won by claiming they were much more conservative than Nancy Pelosi, and much more conservative than the San Francisco values she represents. Here, they would be forced to choose between their voters back home and the promises made to them during the campaign, and their leadership.

Ironically, the very nature of the Democratic victory makes it possible to re-establish the conservative Democrat and House Republican coalition which made the Reagan legislative victories of 1981-82 possible. Tip O'Neill was the liberal Democratic speaker when Reagan became president, but he did not have a liberal majority in the House. Yet despite a seemingly liberal Democrat lock in a 242-192 majority, they lost control of the floor on the most important bill of Reagan's first term. His tax cuts were initially passed 238-195 with 48 Democrats splitting from the leadership and siding with Reagan and the GOP. The final passage of the conference report passed 282-95, with a 113-vote Democratic majority siding with Reagan and only 95 liberal democrats voting "no."

I was a sophomore during this exciting Reagan first term and I learned from him the art of appealing to the American people to win votes in Washington. When we passed welfare reform in 1996, the Democrats split 98 "yes" and 98 "no." When we passed the Balanced Budget Act of 1997, the Democrats split 153 "yes" and only 52 diehard liberals voted "no."

If President Bush decides to govern as President Reagan did, he will work to unify the Blue Dog Democrats with the Republicans to win a handful of very large victories while accepting a constant barrage of unhappiness from the liberal leadership. That is what conservative bipartisanship is like. If on the other hand, President Bush decides on an establishment strategy of cooperating with the liberal leadership, he will guarantee splitting his own party and will see his legacy drift further and further to the left as the Pelosi-Reid wing of their party demands more and more concessions.

This choice of which strategy to follow domestically has an enormous implication for national security. A liberal coalition will focus narrowly on Iraq and seek to avoid thinking about the scale of threat we face internationally. A conservative bipartisan coalition will look first to the larger threat to American security and will then seek to find solutions in Iraq to strengthen American security. It is hard to see how a liberal coalition will be able to look at the larger threats to our safety, even when the threat, articulated in this warning by Vice Admiral Patrick Walsh, is clear: "What we are talking about today is an ideology that thrives on murder, intimidation and fear. It puts innocent people at risk, particularly those in open societies. What we are talking about are people who worship death itself."

Thus the decision about which bipartisanship to pursue with regard to a legislative agenda and the Iraq war becomes for the Bush administration a decision about how safe and how prosperous America will be under divided government.

Mr. Gingrich is a former speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Murtha Calls Ethics Bill 'Total Crap' (RC)

By John Bresnahan

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) told a group of Democratic moderates on Tuesday that an ethics and lobbying reform bill being pushed by party leaders was "total crap," but said that he would work to enact the legislation because Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) supports it.

DOJ_NMG_0095327

Murtha and Current Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) are locked in a battle for the House Majority Leader post, and both men made presentations to the Blue Dog Coalition on Tuesday in a bid for their votes.

"Even though I think it's total crap, I'll vote for it and pass it because that's what Nancy wants," Murtha told the Blue Dogs, according to three sources who were at the meeting.

Pelosi has made enactment of the Honest Leadership and Open Government Act the cornerstone of her legislative agenda for the 110th Congress, and she is preparing to make it the first bill introduced under her reign. Murtha voted against the legislation earlier this year on the House floor.

Congressional corruption was a major issue for voters in the recent midterm elections, and Pelosi has pledged to clean up the Congress as part of her efforts to reform the House.

A Democratic lawmaker, speaking on the condition of anonymity, said he was "surprised" by the tone of Murtha's comments, especially Murtha's repeated claim that he would back any proposal that Pelosi favored. This lawmaker has already declared for Hoyer.

"'My agenda will be Nancy's agenda' — he kept saying that," the lawmaker said. "The performance was stunningly awful."

Another Democrat who was in the room said Murtha's remarks, especially on the ethics and lobbying reform bill, "were not the right thing to say in front of a roomful of Blue Dogs."

Murtha office's did not comment for this article.

Many Say Leadership Race Damages Democrats' Image (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON, Nov. 15 — House members acknowledged on Wednesday that the increasingly bitter contest for majority leader was sullying the image of unity and new direction that Democrats hoped to convey.

"It's four days that we haven't talked about our message and built on the euphoria," said Representative Ellen O. Tauscher, a California Democrat who is supporting Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland in the leadership vote on Thursday. "We had such perfect pitch last week."

Downtrodden Republicans were enjoying the spectacle of the split between Representative Nancy Pelosi, the incoming speaker, who is publicly pushing Representative John P. Murtha, her longtime ally, and Democrats rallying behind Mr. Hoyer, who has served in the leadership slot beneath Ms. Pelosi for four years.

"I can't believe they are self-destructing before they even get started," said Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois. "Everyone on our side is giddy."

The race has not broken along conventional ideological lines. Mr. Murtha, a staunch conservative on most issues with the exception of his highly publicized opposition to the Iraq war, enjoys support from some of the most liberal Democrats. Mr. Hoyer, the more liberal of the two, has attracted strong backing from moderates and centrists, as well as some of the most seasoned House Democrats.

It has also left Democrats and Republicans in both the House and Senate straining to understand Ms. Pelosi's strategy.

They wonder why, in her moment of victory, she injected herself into a leadership fight that will end with the selection of her rival or her own choice, a lawmaker criticized for his ethics record, after an election in which Democrats campaigned on a clean-government theme.

Mr. Murtha himself has thrown more fuel on that fire. Members of the conservative Democratic Blue Dog group said that during an appearance before them Tuesday, Mr. Murtha disparaged an ethics overhaul that Ms. Pelosi and the leadership have been promising as one of their first orders of business.

Two lawmakers at the session confirmed that the comment, first reported by the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call, left many stunned, given the new scrutiny Mr. Murtha's deal-making on the Appropriations Committee has drawn, along with his involvement in the 1980 Abscam bribery sting run by the F.B.I. He was never charged in that case, but a widely circulated film showed him being offered a bribe and responding that he was not interested in the money "at this time."

In an interview on the MSNBC show "Hardball" Wednesday afternoon, Mr. Murtha said that at the time of Abscam he was interested in attracting foreign investment to relieve high unemployment in his Pennsylvania district and, though suspicious of the offer, wanted to keep open the possibility of legitimate investment. As for the ethics package promoted by Ms. Pelosi, Mr. Murtha said he was complaining that Congressional wrongdoing was superceding other matters "when we've got a war going on and we got all these other issues — $8 billion a month we're spending."

After writing a letter of support for Mr. Murtha, Ms. Pelosi has personally gone to bat for him, attending a reception for new members and pressing lawmakers on their choice for majority leader. Her allies say her intervention reflects the sort of risk-taking strategy that has brought her to the brink of becoming speaker. And no matter how it turns out, they say, it will send a message to lawmakers that if they stick with her, she will reciprocate.

DOJ_NMG_0095328

But several Democrats said her direct involvement was clouding the Democratic takeover by showing squabbling Democrats in serious disagreement over the direction of the party.

"This is somewhat distracting us," Mr. Hoyer conceded Wednesday, even as he predicted that he would win the race and that the party would avoid substantial fallout.

"I expect that we will bring the party together and become unified and move on from this," he said in a brief interview.

Mr. Hoyer came in for criticism of his own Wednesday from an outside watchdog group, Public Citizen. It ranked him as a top Congressional recipient of contributions from lobbyists and political action committees, receiving more than $5.6 million in PAC money since 2000. Mr. Murtha collected about half that much.

"Both candidates for House leadership have taken large amounts of special interest money," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen.

Mr. Murtha and his allies have emphasized the role he played in building Democratic opposition to the Iraq war, an issue that was crucial to the party's victories last week.

Mr. Hoyer and his supporters acknowledge the import of Mr. Murtha's turnaround after his initial support of the war. Representative Barney Frank of Massachusetts described it as a "Nixon goes to China moment," but said it did not entitle Mr. Murtha to the leadership post.

Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, a liberal Democrat from Ohio who disagrees with Mr. Murtha on major social issues like abortion and gun control, said in a letter distributed to his colleagues that Mr. Murtha's leadership on the war outweighed other considerations.

"We need Jack Murtha for majority leader," Mr. Kucinich wrote, "because at a critical moment on the major international policy issue facing America and the world, he showed an openness, a readiness to listen and a willingness to set a new direction, based on new information. This is the mark of someone who moves forward with courage."

House Race Pits Murtha Vs. Ethics (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

House Democrats will decide today whether to install as their majority leader one of the most scandal-tainted members of Congress.

Today's vote on Rep. John P. Murtha -- whom likely Speaker Nancy Pelosi enthusiastically supports -- comes 10 days after Democrats seized control of the House and Senate after promising to clean up the corruption that they said had become a hallmark of the Republican Congress.

In the Senate, meanwhile, Republicans yesterday picked as their leader Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky. The No. 2 position of Republican whip went to Sen. Trent Lott, the Mississippian who four years ago fell from leadership after praising the 1948 presidential campaign of then-segregationist Strom Thurmond of South Carolina.

Mr. McConnell, who for years has excoriated Democrats for obstructing the Republican majority in the Senate, signaled the new minority's willingness to play a similar role.

"We represent a vigorous minority of 49 in a body where it takes 60 to do anything," he told reporters. "We are unified in our desire to work with the Democrats across party lines to see what we can accomplish for the country, but we will be a robust minority, a vigorous minority, and hopefully a minority that is only in that condition for a couple of years."

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats emphasized the need for Republican cooperation.

"We really need bipartisanship," said incoming Majority Whip Richard J. Durbin, the Illinois Democrat who helped lead the filibusters of President Bush's judicial nominees.

But most of the attention on Capitol Hill yesterday fell on Mr. Murtha's run for House leadership, which many Democrats worry will sully their stunning victories last week and ruin any hopes of a reputation for ethical reform. Mr. Murtha didn't help his case when reports surfaced yesterday that he dismissed the party's plans for ethics reform during a gathering of newly elected Democrats.

Mr. Murtha, elected last week to his 18th term, is often noted today for his service in the military and his demands that troops be withdrawn from Iraq. But for more than 25 years, he's also been remembered as the "unindicted co-conspirator" in one of the most famous and blatant cases of congressional corruption ever exposed.

In 1980, Mr. Murtha of Pennsylvania was among eight members of Congress lured to a town house in Washington to collect $50,000 in "walking-around money" from what turned out to be FBI agents posing as emissaries for an Arab sheik seeking influence.

DOJ_NMG_0095329

Video of the rendezvous shows Mr. Murtha negotiating for a long-term relationship with the apparent crooks, trying to cut fellow congressmen out of the deal and stating that he may be willing to take money from the men in the future.

Mr. Murtha turned down their bribe -- for the time being. But he spent 54 minutes doing so, according to FBI surveillance tapes recently obtained by the conservative magazine the American Spectator and posted on the Internet.

"These guys were trying to corrupt me," he said in an interview yesterday with Chris Matthews of MSNBC. "They were the slimiest guys I've ever seen.

"I deal with people like this all the time," he added.

He insisted that his only interest was in getting the men to invest in his district.

Mr. Murtha testified against his fellow congressmen in federal court and was not charged with any crimes. In 1981, the House ethics committee also declined to punish him.

"The ethics committee cleared me completely, unanimous vote," he said yesterday.

According to news reports at the time, the panel in the Democrat-controlled Congress declined to pursue charges on a party-line vote.

Some Democrats say Mrs. Pelosi's backing of Mr. Murtha doesn't bode well for her promise to aggressively root out corruption in Congress. At the very least, critics say, Mr. Murtha failed to obey House rules requiring that members report any attempted bribes -- a rule that Mr. Murtha should have been aware of as a member of the House ethics committee in 1980.

The liberal activist group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington named Mr. Murtha one of the most corrupt members of Congress -- not mentioning his role in the Abscam scandal, but instead highlighting his dealings with lobbyists and pork-barrel spending in recent years.

Both Mr. Murtha and Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, who is currently the No. 2 House Democratic leader, have said they have the votes to get elected majority leader.

Dem Division And Dismay (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, November 16, 2006

House Democrats head to the ballot box today to elect their majority leader, with many of them fretting that the contentious race has split their caucus into two warring camps, one allied with Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) and Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) and the other with Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), regardless of today's outcome.

The race has reinforced longstanding divisions between different factions in the caucus, members and observers said, and has diverted their attention from a positive message they hoped to project just days after winning control of the House.

"We're trying to say it's a new day, and unfortunately, we've started a new day with unnecessary controversy," said Rep. Charlie Gonzalez (D-Texas), a Hoyer ally. "Members see this as something unnecessary, something counterproductive, something that is sucking up all the oxygen in the room when we really need to work on improving the functioning of the House."

Elated by their victory last week at the polls, many House Democrats were further encouraged by the harmonious resolution last week of a battle brewing for the post of majority whip, praising Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) for brokering the compromise.

But on Sunday, Pelosi took a decidedly different tack by stepping into the majority leader race on Murtha's behalf, a move that escalated an already vigorous contest. Two hundred thirty-one House Democrats will meet this morning at 9 a.m. to vote for their entire slate of leaders, although the majority leader position is the only contested race. They will first vote on a motion to allow Christine Jennings and Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) to vote. Jennings's Florida race is still contested. Jefferson still faces a runoff.

Many Democrats were dismayed at the ever more heated and at times ugly battle between two of their most senior members, much of it playing out on national television.

Some Hoyer backers questioned Pelosi's political judgment, arguing that the effort to "purge" Hoyer from the leadership would damage caucus unity.

"It's a terrible way to start. It's a lose-lose situation. Either way she has polarized the caucus," said one House Democrat allied with Hoyer.

"You're going to be more likely to question her after something like this that is so clearly bad for us and could have been avoided," another commented.

The situation reminded more than one lawmaker of a remark made once by former Rep. Mo Udall (D-Ariz.): "I have learned the difference between a cactus and a caucus. On a cactus, the pricks are on the outside."

A Murtha backer took offense at the suggestion that the battle would create long-lasting acrimony among members.

DOJ_NMG_0095330

"I've been hearing that for six months, that it's going to do damage to the caucus. Yeah, for about 30 seconds. Anyone who feels that way is a jerk. I don't feel that way. If someone says that, they really don't belong in politics," said Rep. Michael Capuano (D-Mass.), a Murtha ally.

"If this thing was about making an empress, I wouldn't do it," Capuano added.

Members will vote by secret ballot, making it difficult to predict an outcome.

Rep. Bill Pascrell (D-N.J.), a Murtha ally, said he could tell which members might ultimately switch their votes.

"You know when people are telling you what you want to hear. You know when they hem and haw … Who knows how it's going to turn out, but we'll be ready."

Murtha himself was absent during House floor votes yesterday as he has been all week. Hoyer has not missed a vote.

As the sun set on the Capitol last night, both camps were executing their endgame. Murtha's allies huddled in a Rayburn committee room to plot strategy. Reps. Anna Eshoo (D-Calif.), Robert Brady (D-Pa.), Tim Holden (D-Pa.), John Larson (D-Conn.), Carolyn McCarthy (D-N.Y.), Tim Ryan (D-Ohio), Allyson Schwartz (D-Pa.), Gene Taylor (D-Miss.), Mike Thompson (D-Calif.), Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), as well as Capuano and Pascrell, attended.

Pelosi continued to meet individually with incoming freshmen members yesterday. Pelosi has been raising the majority leader race with freshman during the same introductory meeting where they discuss committee assignments.

"Some of the freshmen who came in with some naivete are understanding the meaning [of Pelosi's endorsement]," Rep. Jim Moran (D-Va.) said Monday night. If they do not, "They'll screw themselves for the rest of their lives."

Both sides asserted that they had the necessary support, but the secret-ballot vote means that members may defect at the last moment without ever facing retribution.

Rep. Albert Wynn (D-Md.) said he expected some members not to honor the commitments they had made to the candidates.

"Ask anyone who's ever run for a leadership position and they'll tell you: Members lie."

Brad Haynes contributed to this report.

Democratic Leadership Hopefuls Marked By Ethical Questions (LAT)

By Tom Hamburger And Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON — Though incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi promises to push through ethical reforms in Congress, both of the Democrats vying to be her second-in-command have long histories of earmarking, close relationships with corporate interests, and using their positions to raise millions of dollars in campaign contributions.

Pelosi's choice for the job, Rep. John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania, used his seat on the appropriations committee and the largely secret earmark process to obtain $121 million in earmarks during the current session, making him one of the top earmarkers in Congress, according to the watchdog group Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Murtha, a tough-talking veteran who made headlines last year by denouncing President Bush's policy in Iraq, directed much of the money to firms and institutions in Johnstown, Pa., in his district. Defense contractors and other beneficiaries dominated a list of Murtha's top campaign contributors.

Murtha was an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam scandal of the 1970s, which has prompted some to support the other man seeking the House majority leader's job — Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland — as the more ethical candidate.

Hoyer, also on appropriations, sent $61.7 million to his district just outside of Washington during this Congress, the watchdog group says. That put him among the top 10% of earmarkers in the House. The earmarks frequently benefited local defense contractors.

In the 2006 defense appropriations bill, for example, Hoyer secured $2.8 million for ManTech International Corp., which has a facility in his district that is developing a military project. ManTech's executives and its political action committee have donated $49,000 to Hoyer's campaign and leadership funds since 2001.

David Sirota, a former House Appropriations Committee aide who wrote the recently published book "Hostile Takeover" decrying corporate influence on the Democratic Party, said he was concerned about the records of Murtha and Hoyer.

"In my book I wrote that a top legislative staffer to Hoyer simultaneously served as a top corporate fundraiser for Hoyer, helping raise money for his leadership PAC," he said.

"There is nothing illegal about that, but it definitely makes a joke of the idea that Hoyer is the ethics candidate in this race," said Sirota, who supports Murtha for the post.

Federal Election Commission records show Murtha also employed at least one staffer to do campaign work.

*

Cloaked in secrecy

DOJ_NMG_0095331

Earmarking, and the symbiotic relationship it often creates between members of Congress and corporate and other interest groups, has become a symbol of the ethical laxity that Democrats campaigned against in last week's midterm election.

Earmarking is a form of pork-barrel spending often favored by committee chairmen, congressional leaders and other insiders. Cloaked in secrecy, it enables favored members to bypass the normal budget and appropriations process and insert narrowly drawn spending provisions into legislation.

Though not new, the practice has exploded in recent years. In the most flagrant cases, members have used the process for personal enrichment. In other cases, the spending provisions appear to have been used as a kind of quid pro quo to reward campaign contributors and other supporters.

Earmarks played a role in the Jack Abramoff scandal and the bribery conviction of former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe).

They have also led to federal investigations, including an inquiry involving Rep. Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands), outgoing chairman of the House Appropriations Committee.

Even when illegal or improper conduct was not at issue, earmarks for campaign contributors have been at the heart of the increasing role of money in politics. Murtha and Hoyer have been senior members of the House Appropriations Committee; its members are usually among the leading earmarkers and also major fundraisers for their parties.

Hoyer told a website this week that he did not favor ending the earmarks system, but said he supported reform and greater transparency so the public would know what was happening.

An aide said Hoyer supported "comprehensive earmark reform that would require full disclosure, including the sponsor. He also believes that all conference reports should be available for members to scrutinize before they are voted on, and should not have last-minute earmarks included, as has been the practice under Republicans."

*

Dealings with business

Hoyer has been a vigorous player of the traditional earmarking game.

For example, he has obtained more than $7 million in recent years for the manufacturer of Beretta firearms, which has a facility in his district and manufactures the 9-millimeter pistols used by the Marines. In effect, the earmark required the Pentagon to buy ammunition clips from Beretta USA. In an earlier purchase, the military had obtained clips from another supplier that had submitted the lowest bid; Hoyer said the cheaper clips had sometimes malfunctioned.

At least one Beretta executive has contributed to Hoyer's campaign fund.

Murtha is no stranger to ethics controversies.

Some of his largest campaign contributions came from the clients of Washington lobbying firms that represent beneficiaries of his earmarks.

Among them is a firm, Ervin Technical Associates, chaired by a former House colleague, Joseph M. McDade, who was accused in 1992 of providing earmarks in exchange for campaign contributions and gifts. He was charged with bribery and racketeering for accepting gifts and other benefits from defense interests, but was acquitted.

McDade and other principals of the firm could not be reached for comment, but an independent contractor working with the firm said the firm had the highest integrity, and defended the need for earmarks generally.

Another firm associated with Murtha, the PMA Group, is led by Paul Magliocchetti, who worked with Murtha as a senior staffer on the defense appropriations subcommittee for a decade. The PMA Group and 11 of the firm's clients rank in the top 20 contributors to Murtha, with campaign contributions totaling $274,649 in this election cycle, according to calculations by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a left-leaning watchdog group.

The 2004 defense appropriations bill provided earmarks for 10 companies represented by a lobbying firm in which his brother, Robert "Kit" Murtha, was a senior partner. The Los Angeles Times first reported in 2005 on Robert Murtha's lobbying activities for the firm, KSA Consulting.

At the time, Robert Murtha and others at KSA said he did not lobby his brother and thus saw no problem in his lobbying others.

*

A new controversy

On Tuesday, a new controversy flared up. The Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call quoted Murtha as telling a group of Democrats that Pelosi's ethics reforms were "total crap."

Murtha said his remarks were misinterpreted, perhaps deliberately. He told MSNBC on Wednesday that he had been referring to illegal activities such as Abramoff's, not to the reforms.

"What Nancy is trying to do is important," he told host Chris Matthews.

DOJ_NMG_0095332

"What I said was, it's total crap, the idea we have to deal with an issue like this … when we've got a war going on," Murtha said.

Murtha first gained national attention decades ago as an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam investigation into congressional corruption. In a videotaped interview with the FBI agent posing as a sheik, Murtha was offered $50,000 to help the sheik.

"I'm not interested. I'm sorry," Murtha told the FBI agent, but added: "At this point. You know, we do business for a while, maybe I'll be interested, maybe I won't."

Murtha did not respond to requests for comment, but he told MSNBC that he knew the fake sheik was trying to corrupt him, but that he led him on in hopes of luring investment to his hard-pressed district. "I deal with people like this all the time," he told Matthews.

*

chuck.neubauer@latimes.com
tom.hamburger@latimes.com

Pelosi Faces Leadership Test With Vote (AP-Y)

By Andrew Taylor, Associated Press Writer

AP, November 16, 2006

House Speaker-to-be Nancy Pelosi faces a major leadership test Thursday, barely a week into her new role, as Democrats vote on her choice for majority leader. She's supporting a lawmaker once caught up in a bribery scandal and known more recently for trading votes for pork projects.

Pelosi's prestige is on the line after endorsing longtime ally John Murtha of Pennsylvania to be the No. 2 Democrat in place of her longtime rival Steny Hoyer of Maryland.

Senate Republicans, meanwhile, rewarded Mississippi Sen. Trent Lott with their No. 2 post, four years after the White House helped push him out of his job running the Senate for making remarks interpreted as endorsing segregation. President Bush, on a trip to Russia and Asia, telephoned Lott on Wednesday with congratulations.

Pressured to step down from the Senate's top spot in 2002, Lott returned to the Republicans' second-ranking position by nosing out Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., who had made an 18-month bid for the post. Lott promised to defer to Minority Leader-to-be Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

House Republicans, finding themselves in the minority for the first time since 1994, will meet in private Thursday to hear presentations from candidates for their half-dozen leadership posts. Their election is scheduled Friday. Speaker Dennis Hastert of Illinois is leaving the leadership ranks. Replacing him as the House's top Republican became a two-man race Wednesday between current Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and conservative challenger Mike Pence of Indiana. Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton of Texas dropped out and endorsed Boehner.

Hoyer entered the Democratic leadership race with a substantial lead by most counts, but he has been scrambling to hold onto supporters since Pelosi's surprise intervention on Sunday. He appeared to carry a lead into Thursday's secret ballot despite Pelosi's opposition.

"I think we're in very good shape. I expect to win," Hoyer said. "I expect that we will bring the party together and become unified and move on from this."

With characteristic gruffness, Murtha said the opposite was true: "We're going to win. We got the votes," he said Wednesday afternoon on MSNBC's "Hardball."

Allies such as Rep. George Miller, D-Calif. — also a top confidant of Pelosi — have been working this week to peel away votes from Hoyer. Pelosi also has intervened more directly, making the case for Murtha in one-on-one meetings with Democratic freshmen — sessions in which the incoming lawmakers ask for all-important committee assignments.

Murtha, a former Marine who generally has supported U.S. military efforts, has gained considerable attention this year for his criticism of the administration's Iraq war policies. He steered Pelosi's winning campaign in 2001 against Hoyer for the No. 2 Democratic leadership post, and his supporters say Pelosi deserves a more loyal wingman.

But Murtha is also a controversial figure. He was investigated in 1980 as part of the Abscam bribery sting, but was the only lawmaker involved who wasn't charged criminally.

FBI agents pretending to represent an Arab sheik wanting to reside in the United States and seeking investment opportunities approached Murtha and several other lawmakers with offers of bribes.

When offered $50,000, Murtha is recorded as saying, "I'm not interested ... at this point." A grand jury declined to prosecute Murtha, and the House ethics committee issued no findings against him. On MSNBC Wednesday, Murtha said, "I told them I wanted investment in my district. They put $50,000 on the table and I said, `I'm not interested.'"

DOJ_NMG_0095333

Murtha has a record of not always being a leadership loyalist, frequently supplying votes to GOP leaders who were struggling to pass bills. The none-too-subtle trade-off: Murtha and his allies would do better when home-state projects were doled out by the Republicans.

He has been criticized by ethics watchdogs such as Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, who have said he exemplifies a "pay-to-play" culture of Washington. The group says Murtha has steered defense projects to clients of KSA Consulting, a lobbying firm that until recently employed his brother Kit. Clients of the firm are generous with campaign contributions.

Hoyer claims considerable support from some liberals made uncomfortable by Murtha's opposition to abortion, gun control and changes to House ethics rules. He also is a leadership contact for many moderate "Blue Dog" Democrats.

Hoyer's backers say he has been an able lieutenant to Pelosi and has done nothing to disqualify himself from holding the same position in the majority.

He has been aggressive in lining up supporters, most of whom are sticking with him.

"One of the first things I learned around here is that when you give your commitment you honor it," said Rep. Rick Boucher, D-Va., a Hoyer supporter.

Pelosi Splits Democrats With Push For Murtha (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Lois Romano

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

A showdown over the House majority leader's post today has Democrats bitterly divided only a week after their party took control of Congress and has prompted numerous complaints that Speaker-designate Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and her allies are using strong-arm tactics and threats to try to elect Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) to the job.

Murtha, 74, a former Marine who was among the first on Capitol Hill to call for a U.S. troop withdrawal from Iraq, may have hurt his own chances Tuesday night when he derided the Democrats' ethics and lobbying package before saying he will push for its passage anyway out of deference to Pelosi. His statement, at a gathering of conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, was cited by backers of his rival, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), as further proof that Murtha's controversial ethics record disqualifies him to lead the party in a new political era.

Pelosi's aggressive intervention on behalf of Murtha has baffled and angered many Democrats, who think she has unnecessarily put her reputation on the line out of misplaced loyalty to a friend and because of a long-standing feud with Hoyer, the minority whip. Pelosi has pushed Murtha's candidacy at social events, in private meetings and with incoming freshman Democrats; they have been called to her office to discuss committee assignments, only to hear first that she needs Murtha in order to be an effective leader.

Hoyer, 67, was heavily favored to win the race until Sunday, when Pelosi -- in a move that shocked even her staff -- openly threw her support to Murtha, despite a vow to stay neutral. She said in a letter that she was swayed by Murtha's early call for a withdrawal of U.S. troops, and that he would be best positioned to lead a new Democratic majority.

Hoyer still maintains the public support of most incoming committee chairmen, influential liberals such as Reps. Barney Frank (Mass.) and Maxine Waters (Calif.), most conservative Blue Dogs, and 21 of the 40 or so freshmen. But Murtha has a sizable contingent from the Appropriations Committee and the Pennsylvania delegation, as well as Pelosi's closest supporters. Since her endorsement, Pelosi has been unabashedly pushing Murtha.

"Have you ever seen a leader get involved in race like this? That should tell you all you need to know about her commitment," said Rep. Anna G. Eshoo (D-Calif.), a friend of Pelosi's who is supporting Murtha.

So intense has the lobbying been that incoming House Ways and Means Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) -- after fielding a call from Pelosi -- said in a media report that he hadn't really endorsed Hoyer in a published interview in which he praised him.

One conservative Democrat said that a Murtha-Pelosi ally approached him on the House floor and said pointedly: "I hope you like your committee assignment, because it's the only one you're going to get."

In a phone call initiated by Murtha that same day, the lawmaker told the longtime politician that he had already signed a letter of support for Hoyer. The congressman said he was stunned when Murtha told him, "Letters don't mean anything."

Hoyer's supporters complained about such tactics.

"Commitment is something of value in this institution," said Rep. Artur Davis (D-Ala.). "If you have somebody in this race saying, 'Oh, your promises don't really mean anything in a secret ballot,' that bothers me, and it should bother a lot of people."

Murtha, the ranking Democrat on the powerful Appropriations defense subcommittee, has been dogged by allegations that he has skirted ethical boundaries and has thwarted efforts to tighten rules on lobbying. Those questions were amplified yesterday after at least three attendees at the Tuesday-night meeting of Blue Dog lawmakers complained that Murtha had disparaged the Democrats' ethics and lobbying package.

DOJ_NMG_0095334

"He said, 'You know, I believe it's total crap, but Nancy supports it, and I'm going to push it,' " said a senior Blue Dog Democrat and Hoyer supporter, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was divulging comments from a closed-door meeting.

Pelosi aides stressed that Murtha remains dedicated to the package's passage, but the dust-up rekindled memories of past Murtha votes. He was one of 12 Democrats to vote against campaign finance legislation written by Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell Feingold (D-Wis.), and he was one of four Democrats who opposed an ethics package earlier this year that was designed to contrast the Democrats' tough stance with a weaker Republican bill. He also pushed a rules change to block outside groups from filing complaints to the House ethics committee.

The Murtha camp has accused Hoyer of a "stay the course" mentality on Iraq, which Hoyer says does not accurately reflect his call for a phased redeployment of troops.

Although the main focus has been on the nasty sniping between Murtha and Hoyer, the unspoken story is the long-simmering rivalry between Pelosi and Hoyer. The two have known each other more than 40 years -- since, as young, ambitious Maryland natives, they interned for then-Sen. Daniel B. Brewster.

At one time they were friends, but their ambitions eventually put them on a collision course. Pelosi nominated Hoyer in a 1991 House leadership race and was one of his lieutenants. But in 2001, the two ran against each other in a protracted and nasty race for minority whip. Pelosi won handily, but her allies charge that Hoyer never stopped running for the next prize and along the way tried to undercut her authority. Hoyer has said he has never been anything but supportive of Pelosi.

For the most part, lawmakers, Hill aides and some outside advisers -- even some close to her -- say they are at a loss to explain why Pelosi has held a grudge for so long, because she clearly has the upper hand as leader of the House Democrats. They suggest that part of what rankles her is that Hoyer is not beholden to her and feels no compulsion to publicly agree with her on every issue. This, allies say, she sees as a sign of disloyalty. With the number of declared votes still heavily favoring Hoyer, Murtha's supporters were hoping a plea to unify behind Pelosi would secure an upset today.

It is not clear that the pitch is working. "I'm a DA," said Hoyer supporter Michael Arcuri (D), the Oneida County district attorney just elected to represent his Upstate New York district. "I'm used to pressure."

New Congress Vows To Clean Up Act (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, November 16, 2006

WASHINGTON

The midterm elections that ended GOP control of both House and Senate turned on two overriding themes: the war in Iraq and corruption in Congress.

Now, beginning with leadership elections this week, both parties are out to show voters they got the message.

For Democrats, united in a keen desire not to slip back into the minority in 2008, a first step is the promise of a new style of leadership on Capitol Hill: open, bipartisan, and above reproach - and an agenda anchored in the needs of the average American family.

"Voters rejected the Bush agenda, but they haven't yet embraced us," said Sen. Charles Schumer of New York, who was elevated Tuesday to No. 3 in the Democratic leadership after chairing the party's senatorial campaign committee to a victory few of his colleagues believed would happen. "What we have here could vanish if we don't do the job."

What's missing from Democrats' ambitious early agenda, critics say, is a quick, clean, anticorruption element. House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi promised last January to enact an ethics package - including a ban on all gifts from lobbyists, disclosure of earmarks, and a two-year wait before lawmakers leaving office can work as lobbyists - if Democrats took back the House. Pelosi aides say the presumptive House speaker wants an "Honest Leadership Open Government" package - details to be disclosed - to go through the committee process in the new Congress.

Both the House and Senate later passed versions of lobby reform last spring, but GOP leaders have yet to agree on terms for a conference to work out differences between the two bills, which will die at the end of the 109th Congress in December.

Both ethics and the Iraq war are emerging as key issues in an unexpectedly bitter race for the new House majority leader, the Democrats' second in command behind Ms. Pelosi.

In what is seen as an early test of leadership, Pelosi is publicly backing Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania over her current deputy, Steny Hoyer of Maryland, for the post. Representative Murtha's call for an immediate redeployment of US troops from Iraq helped mobilize the party's antiwar base in last week's election. Murtha charges that Mr. Hoyer's views on Iraq line up with those of President Bush.

DOJ_NMG_0095335

In response, Representative Hoyer's supporters are reviving accounts of Murtha's less-than-decisive rejection of a bribe in the 1980 Abscam FBI sting operation. More recently, Murtha has battled allegations that he may have accepted favors from defense contractors.

"The fight between Murtha and Hoyer is a template for Democrats on the war and corruption," says Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University in New Jersey. "Until this election, Murtha had an iconic status as an outspoken, truth-telling Democrat, and all of a sudden ethics has become a liability. It's an awkward position for Pelosi, whatever the outcome," he adds.

Most immediately, Murtha's opposition to ethics reform, including past brushes with ethics issues, open Pelosi to charges that she hasn't heard voters on the importance of cleaning up the culture of corruption in Washington.

House Democrats will decide between Murtha and Hoyer in a secret ballot Thursday.

"Future House Speaker Pelosi's endorsement of Representative Murtha, one of the most unethical members of Congress, shows that she may have prioritized ethics reform merely to win votes, with no real commitment to changing the culture of corruption," said Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a group that took a lead in criticizing former GOP majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas over corruption charges.

Among Senate Democrats, meanwhile, the mood this week was jubilant as they voted for their leaders for the 110th Congress. This slate includes majority leader Harry Reid of Nevada, majority whip Richard Durbin of Illinois, and conference secretary Patty Murray of Washington. Outgoing conference secretary Debbie Stabenow of Michigan replaces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York - a move that presidential watchers view as another signal that the former first lady is preparing for a campaign for the Oval Office.

On the Republican side, there was suspense but little controversy, as the outgoing GOP majority promoted their whip, Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, to replace retiring Republican leader Bill Frist.

In a surprise move, Sen. Trent Lott, a former GOP Senate majority leader, won the whip race. It's the first time a Senate majority leader ran for a lower position, say Senate historians. "I'm doing the job I love the most: count the votes," Senator Lott said.

But stakes are higher - and the mood darker - among House Republicans. In a vote expected Friday, the GOP caucus chooses among John Boehner of Ohio, current majority leader, and challengers Mike Pence of Indiana and Joe Barton of Texas. Mr. Pence, a favorite of conservative commentators, says Republicans lost the majority because they forgot their principles, especially limited government.

Boehner explains the loss as "a referendum on the Bush administration and the war in Iraq," factors that are "now beyond our control." Republicans can regain the majority, he says, by holding Democrats accountable and "holding ourselves accountable" via ethics reform "with teeth."

Pelosi's First Mistake (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

As the new House majority caucus prepared to pick its leadership today, Democrats were trying to make the best of the inevitability of Nancy Pelosi as the party's first speaker in a dozen years. They have put out the word that she was not serious in endorsing Rep. John Murtha for majority leader. How much effort she has exerted for her longtime ally is irrelevant, but she has actively solicited votes this week.

The damage to her was irrevocable when she wrote her colleagues Sunday urging them to pick Murtha over Rep. Steny Hoyer. Close associates of Hoyer say her letter stunned him, and he was not alone. While Pelosi had made it clear that she would vote for Murtha, the public endorsement was unexpected.

Although Pelosi's apologists had stressed that this was not a public campaign, but a pro forma endorsement, she began actively campaigning for Murtha on Tuesday. Even before that, the letter itself was taken seriously within the Democratic caucus, including by Hoyer and his close associates. A speaker's written word cannot be taken lightly.

This is a no-win situation for Pelosi. If Murtha wins today, she will be accused of personal vindictiveness in derailing Hoyer, who is more popular in the caucus and better qualified for leadership. If Murtha loses, as is much more probable, she will be seen as bumbling her first attempt to lead the new Democratic majority. Pelosi could have avoided this dilemma by standing aside as Newt Gingrich, then the presumptive speaker, did when he voted for his ally Robert Walker as majority whip but did not ask members to oppose Tom DeLay.

Pelosi's mistake confirms long-standing, privately held Democratic apprehension about her abilities. Such concerns do not reflect the Republican indictment of her as a reflexive San Francisco liberal. Some of her most trenchant congressional critics are on the left wing of the party. These colleagues worry that her decision making may be distorted by personal considerations.

DOJ_NMG_0095336

Hoyer is the most accomplished Democratic legislator in the House, widely respected on both sides of the aisle. He, not Pelosi, would be preparing to be speaker had he not lost to her in a 2001 contest for minority whip, thanks to nearly complete support from her huge California delegation. That put Pelosi ahead of Hoyer on the leadership escalator. While Hoyer would win a secret poll of the Democratic caucus as more qualified, Democrats cannot turn aside the first female speaker.

It was assumed that Hoyer would be given the No. 2 position of leading a Democratic majority -- until Jack Murtha announced his candidacy. Never before during his 32 low-profile years in the House could anyone have imagined Murtha seeking any leadership role. He has been a backroom distributor of federal pork who disdained public exposure, and he was in the headlines only as an unindicted co-conspirator in the 1980 Abscam scandal. Murtha became an unlikely hero of the left last year when he called for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq.

With Pelosi and Hoyer working amicably the past two years, the speaker-to-be was expected to keep her hands off the majority leader's race. Since the Nov. 7 elections, she had exhibited restraint, in public utterances and in quietly handling the ambitions of Rahm Emanuel.

Emanuel, as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, was the architect of the 2006 victory. He coveted the third-ranking post of majority whip, but that put him on a collision course with the Congressional Black Caucus's candidate, Rep. James Clyburn. A ruinous competition was averted when Pelosi brokered a deal whereby Emanuel agreed to replace Clyburn as House Democratic Caucus chairman.

But Pelosi's personal pique was evident in her opposition to her rival diva from California, Rep. Jane Harman, as chairman of the House intelligence committee. In line to replace Harman is Rep. Alcee Hastings, who was once impeached as a federal judge on bribery charges.

For a party that effectively stressed a Republican climate of corruption in the recent campaign to consider placing Murtha and Hastings in its leadership astonishes a wide range of Democrats. They do not believe Murtha can defeat Hoyer, but the imminence of Hastings stuns them. Well-placed Democrats have told Pelosi she cannot permit this to happen. What they hesitate to contemplate is what lies ahead based on Pelosi's performance before she has taken the oath.

Same Old Congressional Hacks (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, November 16, 2006

EVERYONE FROM President Bush to pundits of the left, right and center have acknowledged that last week's election results show that voters wanted change. So why have Democrats and Republicans in Congress apparently adopted as their theme the Who's famous line: "Meet the new boss, same as the old boss"?

On Wednesday, Senate Republicans went back to the future to choose Trent Lott of Mississippi as the soon-to-be minority whip, the No. 2 Republican in the chamber after Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.). Yes, the same Trent Lott who had to resign as majority leader four years ago after proclaiming that if the rest of the country had followed Mississippi's lead in voting for segregationist Strom Thurmond for president in 1948, "we wouldn't have had all these problems over all these years."

And yes, the Republicans are doing this in the "year of the macaca." One of the reasons they will soon find themselves in the minority, you will recall, was Confederate aficionado and Virginia Sen. George Allen's use of the loaded term "macaca" to describe a minority staffer from his opponent's campaign.

Lott, for his part, might have survived his tasteless tribute to Thurmond, offered at the former Dixiecrat's 100th birthday, if he didn't already have a credibility problem on issues of race. For example, when the Internal Revenue Service moved in 1981 to yank the tax-exempt status of Bob Jones University because it prohibited interracial dating, Lott defended the school's position on religious freedom grounds. Other than the posthumous election of Thurmond as minority leader, it's hard to imagine a worse signal for the Republican Party to send minorities.

Democrats tempted to gloat over Lott's semi-comeback have their own "back to the future" problem. Today, the incoming majority in the House will choose its majority leader, the No. 2 Democrat in the chamber, and Speaker-elect Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has endorsed Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) for the position over Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), the current Democratic whip.

The 74-year-old Murtha is an old hand in the sort of politics that voters supposedly rebelled against last week. Americans with a short memory think of Murtha as the longtime hawk turned critic of U.S. involvement in Iraq. But long before he began to channel the U.S. military's complaints about the Iraq war, Murtha was known as the consummate Washington insider.

He is an avid supporter of the special-interest appropriations known as "earmarking," which are central to the "culture of corruption" that Democrats railed against in the recent campaign. Also, as Times reporters Janet Hook and Richard Simon noted this week, in the 1980s, Murtha was investigated in connection with the Abscam bribery scandal, in which FBI agents posing as wealthy Arab sheiks tested the rectitude of members of Congress. He was cleared of wrongdoing, but his videotaped behavior — "I am not interested, at this point," he said when offered a bribe — proved highly embarrassing.

DOJ_NMG_0095337

Murtha's history would seem to belie Pelosi's call for "the most honest, the most open and the most ethical Congress in history." But like the Republicans in the Senate, the new speaker seems willing to go only so far in satisfying the voters' appetite for change. If that disappointing pattern persists, Americans who thought they voted for change might echo the title of the Who classic we quoted above: "Won't Get Fooled Again."

Pelosi And Pork (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, November 16, 2006

We'll find out when Democrats vote today if Speaker-in-waiting Nancy Pelosi was able to push aside her long-serving deputy in favor of her antiwar friend, John Murtha, as House Democratic majority leader. But an even bigger sign of how Democrats plan to govern is whether they implement the "earmark" reform they campaigned on this fall.

House leadership races are typically inside baseball, but Ms. Pelosi's support for Mr. Murtha is notable as a message of politics as usual. The Pennsylvania Congressman first elected in 1974 was an unindicted co-conspirator in the Abscam probe nearly 30 years ago. As a key Appropriator, he is also a champion of earmarked spending projects and his brother was a renowned earmark lobbyist. If he wins, Democrats will be rewarding his antiwar stance over the need for a cleaner Congress.

All eyes should then turn to whether Ms. Pelosi follows through on her promise to clean up earmarks. So far, she's said the right things about greater transparency that would require every Member to disclose his support for every earmark, which have become such opportunities for corruption. Last weekend she was quoted as saying, refreshingly, that "I'd just as soon do away with all" earmarks.

The Congressional Research Service counted some 16,500 earmarks in spending bills in 2005, at a cost of nearly $50 billion. Senator Tom Coburn (R., Okla.) says the "real cost" is "probably ten times" greater, because these goodies are the "currency" that Appropriators use to buy the votes to pass bills that might otherwise fail as too costly.

Ms. Pelosi can do something about all this by enacting earmark reform sponsored by two Democrats, Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Chris Van Hollen of Maryland. Mr. Emanuel ran the Democratic campaign committee this year and talked up his reform all over the country as a way to embarrass Republicans.

Their bill would ban any earmarks stuffed into conference reports that were not previously approved by either the House or Senate. Their reform would also make it illegal for members of Congress or their families "to personally benefit from the awarding of an earmark." And the reform would rule out of order any tax provision designed to benefit any individual or company. Good stuff.

But did Democrats mean it? Some Republicans are already questioning Ms. Pelosi's sincerity. The transparency provision she wants to enact was adopted earlier this year by the Republican House, and at the time she described that effort as a "sham" that "does not save one penny or prevent one earmark." Soon-to-be House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey also lambasted GOP earmark reforms as "a fraud," adding that "I don't care if you list the Members who sponsor earmarks" because they are often proud of their pork and because the budget savings would be "miniscule."

By the way, Republicans could also show that they heard voters last week by stripping earmarks from the nine spending bills for fiscal 2007 that they have yet to pass in this lame-duck session. GOP leaders John Boehner and Roy Blunt are seeking re-election with pledges to recommit to a reform agenda based on conservative principles. Earmarking isn't such a principle. But the real hope for reform now lies with the new Democratic majority, and whether it will follow Mr. Emanuel's example, or Mr. Murtha's.

Black Lawmakers In Line For Key Posts (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, November 16, 2006

Three days after workers broke ground for the Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial on the Mall, the Congressional Black Caucus is preparing to break new ground of its own.

Five of its members are poised to take the helm of key House committees when Democrats assume control of Congress next year: John Conyers Jr. (Mich.) of Judiciary, Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.) of intelligence, Juanita Millender-McDonald (Calif.) of House Administration, Reps. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.) of Ways and Means, and Bennie Thompson (Miss.) of Homeland Security.

Another member, Rep. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), is slated to be named majority whip, which would make him the third-ranking Democrat in the House. Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), the presumed speaker of the 110th Congress, has campaigned on his behalf.

DOJ_NMG_0095338

"If they accede to that much power, it would truly be the realization of the kind of dream we've been waiting for since the civil rights movement," said Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland political science professor and a former political strategist who is black.

But, said Walters, that is a big "if." The appointment of Millender-McDonald is less certain than those of some of the others, and Hastings faces a steep uphill climb in his bid for the intelligence post because of past ethics problems.

On top of all that, Black Caucus members, who tend to be more liberal, might find it hard to push their traditional social agenda. Conservative and moderate "Blue Dog" Democrats, whose numbers are nearly equal to those of Black Caucus members, have vowed to counter agendas that they deem too liberal.

Rangel, the likely chairman of Ways and Means, which he called the "most important and most powerful" committee, said conservative Democrats need not worry.

"I'm excited to participate in a kinder and gentler Congress," he said. Congress under Republican leadership "was a heavy blow . . . to me personally," he added. ". . . People not talking to each other. It was a nightmare."

For Pelosi, the decision of whether to appoint Hastings as intelligence chairman is something of a headache. Hastings is haunted by accusations that, as a judge, he accepted a $150,000 bribe in exchange for a lenient sentence in a perjury case.

Hastings was acquitted of bribery and perjury charges by a jury in a criminal trial, but the House impeached him in 1989, and the Senate later removed him from the bench. When Hastings challenged the decision in federal court, a judge, Stanley Sporkin, ruled in his favor and remanded the case to the Senate. The removal was eventually upheld.

One political hurdle for Hastings to overcome in chairing such a sensitive panel as the intelligence committee stems from his long-standing legal debts, which, according to his most recent financial statement, amounted to between $2.1 million and $7.35 million last year. Hastings listed assets worth less than $15,000 in the statement, filed in May.

Pelosi's office declined to comment on Hastings's possible appointment, except to say that he and Rep. Silvestre Reyes (D-Tex.), a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, are vying for the chairmanship. She is already under fire for her decision to support Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) as majority leader, despite ethical issues in his past.

Black Caucus Chairman Melvin Watt (D-N.C.) said the Hastings decision should be a done deal. "The leadership told us a long time ago that it was going to happen, and I believe it's going to happen," he said.

The caucus was founded in 1969 by 13 members who joined forces to address African American concerns, according to its Web site. In the recent midterm elections, its membership grew in number, to 42, and in diversity, with a Jamaican American, a Muslim and a Buddhist joining its ranks.

The coalition was at the height of its power in 1994, said David Bositis, a researcher for the Congressional Black Caucus, but Republicans seized control from Democrats that year and sank the caucus into obscurity. In recent years, it had to beg members of the Bush administration for an audience it rarely got.

Clyburn, the presumed incoming majority whip, said he will work to stamp out the racial perceptions of black Democrats, particularly among those who said -- on background -- that he is not traditionally suited for the job, which normally goes to a skilled backroom dealer and fundraiser.

"People tend to look at you and pigeonhole you based on what they see," Clyburn said, bristling. " 'I know he can't raise money because black folks can't raise money.' I think I earned this position, and I intend to claim it based on my record."

Blacks Eye Leading 5 House Committees (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, November 16, 2006

House Democrats will find out today which positions of power they will wield in the new Congress, and the magic numbers for members of the Congressional Black Caucus are five and 17.

"That sounds about right, based on seniority," said Reps. Bobby L. Rush, Illinois Democrat, and Albert R. Wynn, Maryland Democrat.

The CBC expects at least five committee chairmanships and as many as 17 subcommittee chairmanships to be led by its members in the 110th Congress after a vote by the Democratic Caucus concludes shortly after noon today. But some said the numbers might not exactly reflect seniority alone on the subcommittee seats.

"You select chairmanships based on seniority, but someone in your caucus can challenge a senior member, and they will have five minutes to explain why they should be the chair and then the committee votes on who should fill that seat," said a Democratic staffer.

And much of this could be affected by the battle between Reps. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland and John P. Murtha of Pennsylvania for majority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0095339

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of California backs Mr. Murtha, while Mr. Hoyer has support from many CBC members. That race is becoming extremely contentious and stems from the fight between Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Hoyer for minority whip in 2001, which Mrs. Pelosi won.

"What can happen is Mrs. Pelosi can decide to throw her support to someone for a chairmanship, which would give that person a lot of sway with the committee members," said the staffer.

House committees that will be chaired by CBC members are:

·Ways and Means: Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York.

·Homeland Security: Rep. Bennie Thompson of Mississippi.

·Administration: Rep. Juanita Millender-McDonald of California.

·Judiciary: Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan.

Mrs. Pelosi has said publicly that she would support Rep. Alcee L. Hastings, Florida Democrat, as chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, but a staffer in Mrs. Pelosi's office said a decision would not come before Congress returns from the Thanksgiving recess in early December.

"We are strongly supporting Alcee Hastings. I don't think there should be any doubt or question about that," said Rep. Melvin L. Watt, North Carolina Democrat and CBC chairman.

There is concern about Mr. Hastings' past ethics problems. He was a federal district judge in Florida before coming to Congress in 1992, but was impeached and removed from his judgeship in 1989 for bribery and perjury despite being acquitted on all charges in a criminal trial, a first in American politics.

Mr. Hastings said he has visited more than 25 intelligence posts around the world in expectation of this "opportunity" and has gotten support from Democratic members of the Florida delegation.

"People around the country are sending Mrs. Pelosi letters and e-mails on my behalf that I have not solicited, and Nancy has not spoken to me about her intentions as yet, but it is all political, and I am hoping to get the job," Mr. Hastings said.

Rep. Jane Harman, California Democrat, is the current ranking member, but there has been tension between her and Mrs. Pelosi, as she is a member of the more conservative Blue Dog Coalition of Democrats, that is friendly with Mr. Hoyer.

She was able to secure her position on the committee, after leaving to run for governor and then returning to Congress, through a deal in which the former ranking member on intelligence, CBC member Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr. of Georgia was eased off the committee so Mrs. Harman could take over.

Reid Plotting Agenda (RC)

By Emily Pierce

Roll Call, November 16, 2006

The Senate Democratic leadership team plans a long, laborious slog for the Senate next year even as party leaders continue to formalize their legislative agenda for the 110th Congress — an agenda that already includes a couple of surprises.

At a breakfast with reporters Tuesday, incoming Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) warned that the “do-nothing” Congress, as his party has labeled recent Republican rule in the chamber, will soon be over.

Promising to “work long hours,” Reid said that “we’re going to work more than just Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday until noon.”

Democratic leaders indicated they were keenly aware that this month’s elections, in which they won a majority in both chambers for the first time in 12 years, could be just a flash in the pan if they do not deliver on their campaign promises.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee Chairman Charles Schumer (N.Y.) acknowledged that the 2006 elections were “largely a rejection of George Bush,” and not necessarily a full embrace of Democratic policies. But he added that voters “are giving us a chance, and our job over the next two years is to close the deal.”

To that end, Reid outlined some of his top legislative priorities for next year, which include an effort to “do everything we can to make elections more civil.”

Principally, Reid said that would mean passing a bill to create criminal penalties for election fraud, including offenses such as voter misinformation campaigns carried out by robo-calls and misleading flyers.

Noting that such tactics were used in both the Missouri and Maryland Senate races, Schumer said, “I think the person or people who authorized that should go to jail for 10 years.” Currently, civil fines usually are the most serious penalty assessed for such ploys. Schumer added that a separate unit should be created within the Justice Department to deal with cases of election fraud.

Reid said the election measure likely would be one of the first 10 bills Democrats introduce next year — an indication of the high priority the party places on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0095340

